

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS,

ROBERT CASSELS (Pursuer), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Sir F. Herschell—Sol.-Gen. Balfour—Rigby.

Mackintosh.*

No. 1.

Jan. 13, 1881.
Cassels v.
Stewart

Partnership—Latent assignation by one partner of his beneficial interest to a copartner.—A contract of copartnery provided that it should not be in the power of any of the partners "to assign all or any part of his share or interests in the capital, stock, or profits of the concern, to any person or persons, or to give them a right to inspect the company's books, or to interfere in any way with the business of the company," and that should any such assignation be granted contrary to this stipulation, the same should be null and void "so far as regards the company or other individual partners, who shall not be obliged to pay any attention thereto." It was also provided that on the death, insolvency, or retirement of any partner, the remaining partners should have the option of buying his interest at the amount standing at his credit at the last balance. The company having come to consist of three partners, R, S, and C, with equal shares, R and S entered into an agreement, which was not disclosed to C, by which R sold to S, his nephew, his whole interest in the concern as it stood at a certain date. R continued ostensibly a partner till his death, which occurred about seven years after the date of this agreement, during which period the business and prosperity of the company greatly increased. On the death of R, when the agreement between him and S came to light, C raised an action against S to compel him to communicate the benefit which he had obtained by his latent arrangement with R.

Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) (1) that the contract of copartnery did not prohibit a sale of the beneficial interest of one of the partners either to a stranger or a copartner, provided the effect of the sale did not oblige the company or other partners to take cognisance of it; (2) that the rule which requires a partner, dealing with an asset or liability of the company, or transacting in the line of the company's business, to communicate any benefit derived by him to the company, did not apply to a partner purchasing another partner's interest in the company.

Robert Cassels, the pursuer, appealed.

Lord Watson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case has been argued with much ability, and your Lordships have been put in possession of the views which are relied upon in support of the appeal. Those views were not adopted by any of the four learned Judges who decided the case in the Court below; and under these circumstances, as I believe there is no difference of opinion among your Lordships with regard to the correctness of the decision appealed from, it does not appear to be necessary to call upon the learned counsel for the respondent to address your Lordships' House.

Now, the first point, which was very confidently urged, was that in point of fact there was a mandate constituting the respondent, Mr Stewart, the agent of his copartner, the appellant, in this transaction, so as, upon the principles of mandate or agency, to entitle the appellant to the benefit of the contract made between Mr Stewart and his uncle, Mr Reid. It would be very difficult to imagine an allegation of that kind resting upon more slender grounds, because the way in which it is put by the appellant himself is this: that in the year 1860, three years before the agreement between Mr Reid and Mr Stewart, upon the occasion of Mr Robertson parting with his interest on certain terms which were thought to be beneficial to him, something was said about Mr Reid being probably willing to part with his interest on similar terms, and Mr Cassels, the appellant, said that he would be perfectly agreeable to such an arrangement. Upon the question of fact, whether any conversation which could reasonably be so interpreted ever took place or not, there is a difference of recollection between the appellant and the respondent. Your Lordships have one witness against the other, and nothing that I can see to strike the balance between them. Therefore there would have been great difficulty, to say the least, in acting upon that evidence, more especially when the language to which alone Mr Cassels speaks is itself the most vague and uncertain which could well be conceived on such a subject. That Mr Stewart did not consider that he had accepted any mandate for that purpose is clear.

But it seems to me that we may lay the whole of that branch of the argument aside upon this ground,—that whatever controversy might have arisen in consequence of that conversation between these parties, assuming the conversation to have taken place as Mr Cassels states, if then or shortly afterwards such an agreement had been made, in point of fact no such agreement was made then or within anything which by possibility could be called a reasonable time afterwards. There is no connection in point of fact between the actual agreement and that conversation. I pass, therefore, from the subject of mandate.

The next argument was this, that a wrong has been done here by the purchase of Mr Reid's share from him by his nephew, Mr Stewart, on all or some of these three grounds,—first, that there is in the partnership contract a prohibition against the assignment of a partner's share, and that the breach of that prohibition, which it is said has taken place by this transaction, is a wrong for which there must be some remedy; secondly, that even if that were no wrong, or a wrong not drawing after it the remedy now claimed in the case of a sale of Mr Reid's interest to a stranger, yet the position of Mr Stewart, as a partner, disqualified him at all events from purchasing otherwise than for the benefit of his copartner as well as himself, and that on that ground the appellant may claim the benefit of the purchase; and thirdly, that if these consequences would not follow from these causes alone, they do follow when you have added the concealment of the transaction for a considerable period of time.

Now, the first observation that I have to make is this, that I cannot interpret the partnership contract as prohibiting, or attempting to prohibit, a sale of the beneficial interest of one of the partners to a stranger, or to a copartner, if the effect of such sale is not to give any "right to inspect the company's books," or had it not before, or to oblige the company or other individual partners to take Jan. 13, 1881.

"to interfere in any way with the business of the company," to a person who No. 1.
 notice of it or "pay any attention" to it. I cannot separate, as it has been Cassels v.
 suggested that your Lordships ought to separate, that part of the clause which Stewart.
 speaks of the effect of such assignation or conveyance, if granted, and the part which says that it shall not be in the power of any of the parties to assign.
 Your Lordships will observe that this is not a covenant not to do a thing, but a declaration as between the partners that it shall not be in the power of any of them to do it. Then it goes on to contemplate an act of that nature being done, and says that if it should be done it shall be "null and void and of no force, strength, or effect so far as regards the company," and so on. The argument on the other side really is that you are to turn the declaration as to what is not to be in the power of the partners into a covenant not to do a thing which is in their power; and when it is expressly said that the effect of a particular act is to be qualified so far as relates to certain persons and matters, that you are to qualify it still further, and not only so far. I cannot accept that construction of the agreement. It appears to me that its intention and effect is simply this:
 If anything of that kind is done it shall not have the effect of giving any person claiming under it any right whatever against the company or against the other partners, or of obliging them to take any notice of it; it shall not have any effect which will alter any of their rights. The actual transaction was one which, as it was carried into effect, was, as I think, in exact conformity with that agreement. It gave no new person any right to inspect the company's books, or to interfere with the business; it did not enlarge the power of interference, within the meaning which I ascribe to those words in the contract, of any person, beyond what existed before; it did not change the constitution of the partnership; it did not make Mr Reid cease to be liable; it did not oblige the appellant to take notice of any greater interest in Mr Stewart than Mr Stewart had before.

I pass on to the next argument, arising out of the special position of Mr Stewart as a partner. Upon that I say, whatever may be the force of that argument, it cannot depend upon this clause; for this clause most certainly makes no distinction between an assignment to a person who is, and an assignment to a person who is not, a partner. On the contrary, it would rather seem to me that it has in view an assignment to one who is not a partner, prohibiting things which in the other case could not happen. Well, then, is there any authority which says that the beneficial interest of one partner in a partnership, apart from a special contract or stipulation, may not be given or sold by him to another of the copartners? The authorities which were cited have no tendency to establish such a principle. They relate to dealings by a partner, during the continuance of the partnership, with either present or future partnership assets or liabilities. A man obtaining his locus standi, and his opportunity for making such arrangements, by the position he occupies as a partner, is bound by his obligation to his copartners in such dealings not to separate his interest from theirs, but, if he acquires any benefit, to communicate it to them. I should be sorry to see the day when the principle of such cases as *Featherstonehaugh v. Fenwick*¹ could be disturbed or called in question. But this subject-matter here is in no sense a property or interest of the partnership. The share of an individual part-

No. 1. X ner is his own property, not the property of the firm ; and if bought it would not be bought by the partnership as a partnership, but by one or more individuals purchasing for his or their own benefit. If the man dies, it passes to his heirs and executors, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary. If there is a stipulation to the contrary, still the principle is the same in all respects—it is his property—it is something distinct from the partnership assets, although it is, or represents, his interest in those assets. That principle, therefore, does not touch this case at all.

Cassels v.
Stewart.

It is suggested that by possibility the motives of particular partners for interesting themselves in the welfare of the concern may be affected by a diminution of their beneficial interests. All I can say is, if that be the opinion of those who enter into a partnership contract, they must put something into the partnership contract to restrict the powers which otherwise each partner would have over what is his own. I am not at all sure that it would increase the inducement to enter into partnership contracts if such restrictions were made part of them ; because the principle of the argument does not stop at the point where the entire beneficial interest is parted with, and a partner becomes a mere trustee for some one else to whom he has made either a gift or a sale ; it would apply to every case in which he diminished his beneficial interest below the point recognised in the constitution of the partnership, either by communicating to somebody else a particular share of it, or by allowing some participation in the profits, for a certain consideration, to another person, or by making a charge upon it, or by granting or agreeing to pay an annuity or annuities out of it.

Not only is there no authority for such a proposition, but we have in the books well-known cases in which such transactions have been recognised by Courts of Equity, at least in England, as regular and legitimate, where not expressly excluded. There is the well-known case of Brown v. De Tastet.¹ De Tastet and Paiva and Grellet entered into a partnership deed, and a Mr Mangin, who had been at an earlier period in partnership with De Tastet, not communicating at all with Paiva or Grellet, made an agreement for a subpartnership with De Tastet in De Tastet's share. Afterwards the accounts, as to that share, had to be taken in a suit in Chancery, and the Court, with the approval of Lord Eldon, as appears by this book, dismissed the bill as against the other two partners Paiva and Grellet, because they had nothing to do with the contract ; but directed an account of the profits as between De Tastet and Mangin, holding De Tastet responsible to Mangin for his share of all the profits which had been made either by himself or the other partners. There is another case upon the same principle, Bray v. Fromont.² The agreement there was between three persons to work a coach from London to Bath, each undertaking to find horses for certain stages. One of them (Smith) employed Bray to provide horses for him, and agreed, in consideration of his doing so, to give him a certain share of his profits. The bill which was maintained was for an account and payment of a proportionate share of those profits, but subject to the account as between the partners in the principal partnership ; the other partners having nothing to do with that share in which the interest was given to Bray.

I apprehend, my Lords, that you will, under these circumstances, hold that in this case there is no principle which justifies any claim on the part of the appellant to participate in the profits of this transaction. I can find no ground for saying that there is any breach of the duty of a partner in a transaction like this between an uncle and a nephew, by way of bounty to a very great extent on the part of the uncle to the nephew,—a transaction involving no object or purpose against the good faith of the partnership agreement, and neither alleged nor proved to have had such an effect. If that or any other bargain, made by a partner with another partner, being concealed, were used for unfair or illegitimate purposes in the subsequent management of the partnership concern, and if, when the facts became known, it should appear that wrong had been done and damage sustained by means of any such secret arrangement between two partners, redress suitable to the nature of the injury and the circumstances of the case might probably be found. But that would depend, not upon the agreement by one partner to give a beneficial interest in his share to another, but upon the use assumed to have been made of that agreement in an illegitimate way to the prejudice of a third partner, and upon proof of actual damage having occurred.

Cassels v. Stewart.

It appears to me to be unnecessary to add anything more, except to move your Lordships that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD PENZANCE.—My Lords, agreeing as I do with all that has fallen from my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, I shall occupy your Lordships for a very few minutes with what I have to say.

With regard to the first point, as to the mandate, I think it is a point which, when the facts of the case are understood, is really hardly arguable. The most that has happened, supposing that you take the pursuer's account and throw aside the account of the defender altogether, is that at a certain time it was intimated to the pursuer that Mr Reid wished to retire upon the same terms as Mr Robertson, and thereupon the pursuer said that he would have no objection to that arrangement. Now, my Lords, that is construed into a mandate, and then the matter is followed up by an attempt to shew that the bargain which was ultimately made between Mr Stewart and Mr Reid was a bargain actually made in furtherance and under the authority of that mandate.

It seems to me that the fact that the one partner intimated to the other partner that he was ready to enter into a certain arrangement with regard to the retirement of Mr Reid, is not sufficient to constitute an authority in the sense in which that word is used in this argument without shewing that Mr Stewart, to whom that proposition was made, accepted it as an authority, and afterwards acted upon it as an authority. Now, it seems to me that there is no particle of evidence upon the face of the pursuer's statement to shew that Mr Stewart ever accepted that, or ever professed that he would act upon it, and it took place three years, if not more, before he actually entered into a contract with Mr Reid for his retirement, or rather for the sale of his interest in the concern. It appears to me, therefore, that that point entirely fails, and that it is one upon which your Lordships could have, I think, very little or no doubt.

With regard to the deed, and particularly the effect of the sixth clause of the deed, I will not add one word to the excellent exposition of it which my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has given, and with which I entirely agree.

But with regard to the last point, which is a more substantial one, and one upon which greater stress was laid, namely, that the principle that a partner

No. 1.

Cassels v.
Stewart.

(and it is the same with regard to an agent) cannot in acting in partnership concerns secure to himself an individual benefit where he is acting in those concerns, and that if he attempts to do so, the partnership may claim a benefit in any such contract, is a principle well understood and thoroughly and soundly established. But the answer to the proposed application of that principle to the present case is, that this arrangement with Mr Reid was not an arrangement in the partnership business, it was not an arrangement in which the partnership had an interest. I do not know that I could better express what I feel upon that subject than by reading a sentence of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Curriehill). He says,—“The present case appears to me to be entirely different. The subject-matter of the agreement is entirely outside the scope of the company's business. It relates exclusively to the stock and profit belonging to one of the individual partners, who is communicating these on extremely liberal terms to his own nephew, who no doubt happens to be also a partner in the concern, but who does not thereby acquire any advantage over the company, or the remaining partner, or make any profit which the company or the remaining partner would have made if there had been no such agreement.” It seems to me, my Lords, that that correctly describes the circumstances of the present case, and by that description throws them outside the principle upon which your Lordships are now asked to act.

But then it was said that although that may be so, a distinct wrong was done in the present case to Mr Cassels, the pursuer, because by an assignment of Mr Reid's interest behind his back, Mr Reid had stripped himself of part, at any rate, if not of the whole, of those motives which would tend to make him exercise the vigilance and judgment in the partnership affairs to which Mr Cassels, the pursuer, had a right to look. My Lords, I confess that when that proposition was stated, I asked myself how far such a proposition would go. A share in a partnership and the profits made, or to be made, in the partnership, are, I believe, the property of the individual partner, and if the principle were once to be established that an individual partner cannot charge and cannot sell a portion of his interest, that he cannot hand over to a third person for valuable consideration a year's profit, or half a year's profit, or in any way diminish or withdraw a portion of the active interest he has in the concern,—I say if that principle were to be established it would be one of very wide application, and one which would largely diminish the individual interest and freedom that properly belong to a partner in any partnership. I looked anxiously to see whether, for such a principle as was put forward, any case was cited at the bar in establishment of it. No such case, or authority of any kind, was cited, and the principle of the cases I have referred to certainly did not embrace it. My Lords, in the absence of all authority, and having regard to the effect which would be produced by accepting such a principle, I should strongly advise your Lordships that you ought not to do so.

Under these circumstances I agree that the judgment should stand, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

On the first question, whether there was in point of fact a mandate or authority given by Mr Cassels to Mr Stewart under which Mr Stewart made a contract with Mr Reid, it is only a question of fact, and upon that I intend to say nothing more than that having read Lord Curriehill's (the Lord Ordinary) note to his interlocutor, which is the first judgment given, I can add nothing No. 1.

 whatever to his reasons stated there, which seem to me to place that part of the matter in as clear a light as possible. I do not think there is the slightest ground for saying that in point of fact that was made out. Jan. 18, 1881.
Cassels v.
Stewart.

Then, as to the next ground upon which the appellant's case was put, namely, the supposition of an analogy to the case of Featherstonehaugh v. Fenwick¹ and other cases of that sort, I do not think that that class of cases has any analogy with the present. Those cases proceed upon the ground that if a partner being an agent (for I think it is because he is an agent that the fiduciary character arises) makes a profit out of the concerns of his principal, and as acting for him, he must communicate it to his principal; he cannot make a profit out of his principal's business for himself. As I have said, a partner is an agent, and the principle applying to him is a branch of that general rule which applies to agents. I agree with what has been said by both the noble and learned Lords who have spoken before me, that that is of necessity confined to those cases where it is part of the business of the company or firm that is carried on, and I think it is quite impossible to say that the purchase of a partner's beneficial interest in the partner's share in the partnership was one of those things in which the business of the company was carried on, and in which, therefore, Mr Stewart may be considered as in the nature of an agent for that class of dealings for Mr Cassels. It is upon that ground that I say that the class of cases I have referred to has nothing whatever to do with the present case.

There is a further ground upon which the appellant's case is put, namely, that by the special terms of the contract made between the partners, it is agreed that Mr Reid shall continue a partner, that he shall not have the power in fact to sell his partnership interest, or at least, that if he do sell his partnership interest, that shall not have any effect as against the other partners in the concern. Upon that I perfectly agree with what has been already said by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, and I do not think it necessary to repeat it.

The last ground, and the only one remaining to be spoken of, is this. It was said, as I understood the argument of the counsel for the appellant, that, although this transaction might have been all right if it had been disclosed, yet that inasmuch as Mr Reid, by having made this agreement with his nephew by which he in substance and effect gave him a present of some £25,000 (for that is what it really amounted to) in this particular shape, had deprived himself of the beneficial interest in his partnership whilst he still retained the liability and still retained the power, he had by so doing deceived his partner, Mr Cassels, and induced him to go on in the belief that he had the benefit not only of Mr Reid's services and Mr Reid's judgment, but also of Mr Reid's services and judgment as having a strong pecuniary interest in making them as available as he could. I think that is about the strongest way in which the argument can be put. It was said that that was a positive wrong to his partner.

Now, I pause to say that I do not think it was in the slightest degree morally wrong in the present case or in circumstances like those before us. I do not see that it could be supposed for a moment by the most conscientious moralist that there was anything wrong here. But I can see this: it may have led Mr Cassels to suppose that he had Mr Reid's personal interest to induce Mr Reid to exercise his judgment judiciously, and to be more careful in giving his judgment and advice upon a thing than he would otherwise have been. It was said that that was a wrong, and then the argument that was based upon it was this: "We cannot prove that this has done the slightest harm" (in point of fact I think it is clearly proved that it never did the slightest harm), "but it might possibly have done some harm, and therefore" (and here it is that, I confess, I listened to both the learned counsel with some curiosity to see how they took X this great stride in their logic) "therefore, although we cannot prove that it has done any harm, yet, as it might possibly have done harm, we say that there was a breach of contract with Mr Cassels in the transaction, and it must be considered as having been a mere case of a mandate to one partner on the part of the other." I cannot see, my Lords, how that conclusion would follow from the premises; and not a single authority, or anything like an authority, has been cited for it.

I can only come to the conclusion, therefore, that the contract remains a good contract between Mr Reid and Mr Stewart, as it was before Mr Reid's death. It would have been better, I think, if Mr Cassels had been informed of it whilst it was so going on. I generally think it is advisable, as a matter of prudence, as well as on other grounds, to let everything be above board; and therefore I say it would have been better that he should have been told that Mr Reid had made that arrangement; but his not having been told about it did no harm whatever, and inasmuch as even supposing harm had resulted from it, Mr Reid would have been liable for that harm, that cannot entitle Mr Cassels to say that as against Mr Stewart the benefit arising from the purchase of Mr Reid's share is to be given partly to Mr Cassels. I think, therefore, my Lords, that upon all these grounds the case of the appellant totally fails, and consequently I quite agree in the proposed judgment.

LORD WATSON concurred.

Poor DUNCAN M'KENZIE (Complainer), Appellant.—Brand—Rhind.
BRITISH LINEN COMPANY (Respondents), Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Balfour
—Chitty, Q.C.

Bill of Exchange—Forgery—Adoption—Silence as a personal bar to disclaiming liability.—When a person comes to know that his signature has been forged to a bill mere delay on his part in giving notice of the forgery to the billholder will not necessarily imply adoption nor bar him from repudiating liability unless the billholder or others have been prejudiced by his silence.

A bill for £76 drawn by A, and bearing to be accepted by B and C, was discounted by a bank. It fell due on 10th April, and on Saturday 12th April the bank gave notice of dishonour to B, who lived at some distance from the office of the bank. On receiving the notice B did not inform the bank that his signature to the bill was a forgery, or communicate with them in any way. On Monday 14th April, without waiting for a reply from B, the bank allowed the bill to be retired by A, who paid £6 in cash and discounted another bill for £70, drawn by him and bearing to be accepted by the same B and C. This second bill fell due on 17th July, and the bank, on 14th, 18th, and 21st July, gave notices that it was coming due, and that it was overdue, to B. B made no reply to these notices until 29th July, when he informed the bank that his signature had been forged. Notwithstanding various suspicious circumstances, tending to shew knowledge and authorisation or adoption on the part of B, held (rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that it was not proved that B had authorised his name to be put to the bill, or had subsequently adopted the signature; and (2) that he was not barred by his silence from repudiating liability on 29th July, as the bank had been in no way injured by it.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case there are two questions, the first, whether the appellant authorised or assented to the signature of his name as drawer and indorser of the bill of exchange of the 14th April 1879; the second, whether, if he did not, he has nevertheless so acted as to be estopped from denying his liability on that bill in a question between himself and the respondents, the British Linen Company.

If the first of these questions ought to be answered in the appellant's favour, I am clearly of opinion that the circumstances of this case can raise no estoppel against him. He has done nothing from first to last by which the respondents can have been led to act in any way in which they would not otherwise have acted, or to omit to take any step for their own security, or in any sense for their benefit, which they would otherwise have taken—nothing from which the respondents or a Court of justice could reasonably infer that he “adopted,” or admitted his liability upon, this bill.

The merits of the respondents appear to me to be extremely small. They took from John Fraser the first bill for £76 on the 7th February 1879, bearing the signatures of the appellant and John Macdonald, without any knowledge of these parties or of their handwriting, and without any inquiry whatever. The bill was not one which had been previously in circulation; it was offered by John Fraser to the bank to obtain a loan of money for his own benefit for the purpose of paying for a grocery business which he was then taking up in Inverness. John Fraser had not been their customer before; they knew nothing of him except that he had been in the employment of a respectable merchant who was one of their customers. On Saturday, 12th April 1879, two days after the bill became due, they caused notice to be given to the appellant, and also to Macdonald, both of whom resided and were in employments at some little distance from Inverness. But on the following Monday, before any reply had been or could reasonably have been expected to be received to these notices, they gave up this bill to John Fraser in exchange for £6 cash, and for another bill which, when produced to Mr Williamson (the bank's agent), was signed in blank with the same names, and was filled up by John Fraser in Mr Williamson's presence for £70, being the bill now in question. It is impossible for the respondents to contend that any conduct or silence on the appellant's part caused them to take either the first or the second bill, or to abstain on the 14th April from doing anything for their own security which they would otherwise have done.

The respondents on the 14th July 1879 (before the second bill became due), and again on the 18th and 21st July (when it was overdue), gave notices to the appellant; and on the 29th July they were informed that he denied his signature to, and his liability upon, that bill. There is no principle upon which the appellant's mere silence for a fortnight, during which the position of the respondents was in no way altered or prejudiced, can be held to be an admission or adoption of liability, or to estop him from now denying it. What took place during the interval was unknown to the respondents, and it has, in my opinion, no tendency to shew that in point of fact the appellant then was, or admitted himself to be, or intended to become, liable. He communicated as early as the 18th or 19th July with Mr M'Gillivray, a law-agent, expressly on the footing that his name had been forged, and that he was not liable. It is plain that Mr M'Gillivray was desirous, if possible, to get some settlement made by which criminal proceedings might be avoided. The appellant was also quite willing that such a settlement should be arrived at, if it could be done without making him liable. No such settlement, however, was arrived at, and I am unable to discover in the communings which then took place any ground in fact or in law on which the appellant ought to be held to have become liable on the bill by reason of those communings if he was not so before.

Okus
The question, therefore, in my judgment, is only one of fact, viz., whether the appellant did or did not authorise or assent to the use made of his name on the 14th April by John Fraser? and it appears to me that the onus probandi on this point rests entirely upon the respondents, it being admitted that the signature to the bill of the 14th of April is not in the appellant's handwriting. The question, I think, turns altogether upon what took place when the appellant met John Fraser on that day. If it is shewn that he then knew, or had reasonable grounds to believe, that a new bill with his name upon it had been given by John Fraser to the respondents, the conclusion (under all the circumstances) would be inevitable that he assented to and became bound by the use so made of his name. On the contrary supposition it is of course impossible to hold that he assented to that of which he was ignorant, and which he had no reason to believe.

This is in great measure a question depending upon the credit to be given to the witnesses on each side. If John Fraser and his father are believed, the case against the appellant is established. But John Fraser and his father (besides the discredit attaching prima facie to a witness acknowledged to have been guilty of forgery, and to one closely related to him and identified with him in feeling and interest) prove more than, in view of the undoubted facts of the case, I find it possible to believe. According to the father, John Fraser told him that the appellant had actually signed both the bills. Macdonald said he had signed the second bill, and the appellant said he had "put the second bill all right." According to John Fraser himself, the appellant came to him to get the first bill renewed before he (John Fraser) went to the bank about it, and expressly authorised the renewal in his name. If these statements were true, the appellant's signature was subscribed to both bills by his authority, and there was no forgery; nor was there any reason why he should not have signed the second bill himself. I am unable to place any reliance whatever upon the evidence of either of these persons.

The Lord Ordinary, who heard and saw the witnesses, gave credit to the appellant and refused it to the Frasers. Taking the case as it stands upon the evidence of the appellant and of Macdonald, both of them distinctly deny knowledge that a second bill had been given, and a fortiori that it had been given in their names. The appellant says he was solemnly and positively assured by John Fraser that the first bill had been taken up not by way of renewal but by payment, and the assurances given to Macdonald were that he "had squared it." I cannot but say that some of the circumstances as they appear upon the evidence of these two persons are to my mind suspicious and unsatisfactory. If the burden of proof lay upon the appellant I might perhaps doubt whether he had satisfied it. But the burden of proof is on the respondents, and it is impossible, merely because there are some suspicious circumstances not satisfactorily explained, to hold a man liable upon a bill which he did not sign or authorise, and of the existence of which he swears he was ignorant.

No. 2.

Feb. 11, 1881.
M'Kenzie v.
British Linen
Co.

The suspicious circumstances are—(1) That the appellant, after learning on the 14th April that his name had been forged to the first bill, did not communicate with the bank; (2) that he required the acknowledgment, No. 18 of process, to be given him under John Fraser's hand, which is dated the 15th April, and which merely says, "Before the above date Mr Duncan Mackenzie did not sign a bill in my favour;" (3) that when he took away the first bill of the 7th of February he did not destroy it, but gave it to a young man named James Fraser to keep, assigning as his reason "that it might be a warning to him not to do the like"; (4) that the interview of the 14th April ended in an adjournment to a public-house, and in a loan of £4 by the forger to the appellant, which the appellant says he afterwards repaid by the hand of James Fraser; and (5) that there was the delay already mentioned, in July, before the appellant gave notice to the bank—that is to say, to Mr Williamson—that the second bill was a forgery; and that when he did so he blamed Mr Williamson for not insisting "on a further reduction when the first bill became due."

This latter circumstance appears to me to amount to very little or nothing, and after much consideration I think that all the other circumstances admit of explanation upon the hypothesis that the appellant was thinking of the first bill only, and had no idea that a second bill, also bearing his signature, had been given on the 14th of April, as easily as, or more easily, than they do upon the contrary supposition. Evidently he had no sensitive feeling on the subject of forgery so long as he did not himself suffer by it; he condoned it with great facility to John Fraser; he did not wish to inform against him; he was willing to remain on friendly and familiar terms with him, and perhaps also to squeeze out of him some temporary accommodation as the price of his silence, without regard to the difficulties he might be under, if he had really himself found the money to take up the first bill. But how that money was found (being himself unwilling to help) the appellant might also not choose to inquire; it might have been borrowed from the uncle William Fraser, or from somebody else, without making it necessary to suspect any second forgery. The document dated the 15th of April (whatever else may be said or thought of it) is inconsistent with the story now told by the Frasers, and confirms (as far as it goes) the appellant's statement that John Fraser did then assure him that there had been no renewal of the first bill, at all events in his (the appellant's) name. The fact of the acknowledged forgery might suggest precautions against future forgeries, though there might be no knowledge or belief or suspicion that any such had already taken place. The appellant might not unreasonably consider it a proper precaution against any such possible repetition of the offence to retain the first bill, to admit some persons whom he thought discreet to his confidence about it, and to have under John Fraser's own hand what, in truth, amounted

No. 2.

M'Kenzie v.
British Linen

to an admission of the forgery of that document, and to an acknowledgment that he had down to the 15th signed nothing for John Fraser's accommodation. The possession of these papers gave the appellant a strong hold over John Fraser. With the first bill in his own hands he had no longer anything to fear from the notice which he had received from the bank; and he might think it the most prudent course to abstain from making any communication to Mr Williamson which might place him in the dilemma of either having to discover John Fraser's guilt or seeming to admit that he had himself been liable on the bill. I do not say or think that the appellant's conduct, if it was to be thus explained, was commendable or satisfactory; it was not such as might have been expected from a scrupulous man with a strong sense of moral propriety; but it was, on the other hand, by no means such as to require for its explanation that he should have had in his mind any belief or even suspicion that another forgery of his name had taken place on that 14th of April, contrary to the positive assurances which he states that he had received from John Fraser.

The burden of proof is (as I before said) upon the respondents. In my opinion they have failed to satisfy it. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, this case comes before your Lordships by way of appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session against an interlocutor by which the majority, consisting of the Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure reversed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Shand dissenting. As the Lord Ordinary (Adam) who tried the cause saw the witnesses and heard them give their testimony, he had an advantage in so far as regards any question depending on their credibility which neither the Judges of the First Division nor your Lordships possess, and therefore so far as anything turns on the credibility of the testimony his judgment is not lightly to be overruled. As to the inferences to be drawn from admitted facts, the Lord Ordinary had no advantage over either the Lords of Session or your Lordships. I think, therefore, that though the numbers are three to two, the case comes before the House without any great superiority of authority.

It is not disputed that John Fraser took to the agent of the British Linen Company a bill for £76, dated the 7th February 1879, and payable two months after date, purporting to be drawn by the appellant Mackenzie and a man of the name of John Macdonald on and accepted by John Fraser, and that the agent discounted that bill—it does not precisely appear when, but about the date of the bill. It was understood between Fraser and the agent that when the bill became due the amount should be reduced and a renewal bill given and discounted for the balance. It is not now disputed that the names of neither of the drawers were in their own handwriting. The agent, who knew neither of them, acted entirely on the faith of John Fraser's representations. The bill became due and was dishonoured on the 10th April 1879. On the 12th April 1879, which was a Saturday, and not before, a notice of dishonour was sent by post to Mackenzie, and it is not disputed that he did receive it on the evening of that day. On Monday the 14th April Fraser came to the agent, bringing with him a paper stamped for a bill, and with the names of Mackenzie and Macdonald (apparently in the same handwriting as those on the bill of 7th February) written on it, in the places where the names of the drawers and indorsers should be. Fraser wished the bill to be renewed for the whole amount. The agent declined to do that, but after talking it over it was agreed to be renewed to the extent of £70, and that a larger reduction would be made when the bill was renewed again. It was then filled up as it now is so as to purport to be a bill dated the 14th April 1879, for £70, drawn by Mackenzie and Macdonald on John Fraser, payable three months after date to their order, accepted by Fraser and indorsed by the two drawers to the British Linen Company. Fraser paid £6 and the charges. The bill of 7th February was then given up to Fraser, who took it away. The question in the cause is, whether, on the facts proved, Mackenzie is liable to the British Linen Company on this bill of the 14th April?

M'Kenzie v.
British Linen
Co.

Pausing for a moment here in my narrative of the facts not now in dispute, it seems to me clear, though I do not think it is quite admitted, that the agent acted in discounting this bill, as he had acted in discounting the bill of the 7th February, entirely on his faith in Fraser's representations. Having sent off the notice of dishonour so late as the Saturday, by post, he had no right to suppose the drawer would be with him so early as the morning of the Monday, and therefore the undisputed fact that Mackenzie had not done anything to deny the genuineness of his signature could not as yet afford any new ground for believing it was genuine. To proceed with the undisputed facts, Mackenzie did not inform the British Linen Company that his signature to the bill of the 7th February was a forgery. On the 14th July 1879 an intimation was sent by post to Mackenzie that "your bill on John Fraser, Greig Street, Inverness, for £70, is due on the 17th July, and lies at this office for payment." This was received by Mackenzie, who did not come to the bank. On the 17th July the bill was dishonoured, and on the 18th July notice of dishonour was sent, which, it is admitted, was received by Mackenzie. On the 21st July, which was a Monday, a notice was sent that if not paid on Friday it would be put into the hands of the bank's law-agent. On the 25th July the law-agent, Ross, wrote, and on the 29th July a writer of the name of M'Gillivray, who had been employed by Mackenzie, informed Ross that Mackenzie's defence was that his signatures as drawer and indorser were forgeries. This was the first intimation that was given to the bank that the genuineness of the signatures was denied.

The disputed facts depend on the effect given to the testimony, as to the credibility of which there has been a great difference of opinion between the Judges below. Mackenzie had not only denied his liability to the bank, but he had charged John Fraser with having forged his signature. If this was a falsehood it was a very wicked one, and once having pledged himself to it he had every motive to persevere in his falsehood. John Fraser was brought to give evidence from the prison to which he had been committed on Mackenzie's charge, and had a very strong motive to try to fix Mackenzie with responsibility even by a falsehood. It does not, however, by any means follow that he was not fixing him by telling the truth.

The testimonies of these two witnesses, as might be anticipated, are in direct conflict. The Lord Ordinary and Lord Shand believe Mackenzie to swear truly when he says that he never knew or suspected that his name was on the second bill till he got the intimation of the 14th July. The Lord President and Lord Mure believe, directly in contradiction of his testimony, that he was aware of it. The Lord President says,—“I am disposed to come to the conclusion that the complainer was perfectly aware, or, to say the least of it, had very good reason to believe, that the first forged bill was replaced by the second forged bill, and that

No. 2. he permitted that to be done, and acquiesced in the proceeding, and was clearly participant in the fraud that Fraser had committed upon the bank.”
 Feb. 11, 1881.
 M'Kenzie v.
 British Linen
 Co.

Lord Deas, I think, proceeds upon another ground. But, before examining the testimony, I wish to consider what it was relevant to prove, for I think some confusion has arisen below from not keeping the different points separate. As it is not now disputed that none of the signatures were written by Mackenzie, being, in fact, all written by Fraser, the acceptor, the burden of proving that he was liable on them rests on the bank. If Mackenzie authorised Fraser to write his name for him he gave him a mandate to sign, and is, of course, liable, and there was no forgery on the part of Fraser. This is a question of fact depending on the evidence. If I thought it was satisfactorily proved that Mackenzie, before Fraser uttered the bills with his name upon them, knew that Fraser was going to do so, and took no steps to hinder him, I should not have much hesitation in drawing the inference that he did authorise him. But, even though it was not made out that the signatures were authorised originally, it still would be enough to make Mackenzie liable if, knowing that his name had been signed without his authority, he ratified the unauthorised act. Then the maxim omnis ratihabito retrotrahitur et mandato priori equiparatur would apply. I wish to guard against being supposed to say that, if a document with an unauthorised signature was uttered under such circumstances of intent to defraud that it amounted to the crime of forgery, it is in the power of the person whose name was forged to ratify it so as to make a defence for the forger against a criminal charge. I do not think he could. But if the person whose name was without authority used chooses to ratify the act even though known to be a crime he makes himself civilly responsible just as if he had originally authorised it. It is quite immaterial whether this ratification was made to the person who seeks to avail himself of it or to another. The Lord President says,—“There is another averment which brings out elements of particular importance in this case. This bill was a renewal of a previous bill with the same names upon it for the sum of £76. Upon the face of that bill the complainer and Macdonald were drawers, and John Fraser was the acceptor, and that bill had been also discounted with the British Linen Company, and this £70 bill, as I have said, was a renewal to the extent of £70 of that previous bill. The averment made is further—‘He never intimated to the bank that the signature of his name to the first bill was a forgery, nor did he so intimate to the bank in regard to the second bill until a fortnight after he had received notice from the bank of the bill being due. If he did not draw and indorse the bills himself he misled the bank into the belief that the signature thereon was his genuine signature, and he adopted them as his, and assumed the responsibility attaching to drawing and indorsing them.’ There are two averments here which require to be distinguished. The one is that the complainer was aware that this first bill with his forged name on it as drawer was presented to the bank, and discounted by the bank in reliance upon his name being genuine. That means, of course, that at the time at which it was presented to be discounted the complainer was aware that his signature thereon was a forgery, and, if that is established, I think the case is clear indeed, because in that case the complainer would be distinctly particeps fraudis, and probably answerable criminally. But the other averment is this, that by his conduct, not silence merely, but silence combined with his conduct, he allowed the bank to rely upon his signature being genuine, and so adopted it as his genuine signature.”

Now, I cannot but think that he here confuses two separate propositions of law, one, to which I fully assent, with another, which is that on which Lord Deas, as I understand him, bases his judgment, to which I do not assent without qualifications which prevent it being applicable to this case. As I have already said, I think if he ratified to anybody or for any purpose the act done by Fraser as professing to be his agent, that for all civil purposes enured to make him liable just as if he had originally authorised that act, and his conduct and silence, combined with his conduct, may prove such a ratification, and if the phrase "adopted it as his genuine signature" is to be understood as meaning that he ratified, I quite agree with what is said. No. 2.
Feb. 11, 1881.
M'Kenzie v.
British Linen
Co.

And I agree that though he did not ratify the act of Fraser, yet he may preclude himself—bar himself by a personal exception—from averring against the bank that the signature was not genuine. Lord Deas says "that a duty lies upon a party whose name is forged not to do or say anything that may mislead a bank. It is his duty not to say anything that may so far deceive a bank as to enable a forger to escape from justice, and thereby, for anything that he can tell, prevent the bank from recovering from him full indemnity. He is not entitled to speculate upon the consequences that may ensue if the bank is prevented from going immediately against the forger. He is bound to take for granted that the result will be to prevent them from recovering on the bill, which otherwise they would." I agree that if he thus leads the bank to believe in the genuineness of the signature till it has lost some opportunity of recovering on the bill, which if the bank had known of the forgery they might have used, it would be a sufficient alteration in the bank's position to preclude him as against the bank. But when Lord Deas says,—“In cases of this kind, where he has peculiar means of knowledge whether his signature is forged or not, he is not entitled by saying or doing something, or not saying or doing something, to lead his neighbour to think that his signature is genuine to his neighbour's loss,” he goes further than I am inclined to follow in the words “by not saying or doing something.” And when he says “there was here not only a moral but a legal duty on the part of the suspender to have informed the bank that his signature to the first bill was a forgery, and if he had done so there would not have been a second bill,” I not only doubt his position that there was a legal duty then to have informed the bank, but I deny his conclusion of fact. As I have already pointed out, the second bill was uttered to the bank before Mackenzie, with the utmost diligence, could have informed the bank that the first was forged. It would be quite a different thing if it was proved that Mackenzie knew that the bank had put the second bill with his name on it to Fraser's credit, and knew that at a time when he had reason to believe that he would be permitted to draw against it. His silence then would certainly prejudice the bank, and would afford very strong evidence indeed that Mackenzie, for Fraser's sake, thus ratified Fraser's act for a time, and a ratification for a time would, I think, in point of law, operate as a ratification altogether. But if Mackenzie (as his case is) first knew that the bank had taken the second bill on the faith of his forged signature on receiving the intimation of the 14th July, he knew that the bank were not going to give further credit to Fraser on the faith of that signature, and that all the mischief was already done. I cannot think that even if Mackenzie had gone so far in his endeavours to shield Fraser from the consequences of his criminal act as to make himself liable to criminal proceedings for an endeavour to obstruct justice, that would bar him from aver-ring against the bank that the signature was not his. Certainly I think that his not telling the bank on the 15th July, nor till the 29th July, that it was a forgery, and so letting them continue in the belief that it was genuine, if he had not indorsed it, could not so preclude him if, as I think was clearly the fact here, the bank neither gave fresh credit in the interval nor lost any remedy which, if the information had been given earlier, they might have made available.

The principles which I have above assumed to be law have been recognised in England ever since the clear judgment of Mr Baron Parke in Freeman v. Cooke (2 Wel. Hurl. and Gordon, Exch. Rep. 654). The Scottish cases cited at your Lordships' bar shew that those principles have not been so clearly recognised in Scotland. I leave to my noble and learned friend who is to follow me the task of commenting on the Scottish decisions, which he is much more competent to perform, merely saying that I have read them all, and that every one, I think, is perfectly consistent with the principles I have stated, and I think their justice must be acknowledged by all.

As to the question whether the evidence of Mackenzie is substantially true or not I shall be more brief. The Lord President reads his statement as to the conversation which took place at Abriachan Wood, and draws the conclusion that Mackenzie knew Fraser "could not have a penny to spare." I cannot go so far, but I think that it does shew that Mackenzie doubted his solvency; the last inference which I should draw from that is that he would readily become surety for him. Soon after that conversation he received the letter of the 11th February, written, be it observed, after the bill of 17th February had been discounted. He says that he did not go in to see Fraser, because he knew that there was no business between them he (Mackenzie) would lose by not calling on him, but that when he received the notice of 12th April he recollected this letter, and suspected that Fraser had put his name to a bill, and accordingly went into Inverness on the Monday to see Fraser. I can see nothing incredible in this. Then he says that "we went into a back room, where, shewing him the notice, I asked him if he had anything to do with this. He said he had, 'but' he added, 'it is not going to trouble you any more.' I asked him what he meant by doing such a thing? (Q.) Doing what? (A.) By forging that bill in my name. He said, 'I did not know the danger of it at the time.' I told him I would not pass him, but would give him up to the fiscal at once. He said, 'You need not do that; I have the bill here, and it will not meddle with you after this.' He shewed me the bill. (Q.) Was anything said between you about the renewal of the bill? (A.) Not a word. I told him at the same time, 'See that you don't put in another to relieve this one.' And he said upon his soul and body he would not. He told me that he paid it in clear cash. This conversation between us was in Gaelic. I believed him when he said the bill was paid. With the bill he gave me I went up to the shop of Mr James Fraser, No. 1 Ness Walk, who belongs to the same place as I belong to, and I gave him the bill, and he kept it. I never saw Fraser of Greig Street again until I heard about the second bill." Why he gave the bill to James Fraser to keep is never explained. If his story is true I see no motive for it; but if John Fraser's story is true I see as little motive for it.

Then there is what I think the strangest piece of evidence in favour of the bank. It is not brought in as a prominent part of their case, but in re-cross-examination:—"Re-cross-examined.—(Shewn No. 18, letter dated 15th April)—

This letter was written by Fraser when the first bill was got up. He told me he would give me that letter to shew that I had nothing to do with it, and that he had cleared the bill with cash. I asked him for a letter to that effect. (Q.) Did you say you wanted to shew the letter to your sister? (A.) No. (Q.) Did you say your sister had been angry at you for going into the bill? (A.) I could not say that, for I did not go into the bill. I had had no quarrel with my sister about the bill. I told her from the first day that I got any notice of it that it was forged. On the day when I got No. 18 I daresay Fraser and I had a dram together, I think in the 'Lorne.' I was not very long with him. I think he lent me £3 or £4 for two or three days. I was parting with him on the other side of the bridge, and said I had to look for £2 or £3 for a day or two, and he said I will give you that, and he gave me £4. That was repaid three or four days after I got it. I sent it to him by James Fraser. (Q.) Do you remember meeting John Fraser in Greig Street, near his shop, about the month of February 1879, and asking him how he was getting on with his shop, and whether he would be able to clear the bill? (Objected to. Objection repelled.) (A.) I don't mind of that occasion, for it never happened. By the Court.—(Q.) How did Fraser come to give you the first bill that was forged? (A.) When I went to him with the notice I had received from the bank he had the bill settled in the bank before I got to his shop. (Q.) Did you ask him for it? (A.) No; he shewed it to me to satisfy me that it was fully settled, and gave it to me. I don't know if he told me to take it away. He did not ask it back. (Q.) Did you put it in your pocket and go away with it? (A.) Yea. (Q.) You told us the first time you spoke to Fraser's father was after the forgery became known in the district, but you said afterwards you spoke to him after you had got the first notice about the bill? (A.) Yes. The forgery was quite current in the district after the first bill. It was known that it had been forged."

John Fraser, who is brought from prison to give evidence, gives, as might be expected, a very different account of the whole transaction. He says that Mackenzie came in to him, as he expected he would, to talk about renewing the bill. He is not asked when anything had occurred to make him expect Mackenzie to come for that purpose, but clearly implies that Mackenzie had before that had knowledge that the first bill was discounted, and that it was, when it became due, to be reduced in amount, and renewed as to part, and he distinctly swears, both in chief and in answer to the Lord Ordinary, that Mackenzie, before he went to the bank to get the bill renewed, authorised him to get Mackenzie's name put on the renewal bill. Why Mackenzie did not write his own name on the blank stamp is never explained.

Then as to the transaction in the public-house he says:—"It was £5 or something that he wanted. I did not sign it until he came in, and he went to the Royal Bank to cash it there. I don't remember when I saw Mackenzie after I got the first bill from the bank, but he came to my shop, and I shewed him the bill. We had gone to a public-house. I had left a boy in the shop. He said his sister and mother were kicking up a row at home against him for giving me the bill. I gave him the bill, or he took it, and kept it. (Shewn No. 16)—This is the bill I gave him; I think he borrowed £5 from me on that date. We had some drink. I drank lemonade, and he drank whisky. We were alone together for a good long while. (Q.) Did you give him that bill, or did he take it? (A.) He took it. As far as I remember he did not say why he wanted it. He wanted to get a note from me that he would shew his sister, because they were kicking up a row. (Shewn No. 18)—(Q.) Did he ask you at that time to write a letter, and did you write this letter?—(The Lord Ordinary again cautioned the witness)—(A.) I did, in order that he should shew it to his mother. (Q.) Did he say he wanted it because his sister was making a row about it? (A.) Yes, so that they would not know about it. I think I wrote it in the public-house. I don't remember how much drink I had that day with him. He did not, as far as I remember, say why he wanted the old bill."

Now, if I could see my way to thinking it proved, as the Lord President does, that Mackenzie knew that Fraser was in such want of money that he could not possibly have met the bill in cash, and had £3 or £4 over to lend, I should think that his borrowing £3 or £4 from him then would go very far to shew that he knew that Fraser had renewed the bill with Mackenzie's name on it, and either had, as John Fraser swears, expressly authorised his doing so, or at all events then ratified it. And though it is imputing to Mackenzie that he not only committed perjury for the purpose of defeating the just claim of the bank, but had committed the far more wicked crime of giving information to the fiscal, leading to the making of a charge of forgery against Fraser, when he, Mackenzie, well knew that Fraser had not committed forgery at all, yet no doubt that may be true. But I cannot think there is enough evidence to justify me in finding such a very serious charge proved. I think the evidence that Mackenzie must have known that Fraser could not have had such command of money by the aid of his friends or otherwise to be able to pay £76 in cash is insufficient, and the evidence as to the loan itself is brought in so much by the way (not striking the Lord Ordinary who tried the cause as of importance, so that no opportunity was given to explain it) that I cannot rely upon it.

John Fraser's evidence is, I think, on the face of it, so improbable that I cannot trust it. And it is distinctly in conflict with that of Macdonald. John Fraser, the father, no doubt says—"I went to the bridge and my son came past me, and I followed him and asked him how he had got on. He said to me—'The bill is all right.' I did not speak to Duncan Mackenzie that day, but when I was repairing the road 150 yards from his house I saw him one day, and he stood speaking to me, and said—'I am sure John would tell you about the bill.' I said—'Yes.' He said—'Well I have put it all right now.' This was after the bill was due in April. Mackenzie said—'The bill is in my possession now.' He tapped his breast as he said so. (Q.) Did he speak to you about the second bill? (A.) He said the second bill was in before he got the first one out. I cannot say that he said that, but he meant that the second was in the bank before he got the first out. (Q.) Did he say how much the second bill was for? (A.) He said there was too much in the first bill—that there was £76 in it, but that £6 had been taken off. I am quite certain he said that about that time." This, if accurately remembered and truly reported, would shew an admission by Mackenzie. But I cannot trust the accuracy of this evidence.

As to what happened afterwards I have no doubt that Mackenzie would have been quite content to say nothing about the forgery if John Fraser or John Fraser's friends took up the bill and freed him from responsibility. And I have no doubt that he delayed making the charge of forgery from the time when he received the intimation till the 29th July in hopes that they would do so, but, as I have already said, I do not think that he thereby made himself liable to the bank unless the bank was in some way prejudiced by that delay, which, in this case, it was not. I therefore agree in the motion which the noble and learned Lord has made, that the interlocutor should be reversed.

M'Kenzie v.
British Linen
Co.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the process of suspension in which the present appeal is taken was raised by Duncan Mackenzie, the appellant, in order to obtain a stay of summary diligence which the respondents were proceeding to use against him on a bill of exchange at three months for the sum of £70 sterling, and bearing date the 14th April 1879, upon which his name appears as that of a drawer and indorser along with another person of the name of John Macdonald.

The sole ground of suspension stated for the appellant is that the signatures upon the bill charged on, bearing to be his, are forgeries. The respondents on record denied that allegation, but the Lord Ordinary, who gave judgment in the appellant's favour, held that its truth was established by the evidence. In the Inner-House the respondents do not seem to have impeached the soundness of that conclusion; and the Lord President accordingly states that "although originally the chargers denied that allegation it must now be taken that the complainer's signature certainly is a forgery."

The majority of the First Division of the Court of Session, consisting of the Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure, gave judgment against the appellant, upon these two grounds—(1) That the appellant was, to use the language of the Lord President, "perfectly aware," or at least "had very good reason to believe, that the first forged bill was replaced by the second forged bill," and that the appellant "permitted that to be done, and acquiesced in the proceeding;" and (2) that assuming such knowledge and acquiescence on the part of the appellant not to be established he must nevertheless be held to have adopted the bill charged on by reason of his failure to give information to the respondents that his signatures were forged after receipt of the notice sent by them in July 1879.

The first ground of judgment assigned by the learned Lords constituting the majority appears to me to negative the idea of forgery. I cannot concur that John Fraser, the drawer of the bill, by whom the signatures of the appellant were admittedly written, can be held thereby to have committed the crime of forgery, according to the law of Scotland, if these signatures were written and used by him, as their Lordships hold it to be proved that they were, with the permission and acquiescence of the appellant. And it does seem a strange thing that in the interlocutor under appeal the respondents are found entitled to costs, but "subject to deduction of any expense that may have been caused to the complainer (appellant) by the respondents' denial of the averment of forgery."

But it is unnecessary to dwell upon these matters, because I agree with your Lordship that neither of the views taken by the learned Judges is well founded, and consequently that the judgment of the First Division must be reversed.

Since the conclusion of the argument at your Lordships' bar I have carefully perused the whole proof led by the parties, and the opinion which I have formed upon the facts of the case is precisely the same with that which has been already expressed in the Court below by Lord Adam (the Lord Ordinary), and by Lord Shand. The real question arising upon the proof appears to be, whether the account given by the appellant, on the one hand, or that given by

M'Kenzie v.
British Linen
Co.

In estimating the relative weight of their conflicting statements it is of course necessary to take into account the whole facts and circumstances of the case established by evidence independent of the testimony of these three witnesses, and also to consider the degree of probability attaching to their respective statements. Giving due effect to these considerations, I have come to the conclusion that the account given by Duncan Mackenzie, the appellant, is to be believed, and that the contradictions of his statement, which are to be found in the evidence of the forger, and his father John Fraser senior, are unworthy of credit. When testimony is directly conflicting, and the question at issue depends upon the credibility of certain witnesses, it is undoubtedly advantageous to have an opportunity of noting the demeanour of these witnesses whilst they are under examination, and the Lord Ordinary had that advantage in the present case. At the same time I should not be inclined to accept the opinion of the Lord Ordinary on that account, unless the opposing testimony came to a very even balance. In the present case, the weight of testimony appears to me, irrespective of the Lord Ordinary's opinion on that point, to be on the side of the appellant; but it is nevertheless satisfactory to my mind, that the Judge before whom the witnesses were examined expresses his unhesitating belief that the appellant gave a "substantially true account of the various transactions which took place with reference to the bills."

Having arrived at that conclusion, I do not think it necessary to criticise the evidence in detail. For reasons, some of which appear in the opinion of Lord Shand, and others of which have been assigned by your Lordships to-day, I am quite unable to concur in the view of the facts which was taken by the Lord President, as I understand, with the approval of his brethren Lord Deas and Lord Mure.

I therefore pass at once to the second ground of judgment, the alleged adoption of the forged bill by the appellant. The facts material to this part of the case which I hold to be instructed by the evidence, and which the majority of the First Division assumed as the alternative of their own view being negatived, appeared to be these:—

(1) That on the 14th of April 1879 the appellant came to know that his signature as drawer and indorser of a bill for £76, discounted with the respondents' bank, had been forged by John Fraser, grocer, Inverness, the drawer; that the forged bill was then delivered to him by the forger; and that the appellant was informed and believed that the bill had been paid in cash.

(2) That the bill had not been so paid, but was retired by the forger paying £6 in cash and handing the bill charged on to the bank.

(3) That on 14th July 1879 written notice was sent to the appellant that the £70 bill drawn by him on John Fraser would mature on the 17th, and lay at the bank office for collection; and that on the 18th July a further notice was sent giving the particulars of the bill, and intimating that it had been protested for non-payment.

(4) That on 21st July 1879 the local agent of the respondents wrote the appellant intimating that unless the bill was forthwith paid by him it would be placed in the hands of their law-agent, and that on 25th July the law-agent intimated by letter to the appellant that proceedings would be taken against him if he did not pay the bill before the 28th July.

(5) That on receipt of the first notice of 14th July the appellant had good reason to know, and was in point of fact aware, that his signature had been again forged by John Fraser, and that on receipt of the second notice he went to Inverness, informed Mr M'Gillivray, a solicitor there, of the fact, and instructed Mr M'Gillivray to take steps to protect him against the consequences of the forgery.

No. 2.

Feb. 11, 1881.
M'Kenzie v.
British Linen
Co.

(6) That on the 29th July 1879 Mr M'Gillivray informed Mr Ross, the law-agent of the bank, that the appellant's signature was forged, and that two days thereafter the appellant, and John Macdonald, whose name was also on the bill as a drawer and indorser, called together upon Mr Williamson, the respondents' branch agent, and told him that their signatures were forged.

It is not suggested that there was any change in the position of the bank betwixt the date of the first notice given to the appellant on the 14th July and the 29th July, when the respondents were informed of the forgery, and it cannot therefore be alleged that the respondents have sustained any loss or prejudice by his silence during that period. But the three learned Judges composing the majority of the First Division have nevertheless held that such silence is, in the circumstances above narrated, sufficient according to the law of Scotland to infer adoption of the forged bill by the appellant. I am unable to concur in that judgment, it being my clear opinion that the right view of the case was taken in the Court below by Lord Shand and the Lord Ordinary.

The question whether a forged bill has or has not been adopted by the person whose signature is forged is in reality an issue of fact and not of law. Still adoption of a bill may be matter of legal inference from certain ascertained facts, and in the present case the inference which has been drawn by the Court below adversely to the appellant appears to depend upon the fact that after he came to know in July that the second bill had been discounted with the bank he (the appellant) kept silence, or at least did not inform the bank of the forgery of his own name until a fortnight or thereby had elapsed. The only reasonable rule which I can conceive to be applicable in such circumstances is that which is expressed in carefully chosen language by Lord Wensleydale in the case of Freeman v. Cooke (2 Wel. Hurl. and Gordon, Ex. 654). It would be a most unreasonable thing to permit a man who knew the bank were relying upon his forged signature to a bill to lie by and not to divulge the fact until he saw that the position of the bank was altered for the worse. But it appears to me that it would be equally contrary to justice to hold him responsible for the bill because he did not tell the bank of the forgery at once, if he did actually give the information, and if, when he did so, the bank was in no worse position than it was at the time when it was first within his power to give the information.

I do not think the Scotch cases which have been cited at the bar bear out the proposition that silence in circumstances such as occur in the present case is per se sufficient to imply adoption of a forged bill. I shall now, before concluding, shortly refer to those cases in the order of their dates.

Meiklem v. Walker, 12 S. 53, was a case in which two brothers, who lived together, were in the year 1828 charged jointly to make payment of a bill upon which both their names appeared. A considerable time after the charge was given the goods of A, one of the brothers, were arrested, whereupon A immediately brought a suspension of the charge and diligence, alleging then, for the first time, that his signature to the bill had been forged by his brother B, who in the meantime had absconded. The Court held that A had made himself liable to pay the forged bill, and refused the suspension, Lord Gillies observing—"Is he to be allowed to acquiesce until the proper debtor makes his escape out the country, and then to come forward and allege he has incurred no liability to the holder of the bill?"

In Findlay v. Currie (13 D. 278) the question was one of relevancy; and all that the Court decided was that the charger had made averments sufficient to entitle him to a counter issue of adoption in order to meet the issue of forgery taken by the suspender. The substance of the charger's averments was that after notice to him of the bill said to be forged and a demand for payment the suspender had an interview with the charger's agents, when he was shewn the bill, and did not deny his signature; that at a subsequent interview the suspender did not deny his signature, but "begged for time to see the bill," which was granted. In the meantime, his brother, the alleged forger, absconded, and he then for the first time denied the authenticity of his subscription to the bill.

Boyd v. The Union Bank (17 D. 159) was a decision upon the record holding the charger's allegations of adoption to be irrelevant. The only allegation of the charger was to the effect that although the bill was during its currency intimated to the suspender, he kept silence, and did not inform the bank that his signature was a forgery. In that case the Lord President (Lord Colonsay) said—"When a party is shewn a bill and makes no objection, and allows the creditor to remain in the belief that it is his signature, he has incurred a ground of liability through the loss incurred by that adoption. That principle might apply even though he was not shewn the bill which is the subject of discussion. If he had allowed the matter to lie over, and through his silence the whole was lost, an obligation might be incurred through that silence."

The case of Warden v. The British Linen Company (1 Macph. 402) is a decision to precisely the same effect as the preceding. The Court there refused to grant a counter issue of adoption by two co-acceptors, both of whom alleged that their signatures to the bill were forged, upon the bare averment that they had taken no notice of a letter addressed to them by the bank informing them of the existence of the bill before it was due.

In the next case, that of Brown v. The British Linen Company (1 Macph. 793), the Court sustained the relevancy of the charger's averments, and allowed a counter issue of adoption. These averments were that the bill was intimated during its currency to the person alleging forgery, that thereafter his agent, acting under his instructions, called at the bank and examined the bill; that the agent did not state that his employer's signature was forged, but, on the contrary, requested that the bank should send him an intimation when the bill fell due, and, moreover, gave the bank-agent to understand that if the bill was not paid at maturity by Walker (the alleged forger) his client wished it to be renewed.

None of these decisions appear to me to give the least support to the doctrine that mere silence after intimation or even after demand for payment of a forged bill necessarily implies adoption of a bill by one whose subscription to the bill is a forgery; and accordingly the Solicitor-General for Scotland, towards the close of his argument, mainly relied upon the case of Urquhart v. The Bank of Scotland, 9 S. L. R., 508, which was decided by the First Division of the Court in the year 1872.

The facts established by the proof in that case, as they are detailed in the report, were somewhat peculiar. It was proved that the suspender's signature to the bill charged on was forged, but it was also proved that notice of protest of the bill for non-payment was received by him on or about the 2d of August 1871, and that he wrote to the bank on the 23d August that his signature was a forgery, his friend and intimate, the forger, having in the meanwhile absconded. It was proved that the forger was subsequently tracked out and apprehended under a criminal warrant; and it was also proved that the suspender knew, or had good reason to know, that the forger had for some years previously been in the habit of forging his name upon bills, and that in June 1870 he had given the forger money to retire one of those bills, known by him to be forged. It is no doubt the case that the terms of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and of the judgment of the Inner-House, as reported, lay great stress upon the silence of the suspender as warranting their decision, which was against him. But there were obviously many grounds for the decision other than his silence, and I think it must be assumed that the judgment proceeded upon the whole circumstances of the case, and not upon silence alone. All I can say is, that if these grounds were in the view of the Court, the case was, in my opinion, well decided. But if it was intended by the Court to rest their judgment upon the mere silence of the suspender apart from other circumstances, which I greatly doubt, then, whilst agreeing in the result at which their Lordships have arrived, I should be of opinion that the decision was not only unnecessary, but erroneous.

Statute—Construction—38 and 39 Vict. c. clxvii. (North British Railway, Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line Act, 1879), secs. 3 and 6—Commencement of Payment.—The North British Railway, Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line Act, 1879, proceeded on the preamble that it was "expedient that all interest which the Caledonian Railway possess in the Dundee and Arbroath, &c. Railway . . . should be transferred to and vested in the Caledonian Railway Company and the North British Railway Company jointly and equally, and that those companies should have equal rights and powers, and be subject to equal liabilities over and with respect to the said railways."

Accordingly, the Joint Line Act, section 3, enacted that on and after 1st February 1880 (called the "vesting period"), all interest which the Caledonian Railway Company possessed in the said railways should "be transferred to and vested in" the Caledonian and North British Companies, "jointly and in equal proportions" in manner provided by the Act. And section 6 enacted that the consideration for the transfer should be as follows:—" (1) From and after the vesting period the North British Railway Company shall pay to the Caledonian Railway Company half-yearly, on the first day of March and first day of September in each year, a sum equal to one-half of the aggregate of the following half-yearly payments for which the Caledonian Railway Company are now liable in respect of their acquisition of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway (that is to say)." There here followed an enumeration, inter alia, of the various preference and guaranteed dividends which the Caledonian Railway Company had, on its acquisition of the line in 1866, by amalgamation with the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company, undertaken to pay to the Dundee and Arbroath shareholders. These dividends were payable on the same days in March or April and September or October, as the other dividends of the Caledonian Company should be paid for the half year ending 31st January and 31st July previous respectively.

The Caledonian Company claimed under this section a payment on 1st March 1880 equal to one-half of the guaranteed dividends which they fell to pay in March or April 1880 for the half year ending 31st January 1880.

Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the Joint Line Act of 1879, in requiring the half-yearly payments to be made on 1st March and 1st September in each year from 1st February 1880 might be construed as merely fixing generally the terms of payment in each year without reference to the particular term when the payments were to commence, and that as it would be inconsistent with the equality set forth in the preamble to require the North British Company to pay a share of the dividends payable in March or April 1880 for the six months prior to 1st February 1880, during which the Caledonian Company were sole owners of the line, the first payment under the Act did not fall due till 1st September 1880.

Observed (per Lord Chancellor Selborne), the more literal construction of a section of a statute ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the Legislature as apparent by the statute, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention will be better effectuated.

Ld. Chancellor
(Selborne).
Lord Blackburn.
Lord Watson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I cannot say that I think this case free from difficulty. There is always some presumption in favour of the more simple and literal interpretation of the words of a statute or other written instrument, and so much as this must, I think, be conceded to the appellants that the 6th section of the North British Railway (Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line) Act, 1879, does at first sight seem to appoint the 1st day of March 1880 as the day on which the first of a series of equal half-yearly payments is to be made by the North British to the Caledonian Company. This impression is produced not only by the prima facie import of the introductory words of the first clause of the section, but also by the fact that instead of saying that the North British Company shall pay and contribute one-half of the specified half-yearly liabilities of the Caledonian at the times when they respectively become due, the Legislature has said that it shall pay "a sum equal to one-half of the aggregate of these liabilities, and that it shall do so half-yearly on days which confessedly do not correspond with the times at which the liabilities in question will become payable in respect of the same half years by the Caledonian Company, and which must therefore (to some extent) involve payments in advance by the North British Company with benefit of interest to the Caledonian if those payments are not punctually made. On the other hand, it may justly be said that this arrangement would not be substantially at variance with the principle of an equal division of these liabilities between the two companies if the amount to be paid by the North British were in fact equal to one-half of the liabilities of the Caledonian Company in respect of each of the same half years, the Caledonian Company being answerable for the whole amount to the creditors; and that it was not unreasonable that the North British Company should be bound to contribute beforehand their share of this amount, so that the Caledonian Company might always have funds in hand to make payments at the proper time. The more literal construction ought not to prevail if (as the Court below has thought) it is opposed to the intention of the Legislature as apparent by the statute, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention will be better effectuated.

The Court below has founded its judgment mainly upon the intention, unquestionably declared in the preamble of the statute, that the two companies "should have equal rights and powers, and be subject to equal liabilities, over and with respect to the railways" (between the points therein mentioned) "as thereafter provided." If the effect of the appellants' construction of the 6th section would be to disturb, and that of the respondents' construction to preserve the equality contemplated by that preamble, this is an argument of much weight in the respondents' favour.

The appellants have contended that the word "liabilities," as used in the preamble, ought to be understood only of such liabilities of the joint line as might for the first time come into existence after the 1st February 1880 (the "vesting period" when the union of interests between the two companies was to take effect), and not of any which though accruing due after that period might result from obligations previously contracted by the Caledonian Company.

The words "as hereinafter provided" suggest the inquiry, what subsequent provisions as to "liabilities" there are in the Act? As to "rights" and "powers" there are various detailed provisions. As to "liabilities" (if the 6th section were excluded), I find the word mentioned only in sub-section 23 of section 8, where it relates, not to any burdens which were to be borne equally, but to some which were to be thrown solely upon one company in exoneration of the other because arising out of that company's own acts or defaults. The working expenses of the joint line are provided for on the principle of equality by sub-section 24 of section 8 (and perhaps also by section 12), and all expenditure upon capital account for new works is provided for in like manner by sub-section 31 of section 8. Future liabilities having their first inception after the vesting period are, no doubt, in this way covered, but it is rather under the conception of outlay or disbursement than under that of liability or indebtedness.

On the other hand, all the payments of which one moiety is thrown upon the North British Company by section 6 are declared on the face of that section to have been, when the Act passed, "liabilities" of the Caledonian Company ("payments for which the Caledonian Company are now liable") in respect of their acquisition of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway,—being a railway in which the two companies are to have equal rights,—liabilities which, though arising out of obligations previously contracted, and others in force, would accrue and become due periodically in every half year after the vesting period. According to the natural meaning of the words used in the preamble they were "liabilities to be met and provided for after the vesting period quite as much as if they had then first originated, and they were also liabilities "with respect to the said railways between the points aforesaid" because the Caledonian Company had incurred them in respect of their "acquisition of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway." According to the reason of the thing, as apparent from the 2d sub-section of clause 6, and from the admitted operation of the first sub-section of that clause, in every half-year but the first they come within that principle of equality on which the preamble is founded.

I conclude therefore, with the Court below, that we have in that preamble a sufficient guide to the solution of anything that may be ambiguously or imperfectly expressed in the first sub-section of section 6 if one construction would produce or substantially approximate to, and if another would defeat and substantially depart from, equality.

With this guide it seems to me that if we regard the influence of the introductory words "from and after the vesting period" as pervading the whole sentence in which they occur (so as to apply not only to the direction to pay but to the ascertainment of those "half-yearly payments" for which the Caledonian Company were liable, of which one-half was to fall on the North British Company) we shall do less violence to the intention manifested by the Legislature than if we were to confine them to the mere direction for payment, so producing an arbitrary and substantial inequality between the two companies in the first half year, and in that half year only. I read the clause as if it had been expressed thus:—"The company shall pay to the Caledonian Railway Company, half-yearly on the 1st day of March and the 1st day of September in each year, a sum equal to one-half of the aggregate of the following half-yearly payments for which the Caledonian Railway Company are now liable in respect of their acquisition of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway, such liabilities of the Caledonian Railway to be ascertained as from the 1st day of February 1880, and such payments to be made by the North British Railway Company accordingly." So understood, a liability of the Caledonian Company which (though postponed as to the declaration of the state of accounts on which the amount depended and as to the time of payment till a later date) had really and in substance accrued before the 1st February 1880, belongs to a period antecedent to the vesting, and ought to be excluded from the computation. Under the Act of 1866 those liabilities of the Caledonian Company, which are numbered 1, 2, and 3 in the first sub-section of section 6 of the present Act, had really accrued on the 31st January 1880; they were by the express terms of that Act dividends payable as of right for the half year ending on that day out of profits earned during the year then ended, exclusively of all subsequent profits. Every fact on which the right and the liability depended was then fixed and capable of being ascertained. The payment was at that time debitum, if on taking the account the profits earned in the preceding year should be found sufficient to meet it; and the fact that this would not be done till the usual time for the declaration of a dividend in March or April, and that the payment would not be made till afterwards, could not make the liability itself attributable to a half year subsequent to the 1st of February. There is more, I think, than guess or speculation in the argument of the respondents' counsel that the vesting period was fixed for that day (the 1st February), for this very reason, that according to the previous Acts of Parliament that was the day which divided the earnings and the liabilities of one half year from those of another.

This conclusion is fortified rather than otherwise by the nature of the fourth and fifth items in the first sub-section of section 6, one of them representing interest accruing in point of law de die in diem, and the other rent apportionable over the whole period in respect of which it accrued. One of these two items was in the year 1880 properly apportionable between the period before and that after the vesting, so that the mention of a payment to be made on the 1st of March was not as to that particular year nugatory according to the construction which excludes all liabilities properly referable to the time before vesting. It is apparent on the face of the section that the sum payable in any one half year would not necessarily be the same as in every other half year; it would on each half-yearly day be a moiety of such of the liabilities mentioned as were de facto and de jure payable by the Caledonian Company in respect of the current half year, considering the first half year as having its commencement on the 1st February 1880. Independently of the fact that something (though no doubt a small sum) would in fact be payable according to this construction on the 1st of March in the first year, I should think any inference drawn merely or chiefly from the mention of March before September in this contract very precarious. The phraseology of the clause may well be supposed to follow the natural order of the months in the calendar, in view not so much of one particular year as of the long tract of time during which these periodical payments would recur.

Railway Co.

One other argument of the appellants' counsel requires notice—that founded on the words which introduce the 6th section—"The consideration for the transfer of the joint line shall be as follows." If a bargain for payment of a premium or for some other advantage to the Caledonian Company had been recited, or ought to be inferred from this clause itself, or from any other part of the Act, no doubt this might properly be described as a "consideration." But the assumption of half the existing liabilities of the joint line and the repayment of half the cost and value of the existing permanent way, &c., might, with quite equal propriety, also be so described. There is no recital in the Act of any bargain such as the appellants' argument supposes; there is a recital that the liabilities generally were to be borne equally, which is prima facie inconsistent with the supposition that an unequal apportionment of the existing liabilities so as to give some advantage (in one half year only) to the transferring company was part of the consideration. The inferences, therefore, to be drawn from the rest of the Act repel rather than support the view that there was any such bargain. With the language and scheme of this clause itself I have already dealt.

Upon the whole, I am unable to dissent from the decision of the Court of Session, and I move your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I also have come to the conclusion that the interlocutors should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs. The matter turns upon the construction of an Act of Parliament, which is an instrument in writing. I believe there is no dispute at all that in construing an instrument in writing we are to consider what the facts were in respect to which it was framed and the object as appearing from the instrument, and taking all those together we are to see what is the intention appearing from the language when used with reference to such facts and with such an object. The facts here and the object are all apparent without stepping out of the Act itself, and those other Acts, of which, being public Acts, we must take judicial notice.

As appears from the recitals here, and by these Acts, the Caledonian Railway

No. 3. Company were, at the time the Act in question received the royal assent, owners of the line originally made by the Dundee and Arbroath Company, whilst it was a separate and independent undertaking. They were also lessees of a line which originally was made by the Arbroath and Forfar Company when they were an independent company, and which was let in perpetuity at a fixed rent to the Aberdeen Company, from whom the Caledonian Company acquired the lease. The North British Company had also an interest in the Dundee East Station, and an interest in the station at Broughty-Ferry; and the recital in the preamble of the Act is that it is expedient that the whole of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway belonging to the Caledonian Company, and a portion of the Arbroath and Forfar line leased by the Caledonian Company, and the whole of the interest of the North British Railway Company in those two stations, should from a certain day become transferred to and vested in the company (that is, the North British Company), jointly and equally with the Caledonian Company, and that the North British and Caledonian Companies should have equal rights and powers, and be subject to equal liabilities in this which is called the joint line. That is the object of the Act.

Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

In order to understand what follows, I think it is necessary to consider for an instant how and in what manner the Caledonian Company acquired the Dundee and Arbroath Company's line. That line was originally made by the Dundee and Arbroath Company, then an independent company, by means principally of money contributed by shareholders who took shares, and those shareholders in respect of the money they had advanced, which had been thus spent, received, or were entitled to receive, dividends accruing during the half years into which the railway year is divided.

In Scotland, in general, and in the case of all the companies with which we have now to deal in particular, the railway year is divided into halves—one beginning on the 1st of February and ending on the 31st of July, and the other beginning on the 1st of August and ending on the 31st of January. The shareholders of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway Company were entitled therefore at that time to payments which accrued during each half year ending at those days. Perhaps the amounts were not at that date ascertained, but they then became ascertainable, and became debita in presenti to them at the conclusion of each half year—that is to say, upon the 1st of February and the 1st of August in each year. They were not payable then; they were payable at the time when the company should declare its dividends, which time is by the statutes provided to be in the months of March or April, and the months of September or October, and which in practice was almost always about the end of March and end of September. They might for all practical purposes be considered as payable in futuro upon the last day of March and the last day of September; they were therefore debita in presenti solvenda in futuro.

When the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company acquired this line they bought it from the Dundee and Arbroath Company, and the shares of the Dundee and Arbroath line ceased to exist. There were substituted for them shares of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company equivalent in value, or supposed to be equivalent in value, thereto. When the Caledonian Company in their turn acquired the line there were substituted for the Scottish North-Eastern shares, shares of the Caledonian Company, which were equivalent in value, or supposed to be equivalent in value, thereto. Subsequently, by the Caledonian Act for simplifying the accounts and shares, they were enabled to convert these, so that those who represent the original Dundee and Arbroath shareholders, where they held Caledonian preference shares before, now hold Caledonian 4 per cent stock, the dividends on which are equal within 6s. 4d. to the amount which was payable before; and for the contingent dividend, which depended upon whether the Caledonian Company should earn 7 per cent or not, there was substituted an amount of Caledonian deferred ordinary stock No. 1, the dividend on which, I presume, is calculated, but I do not exactly know how, as being equal to the dividend which they would have had in respect of their original contingent dividend. But the stocks into which the original shares were converted now all retain their original feature, that the dividends on them accrue in the half year, and become debita in presenti on the first day of the next half year—the 1st of February for example—but are not payable till the March or April, although practically payable on the last day of March, debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro. These are the three first items in section 6, sub-section 1, which I have to deal with.

Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

But the railway was not built by means of money advanced by the shareholders alone; it was also built in part with borrowed money, for which the Dundee and Arbroath Company, borrowing the money upon mortgage, were liable. This borrowed money was laid out partly in building the line, and partly in buying rolling-stock and other moveable properties. When the Scottish North-Eastern Company acquired the line they took upon themselves the liability to make good this mortgage debt, and they took to themselves absolutely, and I suppose have long ago used up, all the rolling-stock that was there; the balance (after deducting the value of the rolling-stock) was part of the cost of the line, and that the Caledonian Company became liable for, substituting their liability for this mortgage debt for that of the Dundee and Arbroath. The interest on that mortgage debt is the fourth of the items in section 6, sub-section 2, and there it is mentioned that the proportion payable for the rolling stock is to be ascertained by arbitration and to be deducted, and the rest is to be considered part of the liabilities.

Now, though interest, no doubt, accrues de die in diem, yet by convention between the mortgagees and the company it was payable upon the usual terms in Scotland—that is to say, on Whitsunday, the 15th of May, and on Martinmas, the 11th of November; de die in diem that interest was accruing, but it was payable in futuro upon those two days. And it does so chance, and it makes a little complication, that the periods beginning upon the 15th of May and 11th of November are not conterminous with either of the periods of six months into which the railway year is divided. Two months and a-half of the interest, though accruing de die in diem during the railway half year, would not be yet payable on the termination of the railway half year. Those are the first four items, and they are all concerning the Dundee and Arbroath line.

There is a further item which I must notice, not that it was of so much consequence, but that it throws, in my mind, a good deal of light upon the construction of the Act. It is mentioned in the proviso contained in the second sub-section. Besides those moneys which had been furnished by the shareholders and by the mortgagees which the Caledonian Company had not advanced, but the interest upon which they had become bound to pay, the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company had spent, or at least are assumed in this proviso to have spent, money in improving the line and maintaining the line afterwards; that is mentioned in the proviso, which is in the centre of the second sub-section, as part of the cost of the line—moneys which the Caledonian or the Scottish North-Eastern Company had actually disbursed out of pocket, and which had gone towards building this line.

Railway Co. v.
North British

Then comes the fifth item mentioned in the first sub-section of the 6th section, which is as to the Arbroath and Forfar line. It is by no means the whole of that Arbroath and Forfar line that is to be part of the joint line. It is only a very small portion, but still it is a portion. The perpetual lease of the Arbroath and Forfar line had been acquired upon the terms that the Caledonian Company should pay an annual rent, originally in part contingent, but since ascertained and become commuted for a fixed sum, which annual rent is for the whole railway year, beginning to accrue upon the 1st of February, but not being payable until that year expires upon the 1st of February ensuing. Accruing as it does during the whole course of the year, it becomes debitum in presenti and solvendum in presenti at the same instant of time that the latter railway half year expires. The amount of the rent which is apportionable to the portion of line which is to be taken by the joint company is to be determined by arbitration. That is provided for under the 5th head of the 1st sub-section of the 6th section.

Now, taking these facts, which all appear upon the Acts, and which I hope I have succeeded in stating in such a way as to make them intelligible, we come to see how and upon what terms the Legislature has carried out the intention which they declared in their preamble to convey the joint line to the two companies to be held jointly with equal rights and subject to equal liabilities. They have done this in three sections. First, I mention the 4th and 5th, which refer to the interest of the North British Company in the two different portions of the joint line. As to each of those they say they shall be vested jointly in the two companies as part of the joint line upon terms to be fixed by agreement between the two companies, and, failing agreement, by arbitration. So far as the North British Railway Company's interest is concerned, therefore, we have nothing to do with that—it is to be settled elsewhere; but as regards the Caledonian Company's interest the 3d section says:—"On the 1st day of February 1880, in this Act called the vesting period, all interest of whatever nature or kind soever which the Caledonian Company possess or enjoy" in the Dundee and Arbroath Railway "shall by force and virtue of this Act be transferred to and vested in the Caledonian Railway Company and North British Railway Company jointly and in equal proportions in manner provided by this Act," and "the manner provided by this Act" is that specified in section 6, upon the meaning of which the controversy arises. I think, as I said before, the facts I have mentioned are all material to the construction of that section.

Now, I believe there is not much doubt about the general principle. Lord Wensleydale used to enunciate (I have heard him many and many a time)—that which he called the golden rule for construing all written engagements. I find that he stated it very clearly and accurately in Gray and Pearson (6 H. L. Cas. at p. 106), in the following terms:—"I have been long and deeply impressed with the wisdom of the rule, now I believe universally adopted at least in the Courts of Law in Westminster Hall, that in construing wills, and indeed statutes and all written instruments, the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified so as to avoid that absurdity and inconsistency, but no further." No. 3.

Feb. 17, 1881.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

I agree in that completely, but unfortunately in the cases in which there is real difficulty it does not help us much, because the cases in which there is real difficulty are those in which there is a controversy as to what the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words used with reference to the subject-matter is. To one mind it may appear that the most that can be said is, that the sense may be what is contended by the one side, and that the inconsistency and repugnancy is very great, that you should make a great stretch to avoid such absurdity, and that what is required to avoid it is a very little stretch or none at all. To another mind it may appear that the meaning of the words is perfectly clear, that they can bear no other meaning at all, and that to substitute any other meaning would be not to interpret the words used, but to make an instrument for the parties, and that the supposed inconsistency or repugnancy is perhaps a hardship—a thing which perhaps it would have been wiser to have avoided, but which we have no power to deal with. This present case is about as good an illustration of that as can very well be. The Court below did not cite what Lord Wensleydale said; perhaps as they were Scotch lawyers, not English ones, they had never heard of it; but the Lord President said, after commenting upon the clause, and saying what he thought of it—"There is nothing in this clause, I think, that is fairly susceptible of that construction. At the very best, the argument could go no further, I think, than this, that the words which I have cited are ambiguous—that it may be intended that there should be such an anomalous thing as this" (that is, what Lord Wensleydale would call an inconsistency), "and it may not. It may be merely intended to express that these are to be the days of payment in each year, but not that it is to commence on the 1st day of March 1880; and if there be ambiguity at all—if there be room for two constructions—then I apprehend we must appeal to the whole scope and purpose of the Act." So that, in the Lord President's view of the words of this Act (which I shall comment upon myself presently), Lord Wensleydale's rule would be in favour of the North British Railway Company.

Lord Mure takes quite the opposite view of it. He says in effect and substance that the words are quite clear, and that they do mean, as the Caledonian Company says, that there shall be a payment made upon the 1st of March 1880, and that that may be a harsh bargain,—he calls it an inequitable bargain. I am inclined to agree with what the learned counsel for the appellants said, that this last is not a correct phrase: a bargain is a bargain. If a man chooses to bargain that he will pay ten times the value of a thing I do not think you have, in the absence of undue influence, any right to cut down the price to the tenth part of what was agreed upon. But although this may be a harsh bargain (Lord Mure urges) he saw no reason for interfering with it; he says that the plain sense of the words is what the Caledonian Company contend, and that there is no such repugnancy or inconsistency as to lead one to modify them. If Lord Mure's view of the words is right, Lord Wensleydale's rule would be altogether in favour of the Caledonian Company.

The 6th section begins thus: After saying "the consideration for the transfer of the joint line shall be as follows,"—it says, "from and after the vesting period." Pausing here for a moment, the vesting period is the 1st of February 1880, and the counsel for the appellants argued—put in "the 1st of February 1880" instead of "the vesting period" and it will read "from and after the 1st of February 1880." Now, that, I do not think, was quite right. I think if the words had been the 1st of February that the argument on behalf of the respondents would have been that they put in that date because it was the vesting period, and that therefore it should be read as if the vesting period had been mentioned, and not the particular day. That argument is not needed, for the Legislature expressly said "from and after the vesting period the company" (that is, the North British Company) "shall pay to the Caledonian Company half-yearly on the 1st day of March and on the 1st day of September in each year a sum equal to one-half of the aggregate of the following half-yearly payments for which the Caledonian Railway Company are now liable in respect of their acquisition of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway—that is to say,"—then it mentions the four first items I have already referred to.

Railway Co. v.

Now, what I have to say here is, that I think the words "now liable" require to be expanded or explained, for I think a great deal of the argument of the appellants was rested upon what seemed to me a fallacy in that respect. The Legislature is speaking on the 21st of July 1879, a few days before the railway half year (which would terminate upon the last day of July of that year) expired. At that time, in the sense of being liable to make a present payment, the Caledonian Company were liable for nothing. There had accrued a certain part of the dividends during the half year which would terminate at the end of July. The greater part of those had accrued at that time, a small portion, ten days, had yet to accrue, and upon the 1st day of August then ensuing the company would become liable as debitum in presenti for the amount of those dividends, and upon the last day of September they would become liable to make payment in presenti of that money, so that both that portion which had accrued in respect of that half year and that which still had to accrue would become payable long before the vesting period. The interest upon the fourth item—the mortgage money—had been paid up to the 15th of May. At this time two months and a small portion of the next ensuing six months had expired, and during that time interest accruing de die in diem had accrued against the Caledonian Company, and when the 11th of November came afterwards interest would have accrued for the remaining three months and something more than a half, and then, and not until then, upon the 11th of November 1879, interest upon the mortgage money would be payable.

But at the time when the Legislature was speaking neither of these were liabilities in any sense; and the same remark applies exactly to the fifth head, viz. that portion of the rent of the Arbroath and Forfar Railway which was in respect of that portion of the line which was to be part of the joint line. The rent was accruing from the 1st of February 1879, and it would all become due upon the 1st of February 1880, but no portion of that rent was on 21st July 1879 either due or payable. Therefore the Caledonian Company were liable only in this sense, that under statutory engagements the Caledonian Company would be liable for them as debts when they had accrued, and would be liable to pay them when the period for payment had arrived; some of them would have accrued and would be payable before the 1st of February; others would have accrued on or before the 1st of February 1880, and would not be payable till afterwards; others would accrue after the 1st February 1880, and be payable afterwards. Now, it is with this view that I mention it; the words in my view require not to be altered but to be expanded and explained. When that is done I think the rest of the 6th section is intelligible, and can be construed readily.

I may say that the whole of the 6th section must be taken together; it is divided into the first sub-section and the second sub-section; but we must not construe the first sub-section until we have mastered and understood the meaning of the second—we must not construe the second sub-section until we have mastered and understood the meaning of the first; and then the two must be taken together. In explaining your views you take first the second or the first as seems convenient. I prefer to take the second sub-section first, to explain what it means. It begins,—“On the vesting period, or as soon thereafter as the amount shall be fixed or determined, as hereinafter provided, the company, ‘that is, the North British Company,’ shall pay to the Caledonian Railway Company a capital sum equal to one-half of the value of the joint line by this Act transferred to the two companies, subject to the half-yearly payments hereinbefore stipulated.” They therefore took the value of the line as the value of the line subject to these half-yearly payments. Strictly it was not subject to them. The line had before it had been acquired by the Scottish North-Eastern Company been liable for them. As a matter of fact the Caledonian Company became liable for them, and were to keep down the interest on them, so that they no longer, strictly speaking, were burdens upon the Dundee and Arbroath Railway Company. But it is plain the Legislature are here dealing with them as if they were burdens.

Then comes the proviso—“Provided that such sum shall in no case be less than one-half of the principal sums expended on capital account on the joint line by the Aberdeen Railway Company, the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company, and the Caledonian Railway Company respectively, or any of them previously to such payment, as the amount of such value shall be fixed by agreement between the two companies, or determined by arbitration.” I point that out because, although I suppose probably the value would be larger than that cost, and that proviso would not come into play, it is plain enough that that part of the consideration is to be the transfer of the actual fixed line, the real property of the line, on payment of the value, as it might be, never to be less than the money actually expended upon it, and subject to the payments for those various charges, which were in reality payments of interest in respect of money which had been expended upon the line, but which capital sum had not been paid by the Caledonian Company, the Caledonian Company merely becoming liable, in the sense I have already explained, to pay interest for those different sums. And that does seem to me to be pretty strong to shew that when the payment was to be the value of the line as it was upon the 1st of February, subject to those half-yearly payments, it meant the value of the line as it was upon the 1st of February, subject to these half-yearly payments which would both accrue and become payable after that date, and not, as the Caledonian Company contend, subject to all such half-yearly payments which, though they had accrued as a debitum before the vesting period, had not been paid before that.

I think that view is fortified by what follows, namely, that “the company shall also pay interest to the Caledonian Railway Company on the said capital sum at the rate of five per cent per annum from the vesting period till paid”—interest upon the money they had actually disbursed and spent if the proviso comes into operation and is to run from the 1st of February. Payments to keep down the interest upon money which had been previously spent surely, one would say, were payments to keep down that which had accrued as well as become payable after the 1st of February. I think that is enough to make me say that the construction which the Caledonian Company contend for, that the payments shall include not only those which had accrued subsequently to the 1st of February 1880, but also those payments which had accrued previously to the 1st of February 1880, but were not, in fact, payable till afterwards, is an inconsistency with the general object.

Now, let us see, that being so, and that being, as it strikes me, upon that view a repugnancy and inconsistency with the general scheme, are the words so strong that one must say that they must not be, as Lord Wensleydale would say, modified to that extent necessary to avoid it? The first point is, that the payments shall be made half-yearly on the 1st of March and the 1st of September in each year. Now, I agree with the conclusion come to by the Lord President, that the most natural meaning of that is, not that the first payment shall be upon the 1st of March 1880, but that the 1st of March and the 1st of September are the two days in the year upon which such payments as are to be made at all shall be made,—those shall be the termly days upon which the payments shall fall due and become payable hereafter after the bargain is completed. Lord Deas says, in Scottish leases the first term is generally expressed thus—"beginning the first payment" on a particular day. If the Legislature had said the first payment to be on the 1st of March 1880 I should have understood it.

But then the section goes on to say "for which the Caledonian Company is now liable." I have already explained my view upon that point, and, substituting for those words the detailed explanation I have given, it does seem to me that it bears the meaning that there are these three sums which are both accruing and payable before the vesting period, such as the interest payable in November 1879 and the dividends payable in September 1879; no one could contend that the North British Railway is to pay any part of that. As regards that portion which is both accruing in the period subsequent to 1st February 1880 and payable afterwards, no one could dispute that the North British Company were to pay half of that; the question is whether the words are so clear as to shew that the Caledonian Company is to receive, and the North British Company to pay, half of that interest which the Caledonian Company had become bound to keep down, which interest had accrued in respect of the period before the vesting period, though not payable till after. I have, perhaps, worked myself into the condition of thinking it clearer than it really is, but my feeling is that the fair and ordinary grammatical meaning of the words would be in favour of the North British Company. I am quite content to say that at least, as the Lord President says, it is ambiguous, and might bear one meaning or the other. The passages I have pointed out in the second sub-section as to the value, and the recital in the earlier part that they are to be on equal terms, all strongly lead me to the conclusion that there is a repugnancy and inconsistency with the general object of the scheme of the Legislature in saying that they should include those; and consequently, taking Lord Wensleydale's golden rule which I have already quoted, and applying it literally to that, I think that the words, if they do not actually mean what the North British Company say, at least are so near it that it is no strain upon them to say that they do mean what the North British Company say they do, and that to put the other construction upon them would produce such a manifest inconsistency with the general scheme of the Act that the North British construction should be adopted. That is, in substance, the view which the majority of the Court of Session have adopted, and I think the decree ought to be affirmed, and, of course, affirmed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the controversy between these two companies turns upon a very narrow point, and appears to me to be attended with considerable difficulty. But I have come to be of opinion that, taking into account the scope and object of the other clauses of the Act of 1879, the construction of sub-section 1 of section 6 which has been adopted by the majority of the Judges in the Court below is the right one.

Feb. 17, 1881.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

The leading purpose of the Act was to vest in the appellants and respondents jointly, and in equal proportions, "on and after the 1st day of February 1880, therein termed the vesting period—(1) The Dundee and Arbroath Railway, and (2) a part of the Arbroath and Forfar Railway." These were originally separate undertakings, but had been amalgamated with and vested in the Caledonian Railway Company under an Act of 1866, and the terms of the preamble shew that, except in so far as otherwise provided, the two companies were "to have equal rights and power, and be subject to equal liabilities, over and with respect" to the joint lines.

By the terms of the statutory arrangement under which the Dundee and Arbroath Railway Company was absorbed in the undertaking of the Caledonian Company, the preference and ordinary stocks of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway were severally converted into Caledonian Railway Company's four per cent consolidated guaranteed stock, and a certain amount of Caledonian Railway Company deferred ordinary stock No. 1 was allotted to the holders of Dundee and Arbroath ordinary stock. The appellants were accordingly liable to pay in perpetuity a half-yearly dividend at the rate of four per cent per annum upon these converted stocks, and a contingent dividend upon the deferred ordinary stock No. 1, besides which they were liable to pay interest at five per cent on £81,619, 6s. 6d., being the amount of mortgage and other debts affecting the Dundee and Arbroath Railway.

The Arbroath and Forfar Railway was in the year 1846 transferred to the Aberdeen Railway Company under a perpetual statutory lease by which the original shareholders of the line leased became entitled to a fixed yearly rent, together with a share of profits above a certain limit which might be earned by the lessors. This contingent share of profits was afterwards commuted for a fixed annual payment, and the appellants' company, prior to the Act of 1879, were owners of the Arbroath and Forfar line as part of their general undertaking, and were consequently liable to pay the foresaid annual rent plus the commuted amount of contingent profits.

The half-yearly dividends upon the stocks of the appellants' company are derived from profits earned during the six months respectively preceding the 31st day of January and the 31st day of July in each year. And the dividends upon the stocks assigned to the Dundee and Arbroath shareholders accruing during these periods are by statute made payable "on the same days in the months of March or April and September or October as the other preference and ordinary dividends of the company shall be payable." Interest upon the mortgage and other debts affecting the Dundee and Arbroath Railway is payable half-yearly at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas (15th May and 11th November) in each year, whilst the rent falling due in respect of the Arbroath and Forfar Railway is payable yearly on the 1st day of February.

It appears to me to be clear that it was not intended by the framers of the Act of 1879 that the Dundee and Arbroath Railway and the part in question of the Arbroath and Forfar Railway should vest in the appellants and respondents, freed of all encumbrances, but, on the contrary, that it was to become vested in them jointly, subject to those perpetual termly payments of dividends, interest, and rents which the Caledonian Company was under obligation to make to original shareholders and creditors of these undertakings or their successors. That obligation was in substance a statutory condition attaching to the right of the appellants' company as owners and occupants of these two railways.

Railway Co. v.

Had these termly payments been made specific charges upon the railways vested in the two companies by the Act of 1879, and the revenues thence arising (as in the case of moneys heritably secured on land), the North British Company would have become liable in respect of their joint ownership to pay one-half of the dividends, interests, and rents accruing after the vesting period without any statutory provision to that effect. But the shareholders and creditors of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway and the shareholders of the Arbroath and Forfar line—although they might still have a lien over what had once been their own undertakings—had become either shareholders or creditors of the Caledonian Company, and were entitled to payment of their dividends, interest, and rents out of the revenues of that company. It formed no part of the scheme of the Act of 1879 to alter the rights of these parties or to disturb their position as shareholders and creditors of the Caledonian Company; and it was therefore necessary to make some provision as to the manner in which the North British Company was to bear its fair and equal proportion of the termly payments made by the Caledonian Company in so far as these accrued after the vesting period. That section 6, sub-section 1, of the Act was, inter alia, designed to meet that necessity does not appear to me to admit of serious dispute. The respondents maintain that it was intended to accomplish that object and nothing more; but the appellants contend that it was thereby intended to make the North British Company not only liable for dividends and rents accruing after that company became a joint owner, but for a half year's dividend which accrued before the vesting period, whilst the appellants' company had the sole property and possession of the railways falling within the vesting clause of the Act.

Section 6, sub-section 1, enacts that "from and after the vesting period the company" (that is, the North British Company) "shall pay to the Caledonian Railway Company half-yearly on the 1st day of March and 1st day of September in each year a sum equal to one-half of the aggregate of the following half-yearly payments for which the Caledonian Company are now liable;" and then follows a specification of the several dividends, interest, and rent already mentioned—the sum payable in the case of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway, being a proportion of the total amount of rent and commuted profits corresponding to the portion of that railway by the Act transferred to the two companies.

The words of the statute which I have just quoted do not appear to me to fix conclusively that the respondents are to pay to the appellants on the 1st of March 1880, one month after the vesting period, half-yearly dividends which had accrued before that period, and which were payable in respect of the property and use of the Caledonian Company alone. At the time when the Act received the royal assent the dividend paid by the Caledonian Company in September or October 1879 had not yet accrued, and therefore the expression "half-yearly payments for which the Caledonian Railway Company are now liable" must refer to dividends to accrue at some future time, and not necessarily to dividends accruing before the vesting period; and the words "half-yearly on the 1st day of March and 1st day of September in each year" do not, in my opinion, necessarily imply that full payments shall be made at both of these terms in the first year subsequent to the vesting period. They would be equally appropriate as designating the terms of payment throughout the course of years which was to follow the vesting period if it had been expressly enacted in another clause that the North British Company was not to be liable except for one-half of the dividends, rents, and interest accruing after the vesting period. In that case they would aptly express the rule that one-half of such of the yearly dividends which had accrued after the vesting period and previously to one or other of those terms should be paid at such term by the North British Company. And they must, in my opinion, receive that interpretation if it be a matter of fair implication from the other enactments of the statute that the North British Company was merely to bear its just share as joint owner of dividends accruing after vesting, and was not to pay by way of premium to the Caledonian Company half of a six months' dividend which accrued whilst that company had still the sole and exclusive possession of the joint railways.

The controversy between the parties appears to me to turn upon this—whether the words "the following half-yearly payments," &c., are to be held as referring to payments "accruing" after the vesting period, or to payments which have accrued before but are not exigible until after that period. I prefer the first of these alternatives, because section 6, sub-section 1, was necessary in order to give effect to that which the Act did certainly contemplate, viz., that after the railways became joint property the North British Company should bear an equal share of the termly payments falling to be made to the original owners and creditors of the railways held by them and the Caledonian Company as a condition of their joint occupancy and use of these railways, and because I cannot discern within the four corners of the Act any indication of an intention to give the appellants a premium in the shape of a moiety of sums which they were bound to pay for their own use of the joint railways.

I therefore agree with your Lordships in thinking that the judgment appealed against ought to be affirmed.

Sale—Condition precedent—Implement rendered impossible by vendee.—Where in a contract of sale there is a condition precedent, which the vendor has been prevented from fulfilling through the fault of the vendee, the condition is held to have been satisfied.

A contract to furnish B with a steam navvy of novel construction, which B was to accept if on trial it fulfilled the condition of excavating 350 cubic yards per day of ten hours "on a properly opened up face" at the C railway cutting. The C cutting was not opened for several months after the expected time, and the machine was in the meanwhile tried at another cutting, where it broke down. It was altered, repaired, and strengthened, and removed to the C cutting where it was again tried, but not on a face properly opened up, and again broke down, and B refused to give it any farther trial. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that B having failed to give a proper opportunity for the stipulated test A was entitled to decree against him for the price of the machine.

Appeal—Competency—Cause originating in Sheriff Court—Findings of fact—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV., c. 120), sec. 40.—In appeals falling within the scope of the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, the House of Lords has no concern with the proof led in the Sheriff Court. Where it can be shewn that the Court of Session has not exhausted the issue before it, and that there are material questions of fact left undetermined, a remit will be made to the Court below to pronounce findings upon these questions, but the omission can only be shewn by reference to the judgment and record and not to the proof. The House of Lords will not remit on matters of fact which are not plainly set forth on record.

The defender appealed.

The interlocutor appealed against was as follows:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff of date 2d December 1879: (1) Find that the pursuers undertook to supply and the defender undertook to purchase and pay £1115 for a steam-digging machine, in terms of the letters dated respectively 21st and 22d September 1876: (2) Find that it was a condition of the said contract that the defender should not be bound to accept and pay for the said machine if it should fall short of digging and filling into waggons 350 cubic yards of the clay or other soft substance within a day of ten hours in a certain railway cutting which the defender was to make, called the Carfin cutting, after it was fairly tried on a properly opened up face: (3) Find that it was impossible that the machine should have the stipulated fair trial unless the defender provided a properly opened up face at the said Carfin cutting: (4) Find that the defender failed to provide such properly opened up face, notwithstanding repeated demands on the part of the pursuers, and thus prevented the machine from being tested in the manner provided by the contract: (5) Find that the defender has failed to prove that the pursuers agreed to substitute for the Carfin cutting any other cutting as the place for the trial of the said machine: Therefore repel the defences, and decern against the defender to pay to the pursuers the sum of £1115, with the interest prayed for, in terms of the petition: (6) Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in both Courts, but subject to deduction of the expense of the conjunct probation, which was incompetent, and ought not to have been admitted, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account or accounts of said expenses, and to report."

A petition was lodged by the respondents against the competency of the appeal, in respect that the case was one which had commenced and in which the proof had been led in the Sheriff Court, and that the findings of the First Division appealed against being findings of fact and not of law the appeal was excluded by the Judicature Act, 1825, section 40.*

* Which enacted that where in causes commencing in any of the inferior Courts "matter of fact shall be disputed, and a proof shall be allowed and taken according to the present practice, the Court of Session shall, in reviewing the judgment proceeding on such proof, distinctly specify in their interlocutors the several facts material to the case which they find to be established by the proof, and express how far their judgment proceeds on the matter of fact so found, or on matter of law, and the several points of law which they mean to decide; and the judgment in the cause then pronounced shall be subject to appeal to the House of Lords in so far only as the same depends on or is affected by matter of law, but shall, in so far as relates to the facts, be held to have the force and effect of a special verdict of a jury, finally and conclusively fixing the several facts specified in the interlocutor."

This petition was, however, abandoned at the bar by the respondents on the ground that they could not maintain that the findings were of fact only and did not involve any question of law. No. 4.

The appellant contended that even if it were taken as an incontestible fact on the findings of the Court below, that a properly opened up face had not been afforded by him at Carfin for the trial of the machine in September 1877, he was not then bound to give one. Having regard to the trial at Gariongill in the earlier part of the year under favourable circumstances, and to the total break down of the machine there, and to its again breaking down a day or two after it was set to work at Carfin, he was entitled to take the position that the machine was so manifestly defective that he was not bound to waste more time and expense in preparing a face to give it the stipulated trial. The evidence led proved without farther testing that the machine could not conform to the contract. Farther there was not and could not be, consistently with the evidence, any finding that the machine was conform to contract, which was essential to the respondents' success. On these grounds he asked that the case should be remitted to the Court below to pronounce findings on these matters of fact. Mar. 7, 1881.
Mackay v.
Dick & Stevenson.

The respondents maintained that the appellant had not raised on record the issue that he was relieved from complying with the stipulation that he should afford a properly opened up face at Carfin to test the machine, in consequence of its insufficiency having been conclusively demonstrated by previous trials, and that he was therefore not entitled to have the remit which he craved. On the case, so far as it was competently before the House, the appellant had failed to shew that the legal conclusion drawn from the facts by the Court below was wrong, or that any fact material to the legal result remained undisposed of. 2

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, this is an appeal against an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session, pronounced in reviewing the judgment of the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, proceeding on proof taken on a record made up in the Sheriff Court.

The Court of Session, in reviewing the judgment, had full power to find the facts on the proof, and to determine the law also. But the Legislature have, by the Judicature Act of Scotland, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, provided that "When in causes commenced in any of the Courts of the Sheriffs, . . . or other Courts, matters of fact shall be disputed, and a proof shall be allowed and taken according to the present practice, the Court of Session shall, in reviewing the judgment proceeding on such proof, distinctly specify in their interlocutor the several facts material to the case which they find to be established by the proof, and express how far their judgment proceeds on the matter of fact so found, or on matter of law, and the several points of law which they mean to decide; and the judgment on the cause thus pronounced shall be subject to appeal to the House of Lords in so far only as the same depends on or is affected by matter of law, but shall, in so far as relates to the facts, be held to have the force and effect of a special verdict of a jury, finally and conclusively fixing the several facts specified in the interlocutor."

Mackay v.
Dick & Stevenson.

The old rules of pleading in force in England at that time were founded on the strictest logic, often carried to an extreme which, when the pleadings were not managed by very skilful hands, worked injustice, but always founded on a principle. And those which regulated special verdicts, to which the Legislature here refers, were no exception. They are very accurately and fully stated by Chief Baron Comyns in his Digest, title Pleader. The following, I think, bear on the question what the Legislature intended :—"The jury may find by their verdict all things given in evidence, if it be not contrary to the evidence or the admission of the parties"—Sec. 4. "They cannot find a matter contrary to the / record, and if they do, the verdict is void as to that"—Sec. 16. "So the jury ought not to inquire of a thing which is agreed by the parties to the issue"—Sec. 17. "So the jury cannot find matter out of the issue, . . . though the matter out of the issue destroy the plaintiff's title"—Sec. 18.

The reason of this last rule, which at first glance may seem harsh, is that the defendant ought to have obtained in proper time leave to amend his pleadings, and not to rely on getting the jury to find on the evidence something never alleged by him, and which the plaintiff was not called upon to be prepared to contest.

Whether we take these rules of English pleading as our guide, or the rules of sense and logic on which they are founded, it seems to me clear that the Court of Session need not in their interlocutor notice anything on which the parties are agreed. It may be convenient to do so in order to make the other findings clear, but it cannot be necessary. And they ought not to find anything, even if destructive of the plaintiff's title, if it is not included in the issues joined ; if it is necessary for the purposes of justice they may, I suppose, allow an amendment, and remit the amended issue to the Court below for further proof, or dispose of it on the proof already given, as justice may require ; but they ought not to find it in their interlocutor, on the record as it stands ; and no complaint can be made in this House against them for not doing what they ought not to have done. This view of the statute of Geo. 4 renders it important to see what the record or issue is.

I have had the advantage of perusing the opinion of my noble and learned friend who is to follow me (Lord Watson), and as I agree entirely in all he says on this subject, I shall not repeat it.

The interlocutor finds that the contract was in terms of the two letters, 21st and 22d September 1876. It is a question of law what the effect of those letters was. I do not feel much doubt about that. The pursuers were to supply a machine capable of digging and filling into waggons at least 350 cubic yards of clay in a day. It was to be brought to the defender's cutting at Carfin, erected, and tested before February 1877. Both agreed that the event of the testing was to be conclusive. If the machine did not answer the test the pursuers were to remove it before the end of February ; if it did answer the test the defender was to keep it and pay the agreed price.

I think I may safely say, as a general rule, that where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done, which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing, though there may be no express words to that effect. What is the part of each must depend on circumstances. In a very early case in England, in the Year Book of 9th Edward IV., Easter Term, 4 A, where the defendant was sued on an obligation, the condition of which was that, if the great bell of Mildenhall should be brought, at the cost of the men of Mildenhall, to the house of the defendant in Norwich, and there weighed and put in the fire in the presence of the men of Mildenhall, and the defendant made a tenor of it to agree with the other bells of Mildenhall, the obligation should be void, Choke, then Chief Justice, and Littleton and Moile, then Judges, held that a plea by the defendant that the bell was not weighed nor put in the fire was bad, for the defendant, being a brazier, it was his part to weigh it and put it in the fire; Needham, who was the fourth Judge, thought that the weighing of the bell required no particular skill, and might as well have been done by the men of Mildenhall or those they employed as by the defendant. But he said that the putting it into the fire was the part of the artificer. And as I understand it, for the rest of the report is not very clear, a further point was mooted, and the Serjeants agreed that if the defendant had put the bell in the fire without seeing it weighed, he would have waived that which was but an incident, and been as much bound to fulfil that which was the substance of the contract, viz., to make a proper tenor, as if he had had it weighed. I mention this old case, decided in 1469, because it is on it that the different digests laying down the principle are all founded, and because I think it is obvious good sense and justice. Now, applying this principle to the present case, both agree that the machine shall be tested at Carfin, and therefore the pursuers agreed that they would bring the machine to the Carfin cutting, and there erect it on the defender's land, and there do their part in working it till there had been a fair test; and the defender agreed that he would do his part; and even if there had been no express mention in the letters of a properly prepared face, the nature of the thing shews that he agreed to let the pursuers have access to a part of the cutting, put by the defender in such a condition that the machine could be fairly tested by working at it, and to assist in working it there until there had been a fair test. If, then, the averments on the record had been that, before the end of March 1877, the machine had been brought to Carfin cutting and there delivered to the defender, who required the pursuers to remove it, and it was still in his possession there, I think there could be no doubt that the four first findings in the interlocutor put a proper construction on the contract, which, being a matter of law, your Lordships are entitled to inquire into, and that, if they find the facts truly, into which your Lordships have no right to inquire, it would follow in point of law that the defender, having had the machine delivered to him, was by his contract to keep it, unless on a fair test according to the contract it failed to do the stipulated quantity of work, in which case he would be entitled to call on the pursuers to remove it. And if by his own default he can now never be in a position to call upon the pursuers to take back the machine, on the ground that the test had not been satisfied, he must, as far as regards that, keep, and consequently pay for it.

But the time when the machine was brought to Carfin and the defender refused a further trial was long after February 1877—it was in September and October 1878. Unless both parties had agreed to enlarge the time, the original bargain would have come to an end by efflux of time in 1877.

But it is agreed on the record that the time was enlarged, and the bargain in all other respects still in force at least as late as July 1877, and the Court of Session was not called upon to repeat in the interlocutor what was agreed on the record by both parties. There is a controversy on the record as to the terms on which the time was enlarged ; and the question raised on that, which is a question of fact, is disposed of by the last finding in the interlocutor, into the accuracy of which, it being a finding of fact, your Lordships are not entitled to inquire.

It was, however, argued at your Lordships' bar that there was another ground of defence appearing on the evidence. I think I state fairly, and as favourably to the defender as I can, the argument thus :—

It was said that the repeated failures of the machine between July 1877 and October 1878, though, not being on the stipulated place and in the stipulated manner, they were not the test, nevertheless, coupled with the other evidence, shewed that the machine was not such as could possibly in substance satisfy the contract; and that therefore the defender was justified, or at least excused, in refusing to incur further expense and trouble in putting in force a test which could not possibly turn out favourably to the pursuers, and that he was entitled to throw the machine back on the pursuers' hands, not on account of the terms of the bargain, but on the general ground that a purchaser is entitled to return a thing which has been delivered to him in fulfilment of a contract, and to demand back the price if paid, or refuse payment if not yet paid, if the thing delivered is not in substance the thing contracted for, on the principle of the civil law expressed in the Digest, lib. 18, title 4 : "Si æs pro auro veneat non valet."

I do not think it desirable to express an opinion on a point which it is not necessary now to discuss. I will, therefore, only say that the view I took of the law on this point in 1867 is expressed in a judgment of the Queen's Bench, which I delivered in Kennedy v. Panama Mail Company.¹ The other Judges of that Court adopted that exposition of the law, and I have not yet seen any reason to change my opinion. But I agree that if such a defence had been raised on the record in this case, the Court of Session ought, in their interlocutor, to have found how much, if any, of the allegations were proved in fact. It is because, having carefully read the record, and having had the advantage of reading my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson's) observations on the record, that I am clearly of opinion that no such defence was raised on the record, and that I think the Court of Session were not bound in their interlocutor to deal with it, even if it was made on the argument before them, which I think it was not.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, this appeal is brought against a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session, by which the appellant, John Mackay, railway contractor, Wishaw, has been decerned to make payment to the respondents, who are a firm of engineers in Airdrie, of the sum of £1115 sterling, being the price of a patent steam-excavating machine, manufactured and supplied by them to the appellant, as in implement of a written contract of sale entered into between the parties in the month of September 1876.

The action was raised and a proof was allowed and taken in the Sheriff Court ; and it became the duty of the Court of Session, in reviewing the judgments of the Sheriffs proceeding on that proof, to specify in their interlocutor, as required by sec. 40 of the Scotch Judicature Act (6 Geo. IV., c. 120), the several facts material to the case which they found to be established by the proof, and to express how far their judgment proceeded on the matter of fact so found, or on matter of law, and the several points of law which they meant to decide.

Mackay v.
Dick & Stevenson.

The specific findings upon which the decerniture against the appellant is rested in the judgment under appeal are as follows:—(Reads the interlocutor of the Court below.)¹

In so far as these findings consist of matters of fact, the review of this House is excluded by the clause of the Judicature Act already referred to.²

The first two findings relate exclusively to the constitution and construction of the written contract upon which the action is laid, and are, therefore, matters of law. No appeal has been taken against these findings, and the appellant must be held to admit that they are sound. But the appellant is not thereby precluded from founding upon other conditions of the contract, or upon other views of the contract, so long as these do not involve the negation of what is affirmed by the findings in question.

In my opinion the third and fourth findings involve law as well as fact, in so far as they assume or imply that the appellant was, by the conditions of the contract, bound to provide the “properly opened up face” on which the machine was to be tried. So far as it is thereby found that, of the two contracting parties, the appellant alone had it in his power to provide a properly opened up face in the Carfin cutting, and that the appellant did not provide such face, notwithstanding repeated demands on the part of the respondents, nothing appears to me to be involved except matter of fact.

The fifth finding appears to me to be one of fact only.

The appellant challenges the interlocutor under appeal upon two grounds. First of all, he maintains that, in respect there is no finding to the effect that the digging machine was conform to contract, the facts as found are insufficient to sustain a decree for the contract price. Alternatively he asserts that there were important issues of fact raised by him in the Court below, to which his proof was directed, but which the Court has not disposed of; and he contends that, assuming the facts already found to warrant the decree appealed against, he will, upon these issues being decided in his favour, be entitled to decree of absolvitor. And it was contended that the House ought, with a view to the final disposal of the case, to remit to the First Division of the Court to pronounce findings upon these matters of fact.

In order to a due understanding of the interlocutor under appeal, and of the appellant's contention, it is necessary to refer to the closed record, which is the issue to which the proof of the parties was directed, and to which the findings of the Court apply.

The respondents, in their condescendence (articles 1 and 2), set forth the two letters of the 21st and 22d of September 1876, which have been held to constitute the contract. The first in date bears to be a confirmation by the respondents of a verbal arrangement between one of their partners and the appellant. The letter of the 22d of September, which is a confirmation by the appellant of that of the preceding day, recapitulates the terms of the agreement in language somewhat different, but having, for all practical purposes, the same meaning.

Mackay v.
Dick & Stevenson.

The parties are agreed upon the record as to the following facts :—(1) That the machine was not ready, and was not sent to Carfin cutting before or during February 1877 ; (2) that it was afterwards sent to Gariongill cutting, and remained there from July 1877 till May 1878 ; and (3) that thereafter, certain repairs and alterations having been made upon it, the machine was sent to Carfin cutting about the middle of the month of September 1878, where it still remained at the time the action was raised. They are also agreed that from July 1877 to August 1878 the appellant was unable to proceed with his work at the Carfin cutting owing to a change of the plans of the railway company.

The parties join issue, however, upon the points following :—(1) The appellant alleges, but the respondents deny, that he was in a position to give a proper working face for testing the machine at Carfin cutting in February 1877 ; (2) the respondents state that the machine was sent to and kept at Gariongill cutting merely for the purpose of experiment with a view to its being improved and strengthened before it was tested at Carfin, whereas the appellant avers (Ans. to Cond. 5) that the parties “agreed that the machine instead of being tested at the Carfin cutting should be tried at the Gariongill cutting.”

The respondents (Cond. 7) aver in substance that the machine was sent to Carfin in order to its being subjected to the contract test,—that a proper working face was not provided by the appellant whilst the machine was at work there,—that the machine could not in consequence be fairly tried, and that “the machine was fit for the contemplated work.” The appellant (Ans. Cond. 7) admits that, “on request of the respondents,” he “permitted them to make a further trial of the machine ; a suitable face then was ready for trial on 3d August 1878. In consenting to a further trial at Carfin, the defender informed the pursuers that, if the machine again broke down it would have to be removed, so as not to interfere with the progress of the cutting, which had to be proceeded with with the utmost dispatch.” The appellant meets the respondents’ allegations as to his failure to provide a suitable working face, and the fitness of the machine, with a direct negative, thereby asserting that he did provide a proper face whilst the machine was working at Carfin, and that the machine was not capable of performing the amount of work required by the conditions of the contract.

The 8th article of the condescendence for the respondents is in these terms :—“The defender (appellant) called on the pursuers (respondents) to remove the machine from Carfin, as he alleged it had not excavated and filled the stipulated quantity. The pursuers refused to do so, and the machine is still at Carfin. The machine was delivered to the defender at Carfin, and is still in his possession there.” The appellant’s answer is, “Admitted.”

The foregoing answer appears to me necessarily to imply an admission on the part of the appellant that the machine was delivered to him at Carfin cutting by the respondents as in implement of the contract, and that he rejected it because of its incapacity to perform the amount of work stipulated in the contract. And that must be read in connection with his previous assertion that the “further trial” at Carfin was made on a proper face. Taking all his averments together, they appear to me to disclose no ground of defence to the action, except one, that the machine was disconform to contract, as was evidenced by the fact that it had been subjected to the contract test by working at a suitable face, and had failed to perform the stipulated amount of work. And it is a notable circumstance that, neither in the opinion of Lord Shand, who carefully states the respective contentions of the parties, nor in the judgment delivered by Lord Mure, is there to be found the least indication of any other controversy having been raised before the Court of Session by the appellant. No. 4.

Mar. 7, 1881.
Mackay v.
Dick & Stevenson.

This view of the appellant's record is borne out by his pleas in law. The only pleas which indicate any substantive defence to the respondents' claim for the contract price are these:—"2. The machine having failed on trial, the defender is not bound to accept it. 3. The sale of the machine having been conditional on the trial, which has failed, the defender is not liable in the price thereof."

Such being the shape of the record or issue to which the findings of the Court of Session are applicable, I am of opinion that the findings in the interlocutor appealed against are in themselves sufficient to entitle the respondents to decree for the price of the machine. The terms of the contract seem to me to imply very plainly that it was incumbent on the appellant, and not upon the respondents, to provide "a properly opened up face" for the trial of the machine. Then the Court negatives the existence of the agreement alleged by the appellant, to substitute Gariongill for Carfin cutting as the place of trial; and find in substance that the appellant failed to provide a proper face at Carfin cutting, "notwithstanding repeated demands" on the parts of the respondents. The respondents were only entitled to receive payment of the price of the machine on the condition that it should be tried at a proper working face provided by the appellant, and that on trial it should excavate a certain amount of clay or other soft substance within a given time. They have been thwarted in the attempt to fulfil that condition by the neglect or refusal of the appellant to furnish the means of applying the stipulated test; and their failure being due to his fault, I am of opinion that, as in a question with him, they must be taken to have fulfilled the condition. The passage cited by Lord Shand from Bell's Principles (section 50) to the effect that, "If the debtor bound under a certain condition have impeded or prevented the event, it is held as accomplished. If the creditor has done all that he can to fulfil a condition which is incumbent on himself, it is held sufficient implement," expresses a doctrine, borrowed from the civil law, which has long been recognised in the law of Scotland, and I think it ought to be applied to the present case.

It was argued for the appellant that the condition was only intended to operate in his favour, and that he might therefore dispense with it and defend himself upon the ground that the machine was, in point of fact, disconform to contract. But I cannot regard the stipulation in that light; it was so obviously for the interest of the manufacturers of this new patent machine to have the question, whether it was or was not conform to contract, determined by reference to a simple and definite test, instead of being left to the uncertainty of speculative opinion, aggravated by the risk of litigation.

I now proceed to consider whether, before disposing of this case, any remit should be made to the Court below.

As I understood the appellant's argument, he desired to have an opportunity of asking findings from the Court of Session to the effect that (1) the machine was disconform to contract; and (2) that the trials of the machine, though not to be regarded as equivalent to the test provided by the contract, made its disconformity to contract apparent to all concerned. Various other points were suggested for remit, but these appeared to me to be mere after-thoughts, and being unable to find any trace of their having been made grounds of defence in the record, I take no further notice of them. In the case lodged for the appellant, his pleadings upon the facts, which include a great deal of unnecessary observation upon the proof led in the cause, are thus summed up (Case, p. 36):—

“The only fact found by the interlocutor is that the appellant failed to provide a properly opened up face-at the Carfin cutting. It is submitted that this finding does not, in point of law, warrant the finding that the appellant is liable to pay the sum of £1115 and expenses. It is consistent with the facts found that the machine was not in fact according to contract, and that such trials as there had been afforded ample evidence of this. If this be so, it is submitted that the appellant would not be liable to pay for the machine, and it is contended that the evidence establishes these facts, or at all events, that the machine did not comply with the contract.”

In the view which I have taken of the judgment under appeal, any general allegation by the appellant, to the effect that the machine was not conform to contract, is irrelevant, because, according to that view, the machine must be held to have satisfied the contract test, which was not applied owing to the default of the appellant.

As to his other allegation, that “such trials as there had been” made it clear that the machine was disconform to contract, I doubt whether it is to be found on the record, and, even if it be, I have no doubt of its irrelevancy. No such statement would, in my opinion, afford a relevant answer to the case disclosed by the interlocutor under appeal, unless it amounted to this, that the machine was so disconform to the specification, or so palpably deficient in working power, that the respondents were not in bona fide to tender it to the appellant as in implement of the contract. I need only add that I have not heard it suggested in argument that any such case has been made by the appellant on record or elsewhere.

In appeals falling within the scope of the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, I humbly conceive that this House has no concern with the proof which has been led in the Sheriff Court. When it can be shewn that the Court of Session has not exhausted the issue before it, and that there are material questions of fact left undetermined, a remit will be made to the Court below to pronounce findings upon these questions, but that can only be shewn by a reference to the record, and not to the proof. It would, in my opinion, be productive of great inconvenience if the House were to make remits upon matters of fact which are not very plainly set forth upon record, as substantive grounds either of pursuit or of defence.

I am accordingly of opinion that the application for a remit which has been made by the appellant's counsel ought not to be entertained, and that the judgment under appeal must be affirmed, with costs, and the appeal dismissed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, having had an opportunity of reading in print the judgments which have now been delivered by my two noble and learned friends, and agreeing with them, I think it unnecessary to add anything further.

Navigable River—Foreshire—Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict., c. cxlix.), secs. 76 and 84—Right of Clyde Trustees to dredge the foreshore without consent of proprietor.—Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that notwithstanding the general repeal of the previous Clyde Navigation Acts by section 3 of the Consolidation Act of 1858, the terms of section 76, read in connection with those of section 84, were sufficient to re-enact the powers of the trustees under the repealed Acts, inter alia, to dredge the river over a certain area till a depth of seventeen feet at neap tides was obtained at every part thereof, and that a riparian proprietor was not entitled to interdict the trustees dredging a portion of the foreshore within the said area, which had by a judgment of the House of Lords been held to belong to him, subject to any right which the public might have over the same, “and subject also to any rights conferred upon the trustees of the Clyde Navigation by their Acts of Parliament.”

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the question in this case arises upon the construction of an Act “To consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the River Clyde and Harbour of Glasgow,” passed in 1858, by which a series of earlier statutes, as to the same river and harbour, was repealed. The original Act, passed in 1758, as explained and amended in 1770, empowered the predecessors in title of the respondents to “cleanse, scour, deepen, and enlarge, or straighten and confine the said river and channel thereof, or any part or parts of the same” (within certain defined limits), “and to dig and cut the soil, ground, or banks of the said river, and soil, sand, and gravel in the bed thereof.” These operations were to be carried on until the river and harbour should, throughout its course within the prescribed limits, have attained a minimum depth, which was from time to time increased, till in 1840 it was fixed at seventeen feet at neap tides. No consent of any proprietor, who might be entitled to any estate or interest in any part of the bed or foreshore of the river which might be affected by them, was required for the exercise of these powers. In 1825 the same authorities were enabled (in enlargement of their former powers, and still without requiring any consent), to “dredge, cleanse, and scour by machinery worked by the power of steam, or otherwise, the said river and bed or channel thereof; to remove all sand banks or shoals which might obstruct the navigation, and to erect and construct . . . such new works as should seem to them proper and expedient for directing the stream of the river, for removing obstructions to the course of the tide, for bringing up a greater quantity of tide water, and for making, continuing, maintaining, and securing the navigable channel of the said river at least of (the prescribed) depth, and of as great width as might be found expedient for enabling vessels resorting to the harbour of Glasgow to pass each other with safety and facility.”

From the beginning power was given to make locks, dams, weirs, jetties, again broke down, and B refused to give it any farther trial. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that B having failed to give a proper opportunity for the stipulated test A was entitled to decree against him for the price of the machine.

Appeal—Competency—Cause originating in Sheriff Court—Findings of fact—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV., c. 120), sec. 40.—In appeals falling within the scope of the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, the House of Lords has no concern with the proof led in the Sheriff Court. Where it can be shewn that the Court of Session has not exhausted the issue before it, and that there are material questions of fact left undetermined, a remit will be made to the Court below to pronounce findings upon these questions, but the omission can only be shewn by reference to the judgment and record and not to the proof. The House of Lords will not remit on matters of fact which are not plainly set forth on record.

The interlocutor appealed against was as follows:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff of date 2d December 1879: (1) Find that the pursuers undertook to supply and the defender undertook to purchase and pay £1115 for a steam-digging machine, in terms of the letters dated respectively 21st and 22d September 1876: (2) Find that it was a condition of the said contract that the defender should not be bound to accept and pay for the said machine if it should fall short of digging and filling into waggons 350 cubic yards of the clay or other soft substance within a day of ten hours in a certain railway cutting which the defender was to make, called the Carfin cutting, after it was fairly tried on a properly opened up face: (3) Find that it was impossible that the machine should have the stipulated fair trial unless the defender provided a properly opened up face at the said Carfin cutting: (4) Find that the defender failed to provide such properly opened up face, notwithstanding repeated demands on the part of the pursuers, and thus prevented the machine from being tested in the manner provided by the contract: (5) Find that the defender has failed to prove that the pursuers agreed to substitute for the Carfin cutting any other cutting as the place for the trial of the said machine: Therefore repel the defences, and decern against the defender to pay to the pursuers the sum of £1115, with the interest prayed for, in terms of the petition: (6) Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in both Courts, but subject to deduction of the expense of the conjunct probation, which was incompetent, and ought not to have been admitted, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account or accounts of said expenses, and to report."

A petition was lodged by the respondents against the competency of the appeal, in respect that the case was one which had commenced and in which the proof had been led in the Sheriff Court, and that the findings of the First Division appealed against being findings of fact and not of law the appeal was excluded by the Judicature Act, 1825, section 40.*

* Which enacted that where in causes commencing in any of the inferior Courts "matter of fact shall be disputed, and a proof shall be allowed and taken according to the present practice, the Court of Session shall, in reviewing the judgment proceeding on such proof, distinctly specify in their interlocutors the several facts material to the case which they find to be established by the proof, and express how far their judgment proceeds on the matter of fact so found, or on matter of law, and the several points of law which they mean to decide; and the judgment in the cause then pronounced shall be subject to appeal to the House of Lords in so far only as the same depends on or is affected by matter of law, but shall, in so far as relates to the facts, be held to have the force and effect of a special verdict of a jury, finally and conclusively fixing the several facts specified in the interlocutor."

deepening, straightening, enlarging, widening, or confining, dredging, scouring, improving, and cleansing the river and harbour, until a depth of at least seventeen feet at neap tides has been attained in every part thereof; the altering, directing, or making the channel of the river through any land, soil, or ground, part of the present or former course or bed of the river; and other things, which it is not necessary to enumerate in detail, but which include the erection of jetties, banks, walls, &c., and the construction and completion of the wet docks, tidal basin, and other works, shewn and described in the plans and sections referred to in the repealed Acts of 1840 and 1857, and thereby authorised to be made and maintained.

Lord Blantyre
v. Clyde Navigation
Commissioners.

This is undoubtedly a singular and very inartificial manner of re-enacting, by way of consolidation, the powers contained in and conferred by the repealed Acts; but the preamble shews that it was the intention of the Legislature (subject to such amendments as were thought requisite) to do so, and it is not otherwise done. The words "in terms of the recited Acts" cannot, indeed, amount to a re-enactment of all that had been repealed; but they do refer to, and by reference incorporate, so much of the repealed Acts as, when examined, is found to describe and define the powers and authorities meant to be transferred to and vested in the respondents as part of the undertaking. Some of these, and particularly the powers of "deepening, straightening, enlarging, widening, confining, dredging, scouring, improving, and cleansing the river," until the prescribed depth should have been attained in every part thereof, and the "altering, directing, or making the channel of the river through any land, soil, or ground," being part of its "bed or course," were, by the earlier Acts, conferred upon the predecessors of the respondents, without contemplating or providing for the purchase or taking of any land; while others (those relating, e.g., to the construction of docks, &c.) were conferred by later Acts, in the manner usual when lands must be acquired, either compulsorily or by agreement. The effect of these words of reference is (in my opinion) that both these classes of powers were continued to the respondents, as if they had been given anew "in terms" of the repealed Acts. It follows that the respondents have now the former class of powers (being those of which alone the exercise is in question on this appeal) as the former trustees had them, i.e., without limit of time, and without need of any purchase or taking of land as the condition of their exercise.

I am confirmed in this conclusion by the 84th section, which repeats, in the very terms of the corresponding clause in the Act of 1840, the special protection given by the 45th section of that Act to the appellants' Erskine estate, and also to certain lands of other proprietors; ending, however, with the following qualification of that protection, by way of proviso:—"Provided that it shall be lawful for the trustees to deepen the said river by dredging the bed or channel thereof, within the said limits, by machines worked by the power of steam or other machinery, to the extent authorised by the said recited Acts and this Act." I do not see how the present appeal could be determined in the appellants' favour without contradicting this proviso.

It was contended (as I understood the argument) for the appellant that all these powers were, indeed, granted by the Act of 1858 to the respondents, but only in this way, that the respondents must (if they could) acquire the land, which (by reason of their dredging, deepening, or widening operations) would cease to be foreshore, from the appellant and any other owners of the foreshore, under the provisions for taking land by agreement contained in the Lands

No. 5. Clauses Act, incorporated with the Act of 1858 by section 4. Such a power, however, would be dependent entirely on the consents of the appellant and the other foreshore proprietors, which they could not be compelled to give. The proviso at the end of the 84th section must, from the antecedent context, necessarily mean that these particular operations might be carried on in the bed or channel of the river adjoining the Erskine estate without the appellant's consent. The compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Act were not incorporated with the Act of 1858, except for certain special purposes not extending to those operations; and (even as to those special purposes) they were incorporated only for less than two years. It was not contemplated by any of the repealed Acts (as I read them) that the former trustees should "purchase" or "take" any land in the channel or bed of the river which, by reason only of their dredging, deepening, or widening operations, might be permanently covered with water, having before formed part of the foreshore at low tide; much less that they should have no power to carry on such operations at all unless they did so. What was not necessary for this purpose under the former Acts is not (in my opinion) necessary under the Act of 1858. It was insisted that, according to this view, the appellant would practically be deprived of part of his foreshore without compensation, and that this could not have been the intention of the Legislature. To that argument I am unable to accede. If the former Acts did not cover, by the provisions as to compensation contained in them, this particular kind of damage, there would be no reason to expect that the Act of 1858 would do so. If they did cover and provide for it, it may well be that the effect of the 76th section of the Act of 1858 is not to make those powers absolute and unconditional which were previously conditional upon compensation being made for damage done, but that the reference to the "terms of the recited Acts" may be sufficient to preserve the condition as well as the power. There may also, possibly, be questions as to the effect of the compensation clauses in the Harbours Clauses Act and the Commissioners Clauses Act of 1857, both which are incorporated generally with the Clyde Harbour Act of 1858.

Mar. 7, 1881.
Lord Blantyre
v. Clyde Navigation
Commissioners.

All these questions are (as the Lord Ordinary stated) left unprejudiced by the interlocutors now under appeal. It is not necessary, nor do I think it would be convenient, for your Lordships now to determine them; because, however they might be decided, my conclusion on the particular question raised by the present appeal would still be the same. The interlocutors appealed from are, in my opinion, right, and I therefore move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

EARL CAIRNS.—My Lords, I am of opinion that the Act of 1858, although it in form professed to repeal the catena of previous Acts which had been passed during a century for improving the navigation of the Clyde, yet preserved to the respondents by its re-enacting words the right to improve the navigation by doing the acts now complained of, without any obligation of obtaining the consent or purchasing the land of the appellant beforehand, whatever liability to subsequent compensation for damage it may have made or left them subject to. I have arrived at this conclusion with perhaps more difficulty than seems to have been felt by the Court below; but my grounds are, first, because the words of the enactment of 1858 referred to by the Lord Chancellor, though inartificial and inappropriate, are yet sufficient, looking to the whole scope and history of the legislation, to carry into the new Act the "terms," by which I understand from the context the "powers," of the old Acts ; secondly, because the contention of the appellant would absolutely paralyze, and possibly destroy, the great public work which it was the object of Parliament to effect, and is not to be adopted unless no other construction is possible ; and thirdly, because the insertion of the 84th section of the Act of 1858 for the protection of the Erskine estate of the appellant would, in my opinion, be absolutely meaningless if the appellant was meant to be left in a position in which he could refuse his consent to allow any works whatever to be executed by the respondents on or over his solum. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

No. 5.

Mar. 7, 1881.
Lord Blantyre
v. Clyde Navigation
Commissioners.

LORD PENZANCE.—My Lords, the respondents in the present appeal are the trustees of the Clyde Navigation, and, as the public body invested by statute with the duty of maintaining and improving the navigation of that important river, have begun to remove, by dredging and carrying away in barges or punts, a portion of the soil on lands which it is admitted belong to the appellants, but which are situated below high-water mark at ordinary times, and which therefore form part of the river channel.

Commencing a period of upwards of a hundred years since, statutes have been passed for the improvement of the navigation of the river Clyde. I do not think it will be necessary, in the determination of this case, for your Lordships to scrutinize very narrowly the precise provisions of these statutes, with the exception, perhaps, of the Act of 1840. They have all been repealed by the last Act of 1858, under which the present trustees were constituted, and it is the proper construction of that Act which must determine your Lordships' decision in the present case. But, speaking generally, it must be observed that by these statutes powers have been conferred from time to time on the trustees of the navigation to deepen and (within the limits of high-water mark) to widen, to an extent sufficient to accommodate the shipping, the navigable channel of the river by dredging and removing the soil, without any previous consent of the persons to whom the land upon which the dredging operations might be performed belonged.

Provisions no doubt were introduced from time to time for compensation to the landowners, but their consent was in no instance rendered necessary.

And this could hardly have been otherwise. Where the growing trade of such a port as Glasgow was in question, it could hardly have been expected that the entire project of improving the navigation should have been left at the mercy of any person who happened to possess any portion of the soil under water at high tide, and who, by refusing to have any portion of that soil removed, might have practically rendered the deepening of the navigable channel impossible.

The Legislature is in the perfectly well-known habit of dealing with such a matter either by way of pecuniary compensation, or, if the land itself is required to be taken and appropriated, by compulsory purchase.

The land here in question being land which is covered with water at high tide, and thus forms part of the channel of the river, is land not available for the ordinary uses of land ; and it may well be that the Legislature thought that the injury done to it by removing part of the surface was one which might properly be met by a system of compensation.

Be that as it may, the fact is that from 1758 down to the year 1840, although every Act provided for works in the way of deepening and improving the

 Lord Blantyre
 v. Clyde Navigation
 Commissioners.

channel of the river within high-water mark, and provided compensation in case of injury, no provision is to be found for requiring the consent of the land-owners, and none for the compulsory purchase of their lands.

In 1840, no doubt, a larger scheme was set on foot, and received the sanction of Parliament. Two lines were drawn, enclosing a space wider in several places than the existing channel of the river, and consequently including at some points not only land lying within high-water mark, but land above and outside it; and powers were taken by the statute of that year to extend the existing channel of the river to the limits included within these two lines. This involved the absorption, in some places, into the water channel, or the works connected therewith, of what had always been dry land, and the permanent occupation in other places of land which did not belong to the trustees. The trustees were therefore invested for a limited time with power to "take, occupy, and use" any of the land falling within the lines marked out as before mentioned, and specified in the schedule to the Act, "indemnification being always made to the owners," &c. "of such land," &c. But the statute of that year was by no means in its enactments confined to the carrying out of this new and more extensive scheme, with the powers of compulsory purchase necessary for that purpose; for we find it enacted by section 11 that the trustees "are hereby empowered not only to execute and continue the several works authorised by the recited Acts" (and all the previous Acts are recited), but also to execute the "additional works" authorised by the Act.

The effect of this statute, therefore, was, in the first place, to keep alive and give a fresh authority to the preceding Acts for deepening and widening the channel of the river, and, in the second, to authorise the execution of a new scheme for greatly extending the channel of the river, and constructing wet docks and other works in connection therewith.

I have called attention to the exact effect of this statute, because the main contention of the appellants is rested upon its provisions, inasmuch as the land now in question lies within the two lines drawn as the intended limits of the river channel, and is found among those lands which are set down in the schedule of the Act as lands which the trustees had power to purchase.

In this condition of previous legislation (passing by one or two Acts which are not material) the Act now in force, the 21 and 22 Vict. c. cxlix., was passed in 1858.

It was an Act "to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the river Clyde and harbour of Glasgow."

The preamble recites the former Acts, and then goes on to recite the "great and continued increase of the shipping and trade of Glasgow," and that it is "necessary that, in conformity with the provisions of the recited Acts, the navigation should be further enlarged and improved, and additional accommodation afforded in the harbour," and that it is expedient that "the former Acts should be repealed, and their provisions consolidated and amended."

There can be no doubt, therefore, that the Legislature intended that the powers of the trustees should be rather enlarged than curtailed, or withdrawn, which is a consideration not without importance when your Lordships come to construe the enacting clauses by which a preamble of this character was succeeded.

The clause mainly in question is sec. 76. It is somewhat oddly framed. The mode adopted for conferring on the trustees the powers necessary for the execution of the work confided to them is by declaring that "their undertaking shall consist of," &c., &c., and then follows an enumeration of their different powers, functions, and duties. No. 5.

Now, it is important for the purposes of the present case to observe that, quite independently of any reference to the former Acts, there is to be found among the matters of which the undertaking of the trustees is declared to consist "the deepening, straightening, enlarging, widening, or confining, dredging, scouring, improving, and cleansing the river and harbour until a depth of at least seventeen feet at neap tides has been attained in every part thereof," also "the digging or cutting the soil or banks of the river or bed thereof, and laying the same on the most convenient banks of the river," and these "works, or such and so many of them as to them shall from time to time seem expedient, they are to carry on and complete." Mar. 7, 1881.
Lord Blantyre
v. Clyde Navigation
Commissioners.

In all this there is nothing said of the previous consent of the persons who may be the owners of the soil in those parts of the river in which the "dredging, &c., digging or cutting of the soil" may take place, . . . nor would the necessity for such a previous consent be consistent with any practical measure for carrying out the useful objects to which I have already alluded as declared in the preamble to be the objects for which the legislation was devised and intended.

Stopping therefore at this point, and reading this Act without reference to the question how far the former Acts, although repealed, were intended to be kept alive by virtual re-enactment, I fail to see that the trustees have exceeded the powers conferred on them.

But I am further of opinion that, according to the true reading of this Act, it was intended by the introduction into sec. 76 of the words "in terms of the recited Acts," to declare that the powers and duties, of which the "undertaking" was said to "consist," should be exercised and performed substantially in the manner, and subject to the restrictions, by the former Acts provided, and I adopt the expression of Lord Hatherley in the case cited at the bar, that the former Acts were intended to be "summarised" compendiously by the section in question.

The appellants, indeed, rely upon this view, and they use it in this way. They say the provisions of the Act of 1840 were thus kept alive, and then they say that under that Act the trustees had no power to touch their land unless they exercised the right which they possessed of purchasing the land outright. But I have already pointed out that under that Act the trustees had power, in conformity with the provisions of the former Acts, to dredge, &c., within the channel of the river, that is, within high-water mark, without purchasing the land.

In whichever way therefore the statute of 1858 is regarded, whether as an isolated enactment unconnected with the previous Acts, or as an enactment intended to summarise and consolidate the previous Acts, the acts of the trustees are, I think, justified without the appellants' consent, and the judgment appealed from ought, I think, to be affirmed.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, the river Clyde flows into the upper or eastern end of the Firth of Clyde, which is an arm of the sea. Glasgow is situated on that river, just where the tide ceases to affect it. Lord Blantyre and his predecessors are owners of the barony of Erskine on both sides of the Clyde. Erskine lies below or to the west of the river Cart, which flows into the Clyde, and is

 Commissioners.

both above and below Dumbuck, which is about the place where, in popular language, the river may be said to end and the firth to begin. Dumbarton is lower down, and Port-Glasgow and Newark Castle on the south, and Cardross on the north side of the Firth of Clyde, are some miles farther west, and there the firth is so broad that, in popular language, the river has ended and it is part of the sea. All these places are mentioned in the different Acts relating to the river Clyde and the harbour of Glasgow, which were, by the 21 and 22 Vict. c. cxlix. (2d of August 1858), meant to be repealed, and their provisions consolidated and amended in one Act, but that Act has been drawn in so unskilful a way that I am afraid, in order to understand it, it is necessary to construe the previous Acts just as if they were still in force. In this river and the firth, into which it flows, like all places where the tide ebbs and flows, there is a line marking the boundary of that land which at ordinary low tide is covered with water, and an inner line marking the boundary of that land which at ordinary high tides is covered with water, but not at low water. Lord Blantyre was, by a declarator affirmed by this House in Lord Advocate and the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Lord Blantyre,¹ found to be proprietor of the foreshore or portion of land between high-water mark and low-water mark ex adverso of his lands of Erskine, but subject always to any rights of navigation or other rights which the public may have over the same, and subject also to any rights conferred upon the trustees of the Clyde navigation by their Acts of Parliament.

Lord Blantyre applied for an interdict to prohibit the Clyde Trustees from interfering in any way with the part of the foreshore No. 131 in the book of reference referred to in 3 and 4 Vict. c. 118. The question is one of relevancy.

It appears by the statements of fact and answers that this is a part of the foreshore included in the declarator; it is several miles above or to the east of Port-Glasgow, and is above both Dumbarton and Dumbuck, and below or to the west of the Cart, and is in its present state under water for about eighteen hours out of the twenty-four. The Clyde Trustees have begun to remove part of this plot, and avow their intention to remove more of it, until they have widened the navigable channel there to the width which, in their opinion, is expedient for enabling vessels resorting to the harbour of Glasgow to pass each other with safety and facility, and until the navigable channel so widened is deepened to seventeen feet. They say that they have the legal power to do this without asking Lord Blantyre's consent. No question as to whether Lord Blantyre is entitled to compensation is raised; that will come hereafter. But one argument of the counsel for the appellant was that, on the true construction of the Acts, the trustees could not under the Acts do what they proposed to do, unless they first bought and paid for the spot, and that their power to buy without the proprietor's consent expired long ago. If this was well founded, it was an answer, but, I think, for the reasons I shall presently give, it was not well founded. The Lord President contented himself with saying that what was going on in the way of operations for deepening the river was quite within the powers reserved or conferred by sec. 76 of the Act of 1858. Lord Shand observed that the operations entirely consist in the removal of soil by dredging, and for that purpose the trustees do not propose to take property permanently or to occupy property permanently; and he says that if there were any doubts as to the effect of sec. 76 it would be entirely removed by sec. 84. I have come, on looking at the matter carefully, to be entirely of the same opinion, but the ingenious arguments at your Lordships' bar convinced me that the drafting of the Act of 1858 was so very inartificial as to render it proper to inquire whether sec. 76 as framed really bore that meaning.

The first Act of 1758, 32 Geo. III., may, I think, be passed by. It was never acted upon. By the next Act of 1770, 10 Geo. III., the Magistrates of Glasgow are empowered "from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to make and keep the said river Clyde navigable from the lower end of Dumbuck Ford to the bridge of Glasgow aforesaid, so as there may be at least seven feet water at neap tides in every part of the said river within the bounds aforesaid, for ships, vessels, barges, and lighters to come and go to and from the said city of Glasgow, and for that end to alter, direct, and make, or cause to be altered, directed, and made, the channel of the said river, through any land, soil, or ground (part of the present bed of the said river) between the lower end of Dumbuck Ford and the bridge of Glasgow aforesaid, and to make, set up, and erect on both sides of the said river such and so many jetties, banks, walls, sluices, works, and fences for making, securing, continuing, and maintaining the channel of the said river within proper bounds for the use of the said navigation as to the said magistrates and council, and their successors in office, shall seem proper and convenient, and for that purpose to cleanse, scour, deepen, and enlarge, or straighten or confine, the said river and channel thereof, or any part or parts of the same, within the limits aforesaid, and to dig or cut the soil, ground, or banks of the said river, and soil, sand, and gravel in the bed thereof, and to lay the same upon the most convenient banks of the said river, and to plant the banks on each side of the said river, within the bounds aforesaid, with willows or other shrubs for the safety or preservation of the said banks, and for preventing the same from being hurt or carried away by the said river, satisfaction being always made to the owners of the ground that shall be thereby damaged, as in manner hereinafter directed."

The Act of 1809, 49 Geo. III., after reciting that in consequence of the powers vested in the magistrates and council of the said city by the said recited Acts, the navigation of the said river has been greatly improved, and the channel deepened and cleansed, and the trade and shipping of the said river and city have of late greatly increased and are increasing, and the ships and vessels belonging and trading to and from the port of Glasgow are now become more valuable and of larger dimensions, and by continuing the works now carrying on and adopting others the said river may still be further improved, and the channel deepened and enlarged; and that it would be a great advantage to the merchants, traders, and inhabitants of the said city and of the places adjacent, to the owners and masters of vessels navigating the said river, and to the country at large, if the said river was further improved, and the bed and channel thereof further deepened and enlarged, enacts that the trustees, for the purposes of the before recited Acts, shall be empowered, not only to continue the works authorised by the said Acts, but also to carry on such new and additional works as they shall think proper, till such time as the said river is at least nine feet deep at neap tide in every part thereof, between the bridge of Glasgow and the castle of Dumbarton, for ships and vessels to navigate to and from the said city.

By the Act of 1825 the Clyde Trustees are empowered, "not only to continue the works authorised by the said Acts in the manner and way therein described, but also to carry on and execute such new and additional works as they

In 1840 a wider scheme was taken up, for making wet docks and other works which would require the taking of lands ; and a plan was prepared by an engineer, marking what those works were to be, and what the navigable channel of the Clyde, both within high-water mark and above high-water mark, was intended ultimately to be. And compulsory powers for purchasing the necessary lands were given, but those powers were not to be exercised after 1848. I will read part of the Act obtained in 1840 with this object. By section 11 the trustees are empowered not only to execute and continue the several works authorised by the said recited Acts, but also, under the provisions and restrictions hereinafter enacted, to make, &c., "the additional works upon, in, or along the river, and in connection with the said harbour, delineated or represented on the map or plan hereinafter mentioned." By section 44 the trustees "are empowered to construct and carry on the several works for deepening, widening, and improving the navigation of the said river and harbour mentioned in or authorised by the said recited Acts, or delineated or described on the said map or plan, and sections, and authorised by this Act, until the said river and harbour throughout every part thereof shall have attained at least the depth of seventeen feet at neap tides, for the safe and easy navigation of ships to and from the Broomielaw or harbour of Glasgow, and the wet dock and other works hereby authorised to be constructed." Section 45 is for the protection of the property of Erskine belonging to Lord Blantyre, and the properties of Frisky Hall, Corse-dale, Auchentorlie, and Dumbuck, but with this proviso, "Provided always that it shall be lawful for the said trustees to deepen the said river, by dredging the bed or channel thereof, within the said limits, by machines worked by the power of steam or other machinery, to the extent hereby authorised."

Lord Blantyre
v. Clyde Navigation Commissioners.

Now, pausing here, I think it clear from 1848 till further legislation the position of the Clyde Trustees was this : They had powers from time to time to widen and deepen the navigable channel of the Clyde between high and low-water mark, till it had attained the depth of seventeen feet, and was "of as great a width as might be expedient for enabling vessels resorting to the harbour of Glasgow to pass each other with safety or facility." There was no limit as to the time within which this power was to be exercised, and no consent on the part of those interested in the land lying below high-water mark was required, but satisfaction was to be made to the owners of heritages adjacent to or in the river or firth of Clyde which might be injured or damaged by or in consequence of the said operations. And not only were such portions of the lands of Erskine as lay below high-water mark within this general power, but in the clauses introduced for the protection of the Lords Blantyre and others, provisos were introduced expressly declaring that these powers should be exercised there.

The trustees had also powers given them to purchase certain lands, including those below high-water mark, by consent, and they had formerly powers to purchase them compulsorily, but those last powers had expired in 1848. By an Act of 1857 fresh compulsory powers to purchase some of those lands was given, but those powers were to last only for three years.

When the Clyde Trustees went in 1858 before Parliament for a further Act, the last thing which the Clyde Trustees could have wished was that the Legislature should take away these powers which they possessed to widen and deepen the navigable channel below high-water mark. And considering how useful and reasonable those powers were, how much good they had done, and how no hardship had ever been inflicted on anyone by their exercise, and reading the preamble of the Act of 1858, which, after reciting the previous Acts, and "that the great and continued increase of the shipping and trade of Glasgow, consequent on the improvement of the said river and harbour, renders it necessary that, in conformity with the provisions of the recited Acts, the navigation should be further enlarged and improved, and additional accommodation afforded in the harbour, and whereas it is also expedient that the said several Acts should be repealed, and their provisions consolidated and amended," I think it is not too much to say that the last thing the Legislature could have wished to do was to take away those powers. But the Act of 1858 has been drawn with such unlucky want of skill as really to afford plausible ground for the argument at your Lordships' bar, that whatever was meant, the Act as passed expresses an intention to take away these powers. It is a singular instance of the haphazard way in which the Act has been framed, that the clearest and most explicit declaration of the intention of the Legislature to preserve those powers is contained in the proviso at the end of section 84, which is a re-enactment of the 45th section of the Act of 1840, for the protection of the properties of Erskine, the properties of Frisky Hall, Corsedelf, Auchentorlie, and Dumbuck; "provided that it shall be lawful for the trustees to deepen the said river by dredging the bed or channel thereof within the said limits, by machines worked by the power of steam or other machinery, to the extent authorised by the recited Acts and this Act."

After repealing by section 3 the recited Acts, "subject to the provisions of this Act," and incorporating the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of Scotland, and other general Acts, with modifications, we come in order to see what those provisions alluded to in section 3 are to section 76. As I read it, the draftsman has here lumped together eight different matters. For some the powers to take lands compulsorily would be requisite. For some those powers are not required. I will read this curious piece of draftsmanship in an abbreviated form:—"The undertaking of the trustees shall," in terms of the recited Acts "consist of the deepening, widening, or confining, dredging, improving, and cleansing the river and harbour until a depth of at least seventeen feet at neap tides has been attained in every part thereof;" that is one object; "the altering, directing, or making the channel of the river through any land, soil, or ground, part of the present or former course or bed of the river;" that is a second object; "the forming and erecting on both sides of the river of such jetties, &c., for making and maintaining the channel of the river within proper bounds as the trustees shall think necessary;" that is a third object; "the digging or cutting the soil or banks of the river or bed thereof, and laying the same upon the most convenient banks of the river;" that is a fourth; "the cleansing, scouring, and opening any other streams, brooks, or watercourses which now fall into the river, and the digging and cutting the banks of the same for improving the navigation of the river, the digging, removing, carrying away, and using such earth and other materials therein, upon, or out of the said land as the trustees shall think fit, either for improving the navigable channel of the river, or for bringing in any other streams, brooks, or watercourses to the river, or for bringing up a greater quantity of tidal water in the river;" that is a fifth; "the erection and maintenance of wharfs, &c., the erection, construction, and mooring of such beacons and buoys as may be necessary in the harbour and in the river;" that is a sixth; "the construction and completion of the several wet docks, river-dykes, and all other works and improvements shewn and described on the several plans and sections referred to in the recited Acts, and thereby authorised to be made and maintained;" that is a seventh; "and the repair, maintenance, and improvement of the whole of the said works from time to time as may be found necessary or expedient, subject to the provisions of this Act and the Acts herewith incorporated, the trustees are hereby authorised and empowered to carry on and complete the whole or such and so many of the said works as to them from time to time shall seem expedient;" that is the eighth and last object.

What is the meaning of the phrase "in terms of the said recited Acts?" It is no doubt a very extraordinary way of carrying out the announced intention of the Legislature to repeal the former Acts, and consolidate their provisions, to say that the powers of the trustees for deepening and widening the river shall be just the same as if the repealed Acts were still in force; but if it does not mean that, what does the phrase mean? I think it does mean that, and so thinking, I come to precisely the opinion much more briefly expressed by the Lord President.

Property—Privileges stipulated for in disposition of heritable subjects—Destruction of subject—Whether privileges transmitted on reconstruction of subjects—Jus quæsitum tertio—Theatre.—The site of a theatre called "The Queen's Theatre and Opera House," as well as the theatre itself, were conveyed to A B by trustees acting for certain shareholders or rentallers, subject to the real burden of a perpetual annuity of £2 to each of the rentallers and their successors or assignees. It was further stipulated that each of the rentallers "shall at all times be entitled to free admission to the audience department of the said theatre other than the present private boxes; . . . but declaring that the said right of free admission shall be personal to each shareholder or rentaller; . . . and also providing and declaring that the said A B and his foreshaids shall not be entitled, without the consent of the said shareholders or rentallers, or their foreshaids, to convert the said theatre and opera house to any other use and purpose; and also providing and declaring that the said theatre and opera house shall be kept open for performances during at least six months of the year."

This theatre was burned down, as was also a second theatre built on the same site. A third theatre was erected and opened. These several theatres had on various occasions changed hands, but in each case the conveyance was made subject to the burdens incumbent on the disponent under the titles of said subjects, and specially, without prejudice to the said generality, the disponent was taken bound to pay the annuity of £2 to each of the rentallers, and to "allow these parties the privilege to which they are entitled."

The rentallers enjoyed unchallenged the privilege of free admission to the theatre, as rebuilt, for fourteen years after its first destruction by fire.

In a question between the lessees of the theatre and the rentallers, held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the privilege of free entry conferred on the rentallers by the original disposition was confined to the theatre in existence at the date of the deed, and expired with its destruction by fire, and that the subsequent conveyances to which the rentallers were not parties were not intended to confer, and did not confer, on them any new right.

EARL CAIRNS.—My Lords, this case lies in an extremely short compass, and for the purpose of the observations which I have to submit to your Lordships it will not be necessary for me to refer to more than two of the deeds or documents which have been commented upon in the argument.

No. 6.

Mar. 24, 1881.
 Scott, &c. v.
 Howard, &c.

I will take, in the first place, the deed of 1858. If it is the case that that deed confers upon those who are called in it the rentallers, and who are represented by the appellants at your Lordships' bar, a right to have free admission into whatever theatre may from time to time stand upon the ground mentioned in that deed, then of course, inasmuch as the present theatre is standing upon that ground, the appellants are right in their contention, and do not require to refer to the other documents in the case. My Lords, that deed of 1858 is in the nature of a disposition in favour of one John Brown, who appears to have been one of a certain number of persons who had carried on for some time prior to 1858 the Queen's Theatre and Opera House in Edinburgh as an adventure, in which they were all interested, and the expenses of which they had, in some way or other, among themselves provided. They appear, for some reason, to have been anxious to change that state of things, and for the future to make John Brown the person who would be the owner of the property and who would carry on the theatre; and, accordingly, the deed is itself a conveyance to this John Brown.

Now, the consideration of the deed appears to me to be that John Brown, in place, as I understand it, of paying the purchase-money to them, undertook to pay, and in point of fact did pay, the debts owing upon the concern, and relieve his co-adventurers of those which were not actually paid by him at the time. That was one part of the consideration. In addition, the co-adventurers seem to have had two other considerations passing to them. The one was a burden upon the property of an annuity of £2 sterling to each of the rentallers, that sum, I suppose, representing in some rough way the interest upon the money which each had contributed. The other was certain conditions for free admission which were secured to them.

What passed to John Brown was the ground upon which the property stood (which, I understand, was held in feu of the governors of Heriot's Hospital), and the edifice, which is thus described:—"The edifice now called the Queen's Theatre and Opera House, and the shops and others adjoining thereto, or connected therewith, all erected on the area or piece of ground above described, and the whole furnishings and fittings of and in said whole buildings, as well heritable as moveable." We all know that the furnishings and fittings of a theatre, the moveable property, are generally of very considerable value. No doubt they represented an important item in that which was conveyed to John Brown. Then, to pass over a provision for the payment of the annuity of £2 to each rentaller, the privilege of free admission is thus described: "Providing and declaring that each of the said shareholders or rentallers, or the assignee or successor of such shareholder or rentaller, shall at all times be entitled to free admission to the audience department of said theatre, other than the present private boxes and the box presently set apart for us, the first and second parties hereto, as trustees foressaid, and which box shall continue to be set aside for the sole use of us, the said first and second parties, as trustees foressaid, and our successors." Then, further on, "in the event of a share being acquired by more than one individual, only one of such individuals shall be entitled, in virtue thereof, to free admission." Then it provides and declares that Brown shall not be entitled, without the consent of the shareholders or rentallers, "to convert the said theatre and opera house to any other use or purpose than a theatre or opera house," and also providing and declaring that "the said theatre and opera house shall be kept open for performance during at least six months in each year; and in the event of the said John Brown, or his foressaids, letting the said theatre and opera house to the lessee or tenant for the time being of the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, he shall take such lessee or tenant bound, so long as he continues tenant or lessee of said Theatre Royal, to give the shareholders or rentallers of the said Queen's Theatre and Opera House free admission to the said Theatre Royal." No. 6.

Mar. 24, 1881.
Scott, &c. v.
Howard, &c.

Now, my Lords, every word of that is a stipulation guardedly and carefully connected with this "said Queen's Theatre and Opera House," that is to say, the edifice which then stood upon the ground called by that name. It appears to me that, stopping there, there is nothing in any one of those sentences which would enable you to say that if, without any act done by Brown himself, something has happened which causes that edifice entirely to disappear and no longer to be in existence, there is an engagement on the part of Brown to give this right of free admission to a wholly different building. Supposing it had been the case that, under the last sentence I read, in place of continuing to occupy it himself, he had let the building to a tenant, and the building had disappeared, so long as that building was there he was bound to make the tenant agree to continue the right of free admission; but could it be contended that the tenant would be under an obligation, if he subsequently substituted a different building upon the property, to continue this free right of admission? It was put in argument by the learned counsel at the bar, would John Brown be bound, or would his tenant be bound, if the theatre was burned down, to build upon the ground another theatre? Might he not build a house of a different kind? It would be very difficult indeed to contend that there was anything here which would oblige him to replace the theatre, if it was burned down, by another theatre. There is no such contract in any part of the document.

Then let us see what the reason of the thing would lead us to expect to find. This theatre, as I pointed out, with all its furniture and fittings, was provided, apparently, in the first place, by the money of the adventurers, and that money was repaid to them by Brown, as the purchase-money for the theatre. It was quite natural that when they were dealing with that which had been provided by their own money, they should, as part of the consideration in parting with it, in favour of Brown, make a stipulation for free admission into that building which they virtually had built; but is there any such reason for supposing that, without any stipulation binding them to contribute to the expense of a new theatre, they could have imagined that they would have a similar right to extend their right of free admission into another theatre, provided, not by their own money, but by the money of another person? Then, again, if it had been intended that this right of admission should pass from the existing theatre to a new theatre, one would have expected to find stipulations as to effecting insurance, as to keeping up the insurance, as to employing the money secured by the policy in rebuilding a theatre of a similar kind if the existing one was burned down; and, indeed, express stipulations as to the new building, and the right of admission to the new building. But we find nothing of the sort, and yet it is impossible not to see that the possibility of the theatre being burnt down would be in the minds of those who were entering into this contract, because, in point of fact, the theatre had been burnt down only a few years before.

My Lords, I therefore come to the conclusion that upon this deed, if it stood there, and if the question had been brought before your Lordships, no other deed having intervened, but the theatre having been burnt down and rebuilt,

Scott, &c. v.
Howard, &c.

we will say by Brown or by some one representing him, if the case had arisen upon that state of things, I do not see how anyone of those rentallers could have maintained seriously his right to have a free admission into the new theatre. Indeed I am bound to say that I do not think that the learned Judges of the Court below who took the view for which the appellants contend rested their opinions so much upon the deed of 1858 as upon the subsequent deed.

Then, my Lords, as to the subsequent deed the case is this: It is said, even supposing that we, the appellants, cannot support our case upon the deed of 1858, still, after the theatre was burnt down, and after a new theatre was erected, there comes another deed in 1874 (in the meanwhile the property had passed from Brown to his trustee Soutar), and in that other deed there are stipulations contained, no doubt, as between Soutar and the person to whom he was selling, by which Soutar stipulated in favour of the rentallers in words which seemed to secure to them this right of free admission, and the person who took under this deed from Soutar was therefore bound by that deed to give those rentallers the right which Soutar stipulated for in their favour, whether they would or would not have been entitled to that right under the earlier deed.

Now there again, my Lords, I am bound to say, in the first place, that it would have been a very singular thing if Soutar had been found to have stipulated in favour of the rentallers for these rights, supposing that they had not got them already. Soutar had no interest in doing so, he was not in any way concerned for the rentallers, he was simply acting as the representative of the estate of John Brown, and trying to do the best he could for that estate, trying to get the largest sum of money he could in parting with this property. Of course, the closer the bargain he was making for conditions for third persons the less he would get for that estate. I therefore certainly should expect to find very clear and unambiguous provisions before I could come to the conclusion that Mr Soutar, of all people in the world, was securing for those rentallers something which the rentallers were not entitled to. But, on the other hand, looking at Mr Soutar's position, it is exactly what one would expect to find, that in selling this part of the estate, for which he was a trustee, he would take very good care that he would not, by anything that he did in his conveyance, prejudice any existing right on the part of third parties, because, in doing so, he would very possibly bring upon himself, or bring upon the estate of which he was a trustee and representative, some claim from those persons whose rights he might thus be supposed or alleged to have prejudiced by the form of his conveyance.

That, of course, my Lords, is merely an a priori observation, and does not decide the case. It may be that the words are so clear that we shall find that the rights were actually created for the benefit of the rentallers, but if any other exposition can be given to the deed that other exposition would certainly be more in accordance with the antecedent probability of the case.

Now, when I look at this deed of 1874 (I will not complicate the case by referring to the subsequent lease), the words in that deed seem to me to be nothing more than words of ordinary style, fitted and calculated for passing on to the person taking under the deed any obligation which at present was existing in connection with the property, not at all words which in any way necessarily create any new obligation or new benefit for any third party:—"Declaring always that the whole subjects and others hereby disposed are so disposed with and under and subject to the whole burdens and others incumbent on me, the said William Shaw Soutar, as trustee aforesaid, or on the said Allan McLaren Brown, or on the trust-estate of the said John Brown, under the titles of said subjects from and after" a certain date, "and specially, without prejudice to the said generality, the said William Hugh Logan and his forebears shall thenceforth pay the annual sums or annuities due to the rentallors or shareholders whose names are enumerated in the schedule," "and allow these parties the privileges to which they are entitled." There is no enumeration of the privileges; there is not even a recital here in the earlier part of the deed of certain privileges of free entry. There is simply a use of those general words, in order to answer which you must first satisfy yourselves as to what the privileges are to which the persons at that time were entitled, that is to say, entitled in point of law. It is not to continue to them advantages which they had been used to have, which they were enjoying de facto, but to continue to them privileges which they were entitled to de jure. That is what is secured to them, and only that.

My Lords, I cannot see there a single word which in any way creates for any third party any new privilege. It leaves the rentallors in the enjoyment of everything they had in point of law, and gives them nothing further. That I understand to be the view which was taken by the majority of the learned judges in the Court of Session. It seems to me most satisfactory, and I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I so entirely agree with what has been said that I scarcely think it necessary to do more than point out the particular things upon which I think the matter turns, and say that I agree in what has already been said upon them.

I think the first question of all is upon the deed of 1858. What was it that the parties meant by that deed, and what is the effect of the instrument as far as regards this privilege of admission to the theatre? It seems quite clear that it was agreed, first of all, that there should be an annuity of £2 a-year secured upon the land as a real burden, and it was intended that that annuity should be transmitted with each share, and a special manner was provided in which the share might pass. Then there was added that besides the annuity passing with the share there should also pass the privilege of free admission after-mentioned, and that privilege of free admission aftermentioned is stated at page 39, letter B, in these words: "Be entitled to free admission to the audience department of the said theatre, other than the present private boxes," and so forth. Now, what does that mean? It would have been perfectly competent to the parties, if they had wished it, and had expressed it, to say, there shall be free admission to this present existing theatre, so long as this present existing theatre continues to exist, and no longer. If they had said that, nobody could have doubted their meaning, or that it could be carried out. Or they might have said, there shall be a right of free admission to this present theatre so long as it exists, and if this present theatre is destroyed by fire or other accident the donee shall be obliged to erect another theatre, and give us a similar right of admission into the other theatre when it is erected. They might have done that, but certainly it is pretty clear upon this deed that they have not done it. There would have been a great many provisions required to be made if they had been going to do that; it would have been necessary to provide who should furnish the money, and so on. But there is nothing said about it.

My Lords, there is a third provision—what I may call a half-way provision—which they might have agreed to. They might have said: “We (the rentallers) shall be entitled to free admission to this theatre as long as it exists, and if it perishes by fire the disponees shall be under no obligation to rebuild it, but if they should rebuild the theatre they shall be under an obligation to give us free admission into the new theatre when rebuilt, as much as into the old one.” There would have been the same difficulties to some extent as before—nearly all the same difficulties as before—if that had been done,—difficulties about providing who was to furnish the money, and so on. I mention this, because I think that the Lord Ordinary, though he does not in express terms say so, must have persuaded himself that the meaning of the deed of 1858 was to adopt the middle course I have spoken of. He does not give his reasons for that, and I have looked in vain to find them. I do not think that that would be the natural and prima facie thing that one would expect the parties to do, and I cannot find a single word in the deed of 1858 doing it.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that under the deed of 1858 the shareholders would have a right of free admission to the theatre as long as that theatre continued to exist, and yet, when that theatre was destroyed by fire, that right of free admission was gone—had perished with the theatre—and was not revived when the new theatre was built in its place. That, I think, is the opinion of the majority of the learned Judges of the Court of Session, that is to say, of the two Judges whose opinion at present stands; and I can only say that I agree in it.

Then it was said (and that, I think, is the ground upon which Lord Ormisdale put it) that the right was given by a subsequent deed of conveyance. I do not think it is necessary to refer to the same terms in subsequent deeds, because in the deed of 1874 these are the words which are relied upon. In that deed there is a conveyance of this property subject to all the burdens that were imposed by the deed of 1858; and then come the words, “and specially, without prejudice to the said generality, the said William Hugh Logan” shall pay annually the sums or annuities due to the rentallers or shareholders, and their successors and assignees, “and allow these parties the privileges to which they are entitled.” Now, it is to be observed that that is mentioned “specially, without prejudice to the said generality,” as one of the burdens imposed by the deed of 1858, and if the burden imposed by the deed of 1858 had been a burden to admit them to the same privileges in any subsequently built theatre I have little doubt that that would have continued it to them. But if there was not that burden to admit them to any subsequently built theatre, can it be said that this creates de novo, and gives a fresh right to these rentallers, and that it was intended to do that by these words? I think not. I think you must look at the words in their natural meaning and signification, and I am convinced that it must have been the object of the parties to say this: We do not say whether or no under the deed of 1858 you, the rentallers, have a right to enter into the substituted theatre as you had into the old one. Mr Soutar, judging from his expression, seems to have rather assumed that they had; but the parties do not say in the deed whether they have it or not. They say: If the rentallers have that right we specially agree that you, the disponees, must keep it up, but we do not settle one way or the other whether they have that right, and if they assert that they have that right, and you assert that they have not, you two must fight it out between you. I (Mr Soutar) have nothing to do with that. That, my Lords, certainly seems to me to be what is intended.

No. 6.

Scott, &c. v.
Howard, &c.

Lord Ormidale, I observe, says he cannot think that that is the meaning of it. He says, after quoting the words I have just read,—“This cannot, I think, on any fair principle of construction, be held to mean, as was contended by the defenders, merely to import a reservation of the rentallers’ claim to privileges, if they had any.” He does not explain why he does not think that is a fair construction. I own it strikes me very much that that was what they really intended to do. He says they might have expressed it more clearly. Perhaps they might. I scarcely know anything that is so expressed that it might not have been put in clearer language; but certainly, if they meant that which Lord Ormidale says they meant, namely, we give this privilege which they assert now exists, I think they might have used clearer language than they have done if that was their meaning. I confess, my Lords, that my own impression is strongly that the meaning of the words, upon any principle of construction that should be applied, ought to be exactly that which Lord Ormidale thinks it was not. Taking that view of the matter, I think this deed cannot possibly give any new privileges, and consequently there is no ground whatever for maintaining the contention of the appellants founded upon it.

The next deed of conveyance is in exactly similar terms, and carries the matter, therefore, no further. Then comes the lease, which is expressed in words of a different kind altogether; but it is sufficient to say that if the conveyances do not give the privilege, certainly the lease cannot.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the appellants are the representatives of a body of gentlemen who up to the year 1858 were the beneficial owners of the Queen’s Theatre and Opera House in Edinburgh, and of the land upon which it was built. In the year 1858 they sold the subjects to the late Mr John Brown, a conveyance being granted by the gentlemen who held the property in question in trust as feuars from Heriot’s Hospital. The considerations upon which the conveyance was granted were three:—First, that the purchaser, the donee, should pay debts owing by the rentallers to the amount of £14,000; secondly, that each of them should be secured in perpetuity an annuity of £2 per annum over the subjects conveyed; and thirdly, that they should have a certain privilege of admission to the then existing theatre, that last stipulation being the one which has given rise to the present contention.

The annuity was intended to run with the lands, and, accordingly, it has been effectually made a real burden, but the privilege of admission to the theatre, which was the third consideration, is a right of a description which cannot, according to the law of Scotland, be made a feudal burden. It is a mere personal right, a right by contract, and, if transmitted at all, it must be transmitted by its being made successively a matter of contract with all the subsequent donees who are not the representatives of the original purchaser. It would have been perfectly valid so long as it existed, and was in vigour as against Mr Brown and as against the representatives of Mr Brown, but it would not have been of any force whatever against a third party, a purchaser from Mr Brown or his representatives, unless it was imposed as a personal obligation upon them by the deed of conveyance which they obtained.

No. 6.

Mar. 24, 1881.
Scott, &c. v.
Howard, &c.

My Lords, the circumstances requiring to be noticed further are these: The property has been held successively by two purchasers who are not the representatives of Mr Brown.

The theatre, since the deed of 1858 was granted, has been twice destroyed by fire, and as often rebuilt. The appellants maintain that the privilege accorded to them by the deed of 1858 is still extant and available to them as against the proprietor of the present theatre, and they maintain, alternatively, that even although that obligation had ceased to exist by reason of the destruction of the theatre by fire, still a new obligation to the same effect had been raised by the deeds transmitting the property to the singular successors of Mr Brown.

My Lords, I do not find that any countenance is given by the learned Judges in the Court below to the first of these contentions; and it appears to me, for the reasons that have already been stated by your Lordships, that it is not well founded. In the first place, the obligation is attached to "the said theatre;" it does not extend further, and "the said theatre," when reference is made to the antecedent, must be held to be the edifice which was then standing. Further, (2) as a condition burdening land, I think it must be strictly read; and, apart from that rule altogether, I can find nothing in the terms of the deed of 1858 which implies that there was to be either a continuing obligation to maintain a theatre upon the land disposed, or that, in the event of a fire and of a new theatre being built on the site, the disponents should have any right of admission to it. No doubt there is an obligation laid upon Mr Brown and his representatives not to convert the theatre to any other purpose. No question arises under that clause. Probably Mr Brown would have been entitled under it to alter the theatre, or to enlarge it, without affecting the right of the rentallers; in fact, it might be that he was entitled under that clause to improve the theatre by taking it down and rebuilding it; that would not put a stop to the right of the rentallers; but that is not the case which arises here. The theatre perished through no act or default on the part of the disponent or his representative, and the question which arises is whether any stipulation is to be found to the effect that the rentallers shall have access to the new theatre. My Lords, I can find no language in the deed which expresses or indicates such an intention on the part of the two contracting parties.

(3) Then, there being no obligation extant under the deed of 1858, it is next contended that the deeds which have transmitted the feu of the land have also recreated this burden upon the owners. Now, upon turning to the deed of 1874, which is in the same terms as the subsequent transmissions, what I find there is that Mr Soutar, in parting with this portion of the trust-estate which was held by him, desired to impose upon the disponent under that deed all the obligations to which he or his author, Mr Brown, could possibly have been subject under the deed of 1858; and, accordingly, the conveyance is expressly made subject to all the burdens, conditions, and declarations which are contained in that deed. If the deed had stopped there it could not have been contended that any greater burden was imposed than that which was to be found existing under the conditions of the deed of 1858. But then it is said that the particular words which follow have the effect of creating a new right, and these words are "to allow those parties the privileges to which they are entitled." These words, it is necessary to observe, are not inserted as a new burden or a new stipulation, but are only inserted as a particular explanation of certain conditions and declarations in the deed of 1858. I cannot read them, therefore, as meaning anything else than this : to allow to those parties the privileges to which they are entitled by the deed of 1858. I cannot read them as implying that the parties are to be allowed to enjoy privileges which are not accorded to them by the terms of the deed of 1858. And that, my Lords, appears to me, as your Lordships have held, to be quite sufficient for the decision of this appeal.

I would only desire to say further that the opinion of the two learned Lords of the Court of Session who took a different view of the case from the majority of the Second Division appears to have been influenced a good deal by the state of possession which is proved to have existed in this case,—the fact, in other words, that from 1865 to 1879, after the theatre referred to in the disposition of 1858 was reduced to ashes, these rentallers had for a period of years enjoyed the right of admission as fully and as freely as if the right had been given to them under the deeds. But, my Lords, it humbly appears to me that these facts as to possession cannot legitimately be taken into consideration in construing the deeds. If the deeds had been defective in any solemnity required by law, if they had been imperfect in execution, these facts might have been founded on as validating the deeds rei interveni, or, if there had been any ambiguity such as occurred in regard to the extent of the right of free admission, I think they might have been legitimately referred to, to explain the ambiguity. But when you have deeds like these—probative deeds which embody the whole contract and obligations of the parties—it appears to me to be out of the question to refer to possession for the purpose of imposing upon their language a meaning which it does not actually bear.

I therefore concur with your Lordships in the judgment which you propose.

Revenue—Income-Tax—5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 60, schedule A, rule 3 ; sec. 100, schedule D, rule 3, and sec. 159—29 Vict. c. 36, sec. 8.—Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that a tenant of a mineral field in computing “the profits received therefrom” for assessment of income-tax is not entitled to write off and deduct from the gross earnings of any particular year a sum to represent the capital expended in pit-sinking exhausted by the year’s workings.

Question, whether in any case expenses of sinking pits can be allowed as deductions from gross profits in assessing for income-tax.

Lord Blackburn.

At delivering judgment,—

EARL CAIRNS.—My Lords, this is an appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session, in which the appellants, an iron company at Coltness, contend that in the rating for the property and income-tax they ought not to be assessed on a sum of £9027, a portion of the gross proceeds of their mines for the year ending the 5th of April 1878. The description of this sum of £9027, upon which the appellants contend that they should not be rated, as given in the case originally, was this : "The Coltness Iron Company, carrying on business at Coltness, appealed against the assessment made on them under schedule D of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35," "and subsequent Income-Tax Acts referring thereto, in respect of the profits arising from their business for the year preceding (1878) in so far as the said assessment includes a sum of £9027, being the costs incurred by them in sinking new pits ; and for which they maintain they were not assessable. The Coltness Iron Company stated, and it is the fact, that for a number of years they have carried on business as coal and iron-masters, and have opened up several mineral fields, sinking new pits at their own expense from time to time as the old ones have become exhausted ; and they submitted that in ascertaining the profits on which they are liable to be assessed under the said Act, there ought to be deducted from the gross annual receipts derived from their business the sums expended by them in sinking the said pits."

No. 7.

Co. v. Black.

This and the other statements in the special case, when the appeal first came before your Lordships, were not deemed by your Lordships to be sufficiently explicit, and you remitted the case for amendment. This amendment has now been made, and I will read the statement as to this sum of £9027 in the amended case. "The sum of £9027 claimed as a deduction from the assessments by the appellants does not represent the cost of pit-sinking during the year, but is a sum arrived at by calculating 2s. a ton on iron made, and 1½d. a ton on coal sold during the year ; it being estimated that this will properly represent the amount of capital expended on making bores and sinking pits which has been exhausted by the year's working. The cost of making bores and sinking pits is charged in the books of the company to an account called 'sunk capital account,' and is written off annually by a sum computed at the respective rates above specified on the quantities of iron made and coal sold in the year, as representing the capital expended on pit-sinking exhausted by the year's working. The working charges deducted and allowed in ascertaining the profits for assessment include the whole cost of getting and raising the minerals after the pits are sunk, and of manufacturing the metal and selling the iron and coal, and the general expenses of the concern."

It therefore now appears that the statement in the case as it originally stood is not sustained, and that the sum in question does not represent the cost of pit-sinking during the year of which the profits are taken. I am not prepared to say that under the words of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, a mine-owner might not in some cases be entitled to an allowance in respect of the cost of sinking a pit, by means of which pit the minerals are gotten which are the source of profit for the year in which the pit was sunk. I desire to reserve my opinion on that point until the question arises. But in the present case the question is altogether different. It is, as now explained, Can a mine-owner write off and deduct from the gross earnings of his mine in a particular year a sum to represent that year's depreciation of all the pits in the mines whenever sunk ? I am clearly of opinion that this cannot be done. It may be proper for a trader, or for a trading company, to perform in his or their books an operation of this kind every year, in order to judge of the sum that can in that year be safely taken out of the trade and spent as trade profits. But I am clearly of opinion that the owner of a mine cannot qua owner thus manipulate his accounts when the question is, under section 60 of the principal Act, What is the "amount of profits received" from the mine in each of the five years upon which the average is to be taken ?

My Lords, I do not think this question is affected by 29 Vict. c. 36. That Act provides that mines shall be charged and assessed according to the rules prescribed by schedule D of the principal Act, so far as such rules are consistent with No. 3 of schedule A. But the thing to be assessed remains the same.

Coltness Iron
Co. v. Black.

Your Lordships were referred by the appellants to a decision, viz., Knowles v. McAdam, in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice in England,¹ as an authority in their favour. Your Lordships are now sitting in appeal from the Court of Session, but even supposing that case were a Scotch authority I am bound to say that it is a decision which does not seem to me to be capable of being supported, and which I could not advise your Lordships to follow.

I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed, with costs; but this should not include any costs of or rendered necessary by the remit, the occasion for which arose out of a want of accuracy in stating the case, chargeable to both parties alike.

LORD PENZANCE.—My Lords, the argument of the appellants was based on the interpretation which they gave to the word “profit” in the Act. And it was contended that they could not be properly said to have made any profit out of their mines until a certain portion of the cost of making the bores and sinking the pits, necessary to approach the mineral-bearing strata, was deducted.

In a general, and perhaps a strict and logical sense, I think this is true. But it is also, and equally true, I think, that the cost of the mineral strata themselves, whether they have been hired or bought, should be included in any calculation which had for its object the ascertainment of the actual profit obtained by the company out of the entire adventure—so much for the prime cost of the mineral bed, so much for approaches to it in the shape of pits, so much for working it and getting the mineral to the surface, so much for getting the mineral to the market, and against all these the price obtained for the mineral sold—these would be the elements of a profit and loss account of an entire adventure of this nature. But is this the sense in which the word “profit” is used in the Act? I think not.

The intention of the Act, it is abundantly clear, was in schedule A to tax “property.” If a man had bought an estate the tax was intended to be paid by him on the annual value of that estate, without reference to where he got it, or how he got it, or how much he paid for it. So if a man built a house or bought a house, he was intended to pay tax on the annual value of the house, no matter what it cost. Nor does anything turn upon the fact that the estate is a permanent and undecaying species of property, while the house is a species of property of a less durable kind; he was intended to pay tax upon it as long as it lasted.

What, then, is the case of a mine? In the schedule A, which is the schedule applicable to “property,” a “mine” is in express terms included as a species of “property,” and is made the subject of a tax. The only question is, how shall the annual value of this species of property be ascertained? It is to this object that the rule No. 3, found in section 60 of the Act, is addressed. That rule assumes the ownership of the “mine,” passes by altogether the sum of money which it may have cost, either in the way of purchase or rent, and proceeds to describe the method of calculating its “annual value” to the owners thereof,

No. 7.

April 7, 1881.
Coltness Iron
Co. v. Black.

and this it declares shall be the average "profit" over a period of five years, "received therefrom." The words "profits received therefrom" are here introduced to define the annual value of the thing which is to be taxed, which is the "mine," and it could not, I think, be intended that for the purpose of calculating the "annual value" of a "mine," the original cost of the "mine" itself, or any part of it, should be first deducted. On the contrary, the words "profits received therefrom," in this connection, mean, I think, the entire profit derived from the "mine," deducting the cost of working it, but not deducting the cost of making it.

I do not think the subject is elucidated, but rather confused, by the illustration brought forward in argument of the merchant or trader, who spends a sum of money or invests capital in the purchase of goods, and sells them again at an advance in price. No doubt in such a case the "profit" can only be ascertained by first deducting the original cost of the goods. If a man spends £100 in the purchase of goods and sells them for £140, his profit is not £140, but at most £40 only.

But when such a matter as that is brought under the provisions of this Act for taxation, the wide difference between it and the present case is at once apparent; for the merchant or trader is taxed in such a case not in respect of any "property" which he possesses, and of which he enjoys the fruits, but only upon the profits which he realises annually in his trade; whereas the owner of a "mine" is taxed in respect of that "mine" as a fixed and realised "property" which belongs to him, and from which he reaps an annual benefit; and the words "annual value" or "profit received" from that "property" are introduced into the statute, not as the subject of taxation, but only as the measure of the taxation to which the "property" shall be subjected.

A pit sunk to approach the mineral underground is not unlike a road made above ground, from the pit's mouth to the highway, as a means of transporting the mineral to the market. If a man were possessed of such a mine and such a road, it would be true that as the mineral was gradually worked out the road, and the capital sunk in making it, equally with the pit, and the capital involved in making it, would gradually be exhausted and lost; but the decaying character of the property would not make it the less subject to be taxed, according to its annual value or the profit obtained by using it, as long as the mineral lasted.

This, I think, is the principle that runs through the entire Act, and your Lordships could not, I think, sustain the present appeal without introducing principles which would entirely subvert the method of taxation which the Legislature intended, and according to which this statute has hitherto been administered.

I agree that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs, subject to the exception mentioned by my noble and learned friend.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, this case was stated in order to be able to ask your Lordships to review the decision of the Court of Session in the case of Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue,¹ and reliance was placed on the decision of the Exchequer Division in Knowles v. M'Adam.² Both of those decisions were pronounced at a time when there was no appeal against either; and as they were, I think justly, considered inconsistent with each other, it is important that both should be brought under review.

The Coltness Company appealed against the assessment for the year 1878, in so far as the assessment includes a sum of £9027, being the cost incurred by them in sinking new pits. It was thought that the statement of facts contained in the case was not sufficiently full to enable this House finally to dispose of the points of law on which its decision was asked, and it was directed that it should be amended, which was done. And the result shews that this was requisite; for the amended case, besides entering into various details as to the mode of pit-sinking and working the mines in the appellants' mineral field, contains a statement as to what the £9027 consisted of, which I think could not have been collected from the statements in the original case.

No. 7.

April 7, 1881.
Coltness Iron
Co. v. Black.

I think it is not necessary to inquire what other points might possibly have been raised on the other facts, still less to decide them, if that statement shews that the sum of £9027 is not properly to be deducted from the assessment. I will read that statement. "The sum of £9027 claimed as a deduction from the assessment by the appellants does not represent the cost of pit-sinking during the year, but is a sum arrived at by calculating 2s. a ton on iron made, and 1½d. a ton on coal sold during the year; it being estimated that this will properly represent the amount of capital expended on making bores and sinking pits which has been exhausted by the year's working. The cost of making bores and sinking pits is charged in the books of the company to an account called 'sunk capital account,' and is written off annually by a sum computed at the respective rates above specified, on the quantities of iron made and coal sold in the year, as representing the capital expended on pit-sinking exhausted by the year's working. The working charges deducted and allowed in ascertaining the profits for assessment include the whole cost of getting and raising the minerals, after the pits are sunk, and of manufacturing the metal and selling the iron and coal, and the general expenses of the concern."

The phrase "capital exhausted" does not occur anywhere in the Income-Tax Act. It is taken from a passage in Mr M'Culloch on Political Economy, where he says,—"Profits must not be confounded with the produce of industry primarily received by the capitalist. They really consist of the produce on its value remaining to those who employ their capital in an industrial undertaking after all their necessary payments have been deducted, and after the capital wasted and used in the undertaking has been replaced. If the produce derived from an undertaking, after defraying the necessary outlay, be insufficient to replace the capital exhausted, a loss has been incurred; if the capital is merely sufficient to replace the capital exhausted, there is no surplus, there is no loss, but there is no annual profit, and the greater the surplus is, the greater the profit."

I do not feel at all inclined to dispute the sufficiency of this definition. I think that if a building society had taken a building lease, and it became necessary at any time to ascertain what profit or loss had been made by it from that lease, all the money expended in building houses would be placed on one side of the account, and on the other all that had been received for houses let or sold, and the value during the residue of the building lease of the houses then remaining in the society's hands, and that value would of course be less and less as the lease drew nearer to an end; and if in the first year of the building lease a house was built at a cost of, say, £10,000, and the profit or loss on the lease had to be estimated when the residue of the building lease was reduced to, say, five years, and the lease of the house for those five years would sell for only, say, £5000, I do not think it inaccurate to say that in computing the profit or loss on the building lease, £5000 would be allowed as capital invested in building that house and now exhausted. But that is certainly not the scheme of the income-tax as far as regards building leases and other properties comprised in schedule A, No. 1. The tax is imposed on the annual value of the block of buildings, which is to be taken at the rack-rent at which the same are worth to let for the year. By no process of reasoning could that rack-rent be made to depend on the sum which had been expended in building the houses, or to be greater or less according as the building lease was longer or shorter. Mines are not comprised in schedule A, No. 1, but in schedule A, No. 3, and the tax is imposed on them by a different set of words certainly. And if the decision in *Knowles v. M^rAdam*¹ is correct, it is imposed on a radically different principle. I have felt myself constrained to advise your Lordships to say that the case of *Knowles v. M^rAdam*¹ was wrongly decided.

Coltneess Iron

I think the question thus raised can hardly be decided without examining at some, I fear tedious, length the enactments on the construction of which it depends. No tax can be imposed on the subject without words in an Act of Parliament clearly shewing an intention to lay a burden on him. But when that intention is sufficiently shewn it is, I think, vain to speculate on what would be the fairest and most equitable mode of levying that tax. The object of those framing a taxing Act is to grant to Her Majesty a revenue; no doubt they would prefer, if it were possible, to raise that revenue equally from all, and, as that cannot be done, to raise it from those on whom the tax falls with as little trouble and annoyance and as equally as can be contrived; and when any enactments for the purpose can bear two interpretations, it is reasonable to put that construction on them which will produce these effects. But the object is to grant a revenue at all events, even though a possible nearer approximation to equality may be sacrificed in order more easily and certainly to raise that revenue, and I think the only safe rule is to look at the words of the enactments and see what is the intention expressed by those words.

Before, however, proceeding to examine the words of the Income-Tax Acts, on which, in my opinion, everything depends, I wish to point out that, long before any income or property-tax was imposed for general revenue, the parochial authorities in England raised a revenue for parochial purposes, which was very much in the nature of an income and property-tax. And the language used in the Income-Tax Acts is such as to convince me that the Legislature had in their contemplation what had been done in this branch of the law, which, if not exactly in pari materid, is at least an analogous subject. I think it more convenient to state briefly what was the state of the law as to rating real property in general, and (though, by a very narrow construction, the specific mention of coal mines was held to exclude all other mines) of coal mines, quarries, &c., in particular.

By the statute of 43 Eliz. c. 2, the churchwardens and overseers of the parish were empowered to raise, "by taxation of every inhabitant, parson, vicar, and others, and of every occupier of lands, houses, tithes, impropriate or propriations of tithes, coal mines, or saleable underwoods in the said parish," a sufficient sum. The power to rate the inhabitants as such was put an end to by a temporary Act, 3 and 4 Vict. c. 89, continued from year to year, and finally made perpetual by 37 and 38 Vict. c. 96. The power to tax the occupiers of the species of property named in the Act of Elizabeth continued. No. 7.

In 1827 (*King v. Attwood*¹) a case was stated for the Court of King's Bench April 7, 1881. Coltness Iron Co. v. Black. as to the principle of rating coal mines. Chief Justice Abbott delivered a judgment which is so germane to the subject we are now considering that I will read the whole of it, as it is not long:—"We are all of opinion that the owner and occupier of a coal mine should be rated at such a sum as it would let for, and no more. As to the other points, the first was that the rate should not be imposed upon the coal produced, because that was part of the realty. It is the first time that such a proposition has ever been submitted, although many coal mines in various parts of the country have constantly been rated, and the argument in support of it is wholly untenable. The Legislature has expressly made coal mines rateable, and they must be rated for what they produce, viz, the coals. Slate quarries and brick earth are also exhausted in a few years, but nevertheless the rate is always imposed on that which is produced. The other argument was, that the rate could not be imposed until the expense of planting the mine had been recouped. But I cannot discover any distinction between expenses incurred in bringing a mine to a productive state and in building a house. The attempt to distinguish them is perfectly novel, and if a house is to be rated as soon as it is built and occupied, it must follow that a coal mine is rateable as soon as it is set to work and produces coal, although it may happen that the expense of sinking it may never be recovered. If the tenant of a mine expends money in making it more productive, that is the same as expending money in improving a farm or a house, in which cases the tenant is rateable for the improved value."

I do not say that what Lord Tenterden here lays down as to the taxation of a coal mine is necessarily either just or expedient; but though this case was decided before the earlier Income-Tax Acts, it was an authoritative declaration of what had been held to be law before, and must have been well known to that large proportion of the legislators who habitually acted at quarter sessions.

The Legislature in 1836, by 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 96, enacted that all poor-rates shall be made "upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rent tax, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, assurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent." And in the form of the rate prescribed there is to be in one column a statement of the "gross estimated rental," and in another of the "rateable value."

The Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, adopts, without any variations which affect this question, the language of the former Income-Tax Act, 46 Geo. III. c. 65. Before that there had been an earlier Income-Tax Act, 43 Geo. III. c. 122, from which there are changes, and I think some of those changes throw light on what was the intention of the Legislature in the substituted enactments. The first Income-Tax Act, 43 Geo. III. c. 122, sec. 31, comprised in schedule A all lands, tenements, hereditaments or heritages, and enacted that for them there shall be charged throughout Great Britain in respect of the property thereof, for every 20s. of the annual value thereof the sum of 1s.; and enacted that "the said duty shall be construed to extend to all manors and messuages, to all quarries of stone, slate, limestone, or chalk ; mines of coal, tin, lead, copper, mundie, iron, and other mines ; to all iron mills, furnaces, and other iron works, and other mills and engines of the like nature ; to all salt springs or salt works," and many more things.

The Legislature here classed together in one schedule properties, such as agricultural land, which from their nature will continue permanently to exist ; and properties, such as quarries, which will certainly come to an end within a period longer or shorter, but the duration of which can be generally calculated ; and properties, such as ironworks, which are real property, deriving their annual value from being ancillary to trade. It imposed one tax at one rate upon them all, and gave one general rule that the annual value should be understood to be the rack-rent ; and it directed that the tax should be paid by the occupier, who might deduct a proportionate part from his rent. And by No. III. there is allowed a deduction for repairs not exceeding five per cent on the annual value of a dwelling-house, or two per cent on the annual value of a farm. But there is not, expressly at least, any allowance made for repairs in respect of other kinds of real property. And by schedule B there is imposed, in addition, a tax on the occupier of all such properties (with some exceptions not material to be noticed), and the first of the rules for estimating the annual value of properties before described in schedules A and B in England is that no such property shall be charged at less than the last poor-rate, which shews that those who framed that Act were thinking of the analogous case of the parochial taxation for the relief of the poor.

The statute 43 Geo. III. c. 122, also, by sec. 84, imposes a duty, by schedule D, upon the annual profits, inter alia, of every trade, and by the rules therein the duty shall be computed upon a sum not less than the full amount of the profits upon a fair and just average of three years without any other deduction than is hereafter allowed ; and the third rule is, no deductions shall be made on account of any sums expended on repairs of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs, or alteration of any utensils or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, beyond the sum usually expended for such purpose according to the average of three years. I conjecture that during the three years that elapsed between the passing of 43 Geo. III. c. 122, and the passing of 46 Geo. III. c. 65, experience had shewn that there were difficulties in working this scheme, and that claims for deductions had been made ; for whilst most of the provisions of the first Act were re-enacted, those to which I have above referred were all materially altered. It is not necessary to go through 46 Geo. III. c. 65 ; for the provisions of that Act are re-enacted in 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, without any alteration which seems to me material to notice.

The third rule as to schedule D, which I have above quoted, still continued to be negative in its form, that no deductions should be made under several enumerated pretences, but the number of these was considerably increased, and—why, I do not know—instead of saying that the duty should be imposed on a fair and just average of the amount of the profits for three years, it is imposed "on the balance" of such profits. I have not been able to discover any difference in the meaning of the two phrases.

The several rates and duties granted by 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, are imposed by sec. 1, schedule A, for all lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages in Great Britain, which shall be charged yearly, "for every 20s. of the annual value thereof, the sum of sevenpence." Then, by section 60, the properties chargeable under schedule A, instead of being, as in statute 43 Geo. III. c. 122, treated together in one schedule, are treated of under numbers. By No. 1 (which gives the general rule, which is the same as that which in 43 Geo. III. c. 122, was applied to all in schedule A), the annual value shall be "understood to be the rent by the year at which the same are let at rack-rent, if they have been let at rack-rent within seven years before the assessment; but if the same are not so let at rack-rent, then at the rack-rent at which the same are worth to be let by the year." And by section 63, in addition to the duties to be charged under schedule A, there shall be levied the duty under schedule B on all properties to be charged according to the general rule in No. 1, with some exceptions not material to this case.

Coltess Iron
Co. v. Black.

The rules, which expressly gave a power to allow for repairs a sum not exceeding a certain percentage on the annual value of houses and farms, are not re-enacted. Nor are the rules above quoted, which refer to the poor-rate in England as being the test of annual value. It is not material in this case to inquire whether the rack-rent mentioned is to be measured by what, in statute 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 96, is called the gross estimated rental, without making any allowance for those annual repairs which the tenant would certainly take into consideration when bidding that rent. It could not have been intended that the rack-rent should be less than the rateable value.

No. 2 and No. 3 comprise properties which are comprised in the general description in schedule A, but which it was not thought expedient to include in schedule B, though in the first Income-Tax Act they had been so included. One would anticipate that the duty imposed on those would be on the rack-rent which they would have been worth to let by the year, and something more in lieu of the duty imposed by schedule B. And as the duty imposed by the poor-law and the duty imposed by the first Income-Tax Act was precisely the same on properties like quarries, which are terminable, and properties which are permanent, one would expect that no distinction would now be made. Whether that is so or not must depend on the true construction of the words used, which, with reference to No. 3, are these:—"The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year, of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited," that is, of quarries, &c., and what may be called miscellaneous properties, one year; of mines, &c., five years. No definition is given of profits for one year. That is left to be ascertained as a matter on the construction of the Act. The rules which are contained in secs. 60, 61, 62, and 64 relate to many things—as to the place where the duties shall be assessed, and the persons by whom they are to be assessed, and also as to many allowances to be made; but I can find nothing in them to throw any light on the construction of the words, "the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year, of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited," that is, in some cases one year, and in some five.

It may be convenient here to notice two arguments not, I think, relied on by the Solicitor-General in his argument at your Lordships' bar, though he had used them before the Exchequer Division in Knowles v. M'Adam.¹ It was said

No. 7.

Coltess Iron

by Lord Cairns in *Gowans v. Christie*¹ that a lease of mines "is not in reality a lease at all in the sense in which we speak of an agricultural lease. There is no fruit—that is to say, there is no sowing and reaping in the ordinary sense of the term, and there are no periodical harvests. What we call a mineral lease is really, when properly considered, a sale out and out of a portion of the land." I think this is a perfectly accurate statement. But the argument that no income-tax should be imposed on what is, perhaps not quite accurately, called rent reserved on a mineral lease, because it is a payment by instalments of the price of minerals forming part of the land, any more than on the price paid down in one sum for the out and out purchase of the minerals forming part of the land, is, I think, untenable. Even if it had not been, as decided in The King v. Attwood,² the constant course from the statute of Elizabeth downwards to construe an annual tax imposed on coal mines, quarries, and the like, as being imposed on that which is produced from them, I should say that no other construction could be placed on the 60th section of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, especially after seeing in what manner the Legislature, in 43 Geo. III. c. 122, had dealt with them; though I think that the judgment of the Exchequer Division in *Knowles v. M'Adam*³ seems an authority to the contrary. From that judgment, however, to which I shall afterwards return, I must ask your Lordships to dissent.

It has also been sometimes argued that it is very unjust to tax at the same rate a terminable interest, such as that in a mine, which must at some time be worked out, and a fee-simple interest, which will endure so long as this world continues in its present state. I will not inquire whether this is just or not. There is much force in the argument on the other side, that if the interest is terminable, so is the tax, and will cease when the interest ceases. But, whether just or not, there can be no doubt that the same annual charge is imposed upon a terminable annuity and on one in perpetuity; and, what seems harder, that the same annual charge is imposed upon a professional income, earned by hard labour, often extending over many years before any return is got, and, when earned, precarious, as depending on the health of the earner.

In 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, the different schedules were kept apart and complete in themselves, but I think wherever there was any provision in any one of the schedules that throws light on what is meant by annual value, or annual profits, or capital, it may be very material in construing the meaning of those words used in other parts of the Act. Thus I think that the provision under the fifth head of No. 2, that an allowance may be made from the amount to be taxed on fines, "if it be proved that such fines, or any part thereof, have been applied as productive capital, on which a profit has arisen or will arise, otherwise chargeable under this Act for the year in which the assessment shall be made," and the provision in schedule D, that "no deduction shall be made on account of any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital," neither of which was in 43 Geo. III. c. 122, throw some light on each other, and may fairly be referred to in inquiring what is meant by "the average amount for one year of the profits received within the time limited." But schedules A and B were complete in themselves, and schedule D, which was regulated by sec. 100, was complete in itself. The duties were, however, assessed by different commissioners, and in different places. By 29 Vict. c. 36, sec. 8: "The several and respective concerns described in No. III. of schedule A of" "5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, shall be charged and assessed to the duties hereby granted in the manner in the said No. 7. III. mentioned, according to the rules prescribed by schedule D of the said Act, so far as such rules are consistent with the said No. III. Provided that the annual value or profit and gains arising from any railway shall be charged and assessed by the commissioners for special purposes." April 7, 1881.

Coltneess Iron
Co. v. Black.

In Knowles v. M'Adam,¹ Chief Baron Kelly says,—“It is quite clear that sec. 8 of 29 Vict. c. 36, transfers the present case” (that of a coal mine) “from schedule A to schedule D,” and the judgments of the Barons in that case seem to me to depend a good deal on this, as it seems to me, erroneous assumption. I think that the duties are to be assessed according to the rules in schedule D, and consequently all the anxiously-devised provisions for keeping the returns under schedule D secret and confidential, to be found from sec. 100 to sec. 131, are made in future to apply to returns for the concerns described in No. III. of schedule A, and any rule expressed as to the mode of computing the balance of the profits and gains during the period of three years given in schedule D which is not inconsistent with No. III., may, perhaps, be made in future to apply to the mode of computing the annual profits of properties chargeable under No. III. And I see that in *Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue*² reliance is placed in the judgment of the Lord President on the 3d rule as to concerns under the first case of schedule D, that no deduction is to be made “for any sum employed, or intended to be employed, as capital.” But I do not think reliance can be placed on this. If, from the nature of the concerns in No. III., an allowance ought to be made for capital, then this rule should be rejected as inconsistent with No. III. If no such allowance should be made, the rule is not required.

In *Forder v. Handyside*³ the Exchequer Division came to a decision as to repairs, estimated but not actually incurred, which, whether it was right or wrong, is no longer, since 41 Vict. c. 15, sec. 12, to apply. And, as there is no question in the case at bar as to repairs, it is unnecessary to inquire whether it was right or wrong.

If the effect of sec. 8 of 29 Vict. c. 36, was to transfer cases in schedule A, No. III., to schedule D, it would change the respective times on an average for which the profits were to be assessed. Mines would be reduced from a five-year period to a three-year period. Quarries and things of that sort would be raised from a single year to three. I cannot think this was either intended or expressed. But, on the assumption that it had this effect, the Exchequer Division came, in Knowles v. M'Adam,⁴ to a very startling decision. In that case a company had bought for a very large sum the minerals in beneficial leaseholds of coal mines, having an average of thirty-two years to run, and in freeholds. The decision of the Exchequer Division was that the effect of transferring the mines, as they thought, from schedule A to schedule D, was to cause the company to be assessed as persons carrying on the trade of vendors of coal, who had bought wholesale a large quantity of coal, not stored in warehouses but in the earth, and which they were going to sell in the course of their trade; and that they ought to be assessed on the principle of valuing the stock-in-trade, that is, the coals thus stored in the earth at the beginning of the three years, and again valuing the stock at the end of the three years; and taking the difference between them as being to be added to or deducted from the net receipts during that period in estimating the profits for the three years. The effect of this would be that though the mines were worked so as to produce a large profit above the working expenses, yet if they were worked by a purchaser who had over-estimated the value of the minerals, and paid such a price for them that he was a loser, no income-tax was to be paid in respect of those mines. That is a result which never could have been intended by the Legislature, and if it follows by legitimate reasoning from the interpretation put upon 29 Vict. c. 36, sec. 8, it seems to me a reductio ad absurdum, shewing that the interpretation was wrong.

I therefore advise your Lordships to hold that the decision in *Knowles v. M'Adam*¹ was erroneous. I do not wish to lay down any general proposition, either that money expended in sinking pits can never be in the nature of expenses incurred within the five years in working the coal, so as to be properly taken into account in estimating the profits made at that period; or to say what, if any, the circumstances are under which it may be done. That, I think, had better be left to be determined when the case arises. I think it enough to say that this sum of £9027, described in the case, is not such as ought to be deducted.

The result is that, in my opinion, the interlocutor below should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs, with the modification proposed by the noble and learned Earl.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs, except the costs incurred by reason of the remit.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR, BART. (Defender), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Sir F. Herschell—Webster, Q.C.
THE CAITHNESS FLAGSTONE QUARRYING COMPANY (Pursuers), Respondents.
—Benjamin, Q.C.—Asher.

Writ—Holograph Writing regarding Heritage—Agreement between Landlord and Tenant written by factor to Landlord's dictation.—Where a proposed additional agreement between a landlord and tenant was dictated by the landlord to his factor in the tenant's presence and handed to the tenant unsigned, and subsequently accepted by the tenant in writing, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the writings did not constitute a completed contract, the first writing being neither holograph of the landlord nor the writ of his factor, and that the tenant was therefore entitled to rescind.

Agreements and Contracts—Construction and Effect—Lease.—By agreement, supplementary to their lease, the tenants of certain quarries agreed to construct a tramway from the quarries "by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle to their works at Thurso East," and "to compensate the tenants along the line for any damage done to their farms." The landlord, who was proprietor of Thurso Castle, agreed "to give gratuitously the land required for the tramway."

From the southmost corner, and along the west wall of the policy, there ran a private occupation road belonging to the landlord, between the policy wall and the foreshore of the estuary of Thurso river, leading from the public road to the tenants' works, and thence to the offices of Thurso Castle. By this road the tenants had been accustomed to cart their material from the quarries to their works, and on it there was room to lay a tramway without interfering with other traffic. It was the only practicable route outside the policy. But before reaching the tenants' works it passed through the works of another quarry company, who, it was alleged by the tenants, would object to the construction of the tramway through their yard. No. 8.

In a question between the landlord and tenants, the latter claiming right to make their tramway through the policy of the former, held (rev. judgment of First Division) that the meaning of the agreement between the parties was that the tramway should be constructed outside the policy wall, and that the land-lord was not bound to give the tenants any right to the ground required, except such rights as belonged to him, but must give them the use of his name in any proceedings necessary to vindicate their rights. LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, it is impossible to regard the litigation in this case without feelings of regret, and I am satisfied that your Lordships ought not, on technical grounds, to abstain now from dealing with it in the way which may appear to you best calculated to put an end to it, by doing substantial justice between the parties. The respondents, who were pursuers in the action, are lessees under the appellant of (what appear to be) valuable and important quarry works, and they have made an expenditure, which must be considerable, in part performance of the agreement out of which the litigation has arisen. The alternative conclusion of their summons, and their first plea in law, are wide enough to enable your Lordships to give them whatever they really ought to have, although they may be wrong in that particular view of their rights for which they have contended, and which they have presented as if it were the only possible view, in their condescendence. If the form of the allegations in the 5th and 6th articles of the condescendence had been regarded in the Inner-House as narrowing and limiting the summons, so as to disable the Court from giving effect to the alternative conclusion, except in a sense which practically nullifies it (and which, having regard to the words “in any other place,” and “under and subject to the terms of said agreement,” I do not myself think it will fairly bear), I have no doubt that a formal amendment of the record, under the Act of 1868, ought to have been, and would have been, allowed. The parties had gone into evidence on the whole matter, with reference to every possible view of the effect of the agreement, and the proper mode of performing it. The addition of a few words to the pursuers’ statements would have removed all technical objection, without rendering any further evidence really necessary. There is no trace of any such technical objection having been taken before the Inner-House; the case was there dealt with on grounds of substance, not of form. My opinion is that your Lordships ought also so to deal with it, in accordance with what I have always understood to be a principle acted upon here, that objections of a merely formal kind, which do not appear to have been insisted upon, and which would have been remediable, in the Court below, ought not to prevail upon appeal.

Upon the merits, both parties have contended for more than they were justly entitled to. The contention of the defender (appellant here), that the agreement of the 21st of February 1878 was altered by the unsigned proposal of the 28th of September 1878, and Mr Gunn’s letter of the 21st of October following, is untenable in law, that proposal not being holograph of the defender, in whose name it throughout speaks, and Mr Logan (whose holograph it is) not having written it under any authority then entrusted to him by the defender to negotiate an agreement on his behalf. But I think it is only just to say, that the blame of the subsequent failure to settle the dispute upon the terms of that proposal does not appear to me to rest exclusively with either party; and, as the costs of the litigation have not been either caused, or substantially increased by the appellant's contention on this point, I think the case may properly be dealt with, both as to costs and otherwise, without any further reference to it.

Upon the construction of the agreement of the 21st of February 1878, I think that the respondents are wrong.

The material facts, with reference to which that agreement ought to be construed, are the following:—The respondents are lessees from the appellant, Sir Tollemache Sinclair, for the residue of a term of twenty-one years, commencing at Martinmas 1874, of the Weydale and other quarries, and of a piece of ground, with buildings thereon, occupied and used by them for the purpose of their pavement works at Thurso East. Their quarries are at a considerable distance to the south from these pavement works. The whole of the land between the quarries and the end of the policy or home grounds of Thurso Castle, where the appellant resides, belongs to the appellant, being in the occupation of his agricultural tenants, who were bound by their contracts to give up to him, for a suitable compensation, such part of the lands occupied by them as he might require for roads. These lands are separated from the castle policy by the public turnpike road leading from Thurso to Wick, and the policy itself runs down to a sharp angle, point, or end, to the south-west, abutting upon this public road. The agricultural land, already mentioned, lies on the other side to the south. The soil of the turnpike road is vested in the appellant, subject to the rights of the public, and to the powers of the road trustees. The policy is bounded westward by a park wall, on the western side of which there is an occupation road diverging from the turnpike road at the exact point where the policy ends, and proceeding thence northwards. This occupation road is itself bounded to the west for some distance from its junction with the turnpike road by a public park not the property of the appellant; and afterwards, for some distance further, by the shore of the Thurso estuary, which does belong to the appellant. Along this it continues to run, close to and in a line with the policy wall, until it reaches a parcel of land lying between the policy and the estuary, which is also a part of the appellant's estate, but is leased by him as a pavement yard to another company called "The Co-operative Pavement Manufacturing Company at Thurso," for a term of eleven years, commencing at Whitsuntide 1872. The same occupation road is continued northward through this parcel of land until it passes into the respondents' pavement works at Thurso East, where it terminates. The soil of this occupation road belongs throughout to the appellant. The co-operative company are bound, by their contract with him, to keep it, where it passes through their pavement yard, free from obstructions, "so as to admit of full and free access to and from Thurso East at all times during the currency of their lease." The respondents are, by the terms of their lease, entitled to use it; and they are bound to bear two-thirds of the expense of keeping it in repair through the whole of its course from the turnpike road to Thurso East, the other third being borne by the appellant. They have, in fact, been in the habit of carrying along it, in waggons and trucks, all the stone brought from their quarries to their pavement works; and it appears from the evidence that in or about 1870 there was a "stone tramway" laid down upon it, which "continued to be used till the stones got so much worn that they became useless." Whether the solum of this road, where it passes through the nd of the co-operative company, is included in that company's lease, is not upon the evidence clear ; but the more probable inference from that evidence No. 8.

seems to me to be that it is not.

policy, to the nearest part of the respondents' pavement works at Thurso East, Sinclair v. is more than one-third of the whole extent of the policy grounds, measured in a Caithness straight line from south-west to north-east. Flagstone Quarrying Co.

It appears, from the evidence of the witnesses for the appellant, that there would be no practical difficulty in carrying a tramway or railway (in continuation of that already made by the respondents from the Weydale Quarry, under the agreement of the 21st of February 1878, to a point near, and a little to the south-west of, the end or southern angle of the castle policy), along the occupation road, without interfering with any use of it, for access or egress to or from the pavement yard, to which the co-operative company may be entitled. It is stated to be about twenty-five feet in breadth in its narrowest part, and, at its widest, twenty-nine feet, of which (according to the evidence of the witness Belfrage, which I see no reason to disbelieve) ten feet only would be required for the width of the tramway and the trucks passing along it, seventeen feet of roadway remaining available, at the same time, for other traffic.

The agreement, which your Lordships have to construe with reference to this state of facts, provided that the respondents should "construct a tramway or railway from the Old Weydale Quarry by the Moss of Weydale, thence near Stainland House, near Oldfield House, and by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle to their works at Thurso East." The Moss of Weydale, Stainland House, and Oldfield House were all in that part of the appellant's estate which was let to his agricultural tenants, to the south of the turnpike road. Neither the turnpike road nor the occupation road is mentioned in the agreement ; but the former must necessarily be crossed by the intended tramway or railway. The respondents further agreed "to compensate the tenants along the line for any damage done to their farms during the currency of their leases." The appellant agreed "to give gratuitously the land required for said tramway or railway." There were also stipulations, which need not be stated in detail, as to a contribution by the appellant towards the maintenance of the road when made ; as to payment of one-half of the value of the tramway by the appellant to the respondents, in the event of his letting the Weydale Quarries to any other person, or taking them into his own hands, at the end of the respondents' term ; and as to a right given to the respondents to sell the materials of the tramway in certain other events. The agreement concluded with these words :—"The direction of the line to be adjusted between Mr Logan and the company,"—Mr Logan being the appellant's man of business.

The principal contest has been upon the meaning of the words "by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle ;" the respondents insisting that, as the appellant was "to give gratuitously" all the land required for the tramway, and as the tramway was to be carried as far as the respondents' works at Thurso East, it must be carried up to those works from the turnpike road through the policy itself, where no other rights or claims of right than those of the appellant could possibly come in question. This would have involved a passage, not through any small corner of the policy which could reasonably be described as its "end," but through more than one-third of its entire length ; and it appears to me that a construction which could have such an effect would do extreme violence to the natural meaning of the words. If those words had been "by the policy" f they might possibly have meant by way of the policy; as "by the Moss of Weydale" meant by way of or through the Moss. But "by the end" naturally means that the tramway was to pass by, and to be carried on the outside of that angle or point in which (as has been stated) the policy ends. It cannot have been intended to exclude from the line of the tramway everything in the nature of an existing roadway over which other persons besides the appellant and the respondents might have some rights of passage or traffic; because it was, at all events, absolutely necessary that the tramway should at some point cross the turnpike road. If, at that point, the agreement on the appellant's part might be performed by giving gratuitously to the respondents all his right to that part of the solum of the turnpike road, leaving them to make their own terms with the turnpike trustees, still more might it be performed by giving up to them, for the like purpose, as much as might be necessary of the solum of the occupation road, or of the seashore in which, subject to their own right of way, and to the rights (whatever they might be) of the co-operative company, the appellant had the absolute property. If, indeed, there had been no land belonging to the appellant which he could gratuitously give to the respondents, westward of the policy wall—if it had been apparent from the facts that the parties could not have had in their contemplation any mode of carrying the tramway from the turnpike road to the respondents' pavement works except through the policy—it might have been necessary to interpret the words, "by the end of the policy," in a sense different from their natural and prima facie construction; but the facts being such as they actually are, and having been within the knowledge of both parties at the date of the agreement, I think the natural construction of those words must prevail. There was no legal or other impediment to the construction of the tramway along the course of the occupation road (whether with or without any deviation where the road skirts the seashore) up to the point where the occupation road enters the pavement yard of the co-operative company; and I think it probable, upon the evidence (though in the absence of the co-operative company it cannot be so decided), that the tramway might lawfully be carried, by the concurrence of the appellant and the respondents, along the course of the same road, through the co-operative company's yard. Supposing, however, that it might be necessary for the respondents, during the residue of the co-operative company's lease, to obtain the consent of, or make some terms with that company (as they would be obliged to do with the turnpike trustees), I think they must be regarded as having entered into the agreement with sufficient knowledge of that possible liability, and without any engagement on the part of the appellant either to indemnify them from it or (if any difficulty should arise out of it) to let them carry the tramway through the castle policy. I do not think that the possibility of such a difficulty arising could constitute a reason for interpreting the words "by the end of the policy" in any other than their natural sense. What happened afterwards cannot be used in aid of the construction of those words. It is, however, satisfactory to know that the position in which the respondents will be placed by holding them to the natural construction of the agreement is not different (so far as the passage through the yard of the co-operative company is concerned) from that in which they would have been placed by the arrangement to which they, through Mr Gunn, were willing to consent on the 21st of October 1878, if that arrangement had been carried into effect. By the proposal, of which Mr Gunn then signed his acceptance, they would have acquired a right to carry the tramway along a narrow strip of land now lying within the policy wall (which was to have been taken down and rebuilt on the east side of the tramway), up to the point where the occupation road enters the yard of the co-operative company, but no further. It would have been just as necessary under that proposal as under the agreement of the 21st of February to continue the tramway along the course of the occupation road through the co-operative company's yard in order to reach its intended terminus in the respondents' works at Thurso East.

Taking this view of the rights of the parties, it appears to me that the declarations contained in the interlocutor of the First Division, now appealed from, are less favourable than they ought to have been to the appellant; and that the appellant ought not to have been required to state in a minute in what line he proposes that the portion of the tramway therein mentioned shall be formed, and what ground he proposes to furnish for that purpose. I think, therefore, that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed, except in so far as it recalls the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I have had an opportunity of seeing the terms of the order, which one of my noble and learned friends, who is peculiarly conversant with the administration of justice in Scotland, proposes to substitute for it; and, agreeing as I do with the form of order which he suggests, I recommend to your Lordships that it should be adopted. I am also quite content that the costs of the appeal and the expenses in the Court below should be disposed of (as my noble and learned friend proposes) by giving them to the appellant, who has succeeded upon the substantial question raised in the respondents' condescendence.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, this cause comes before your Lordships in a manner which has given me some anxiety. My difficulty has principally been that I doubted whether it was competent, on this state of the proof, to decide a question which has not yet arisen, and may probably never arise, namely, what were the obligations which, by the agreement of the 21st of February 1878, the defender took upon himself, in case the co-operative society should raise an objection to the tramway being laid along the private road running through their yard. It was for some time supposed by both parties that they were bound by the substituted agreement of September-October 1878. I agree with and need not repeat the reasons for saying that this substituted agreement was one from which either of the parties could resile, and when either did so resile the parties were remitted to their rights under the agreement of February 1878, which, though informal, had been so acted upon that neither party could resile from it.

But for some months both parties were under the belief that they were bound by this substituted agreement. According to it the line was to run along the west end of the policy, and then across the co-operative company's yard above the road. The co-operative company were under no obligation to assent to this line crossing what was unquestionably their yard, and it appears from a document, No. 102 of process, that they asked for an apparently unreasonable concession as the consideration of their assent. Whether they would have persevered in this demand we cannot tell, for the pursuers were dissatisfied with the agreement of September-October on other grounds, and being advised, and rightly advised, that they could (in point of law) resile from that agreement, they did so, and then the parties were remitted to their rights under the agreement of the 21st of February.

The co-operative company never were asked if they had any objection to rails being laid on the private road, and consequently never objected to it. And it by no means follows that because they asked for an unreasonable concession in return for their assent when they had a clear right, reason or none, to refuse their assent, they should object where their right to object, unless they shewed some damage to themselves, would be, to say the least, very doubtful.

I doubted whether it was not premature to decide this question; but I agree that we cannot enable the parties to dispose of the whole matter really in controversy without having recourse to a new action unless we do decide this question. And, having had the advantage of reading and considering the opinion of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson) I am satisfied that we both can and ought to decide it.

I think it will be convenient now to read the document on the construction of which, I think, everything depends. (His Lordship then read the agreement of the 21st of February 1878, which will be found in Lord Watson's opinion, post, p. 85).

I think that the words "by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle," in their primary and natural sense, mean skirting the policy outside the end of it, but I do not think they are so express as necessarily to mean nothing else. And if the state of things with relation to which the agreement was made had been known to both parties to be such that no tramway could practically have been made outside the park wall and between it and the river, so that no tramway could have been made to the company's works at Thurso East without going across the policy, I think that the words might have been construed in a secondary sense as meaning that the line was to go across the policy near its end. But this is not the case. The private road of Sir Tollemache, which is used as a cart road by the pursuers, is a line along which a tramway might very well be laid. It is suggested that the co-operative company might object to rails being laid along the road where it passes between the two portions of land accupied by them as a pavement yard. It is, I think, a mistake in fact to say that they have objected. And in common with all the Judges below, I do not see on what ground they could object. But even if they had a right to object, and exercised that right, that would not, as I think, be an admissible ground for construing the agreement of the 21st of February 1878. It would raise the question, whether under this agreement Sir Tollemache did more than agree to allow the pursuers to take this road for the purpose of laying the tramway on it without making any charge for it, leaving it to them to overcome the objections of the co-operative company if they were unfounded, or, if the co-operative company were able to shew that they had a valid ground of objection, whether Sir Tollemache was bound to make compensation in damages for having promised more than he could perform.

I have, not without hesitation, come to the conclusion that it is necessary to decide this; and I think, therein agreeing with Lord Shand and the Lord Ordinary, that all that the defender bound himself to do was to give the pursuers such rights in the ground as belonged to him, and allow them to use such rights for the purpose of forming the line and overcoming any opposition that might be offered to it, making no charge for so doing. But I do not think that the agreement involves any engagement on the part of the defender to indemnify them against such opposition, or, in the improbable event of its being well founded, to allow the pursuers to carry the line across the policy.

I should have come to this conclusion on the words, and from the nature of the agreement, but the express stipulation as to making compensation to the tenants along the line for any damage done to their farms during the currency of their leases strongly confirms that view. It was known to both parties that the defender had reserved in his leases a right to take possession of such part of their farms as was needed for the purpose of making roads across them, making compensation; and I think that they agreed that the pursuers should exactly stand in his shoes in that respect. And this, I think, throws light upon the intention of the parties as to what was to be done in regard to the road through the co-operative company's yard.

I think that this was not the view taken by the Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure, and I think that, construing the interlocutor appealed against by the aid of what they said, the finding in it that the defender is "bound to furnish gratuitously the ground necessary for the formation," &c., must be, or at least may be, read as deciding this question against the defender. It is the only point in which I think their interlocutor wrong, but I think it is wrong in that, and that it should be altered in the manner proposed by Lord Watson.

I agree that the defender was justified in coming to this House to get rid of this interlocutor, and though he, no doubt, was also desirous of setting up the substituted agreement of September-October 1878, and was wrong in that, I think he should be allowed his expenses of the appeal, as well as those in the Court below.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the respondent company are tenants of the slate and pavement quarries of Weydale, Heathfield, and others, in the parish of Thurso and county of Caithness, under a lease from the appellant for a period of twenty-one years, ending on the 11th of November 1895. The subjects let to the company include a yard at Thurso East, lying on the west side of the policy of Thurso Castle, between the policy wall and the Thurso River, in which the rough material from the quarries is dressed and prepared for market. Down to the year 1878 the undressed stones were carted from the quarries, which are situated about three miles to the south-east of the yard.

On the 21st of February 1878 an informal written agreement was entered into between the appellant and the company, by which the latter undertook to construct "a tramway or railway from the Old Weydale Quarry by the Moss of Weydale, thence near Stainland House, near Oldfield House, and by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle, to their works at Thurso East." The company agreed to compensate the tenants along the line for any damage done to their farms during the currency of their leases, and the appellant, on the other hand, agreed to "give gratuitously the land required for the said tramway or railway." It was also arranged that the direction of the line should be adjusted between Mr Logan, the appellant's factor, and the company. The agreement, though improbativ, has been validated rei interventu. The route from the Old Weydale Quarry northward, till it approaches the county road leading from Wick to Thurso via Castletown, was amicably adjusted in July 1878. The county road runs along the wall which bounds the policy of Thurso Castle on the south-east; and a private road, belonging to the appellant, branches off from it, at the southernmost corner of the policy, and leads straight north, running for some distance along the west wall of the policy, after which it intersects a pavement yard leased by the appellant to the Caithness Co-operative Company, and then enters the yard of the respondent company, from which there are accesses to the offices of Thurso Castle. The line of tramway, so far as adjusted in July 1878, was shortly thereafter constructed; and, pending the disputes which have arisen as to its further course, it has been extended up to the public road at the southmost end of the policy of Thurso Castle. From the quarries to that point stone and slates are carried by means of the tramway, and are thence conveyed to the yard in carts along the private road. That road has all along been used by the respondents for cartages to and from their yard at Thurso East; and by the terms of their lease they are under obligation to pay two-thirds of the cost of maintaining it in a good and sufficient state of repair.

The respondents, in July 1878, proposed that the tramway, after crossing the county road, should enter the policy a little way to the east of its southmost corner, and should thence proceed northward through the policy until it reached their yard; and the precise line which they proposed to follow was marked out, and submitted to Mr Logan for his consideration. The respondents allege that Mr Logan did actually agree to and adjust with them the line thus indicated; but they have failed to prove the allegation, and it is certain that the appellant objected, and has ever since disputed the right of the respondents to construct any portion of the tramway within the policy under the agreement of the 21st of February 1878.

The action in which the present appeal is taken was not raised by the respondents—for reasons which will shortly appear—until the 15th of August 1879. It concludes that the appellant be ordained to give them the use and possession of land for the purpose of completing the tramway, and that either (1) “within and by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle,” or (2) “in any other place as suitable and convenient for the pursuers in every respect.” The second of these conclusions is wide enough to cover every possible line of access to the respondents’ yard, other than a line “within and by the end” of the policy, and is therefore sufficient to include any line outside the policy. The action is laid upon the agreement of February 1878, and the respondents first allege that in July of that year Mr Logan, acting for the appellant, finally adjusted and settled with them the line then staked out through the policy in terms of the agreement libelled on, and failing that, they allege right to have some other equally convenient route. The terms of the 6th article of their revised condescendence not only make it clear that before bringing the appellant into Court they insisted upon a route within the policy, but very strongly suggest that it was their intention, under the alternative conclusion of the summons, to demand no other route. Their main contention has been that they are entitled, under the agreement in question, to pass through the policy, and in support of that claim they aver (Cond. 5) that “there is no route outside the policies of Thurso Castle over which the said proposed tramway, as described in the agreement, could be constructed to the pursuers’ works, or along which the defender could gratuitously give the pursuers land on which to lay the said tramway. Immediately outside the said policies there is a road which occupies the whole available space for a tramway between the policies and the shore of Thurso River, and the ground occupied by the Co-operative Pavement Company, over which the defender can give no right to make a tramway, intercepts all communication between the pursuers’ works and the point where the tramway line, so far as already constructed, ends, unless the tramway be led through the policy of Thurso Castle the whole way from the said public road between Thurso and Wick to the pursuers’ works.” I do not think these averments were intended to convey the idea that the formation of a tramway along the private road, all the way from the county road to the respondents' works, is a physical impossibility. What, in my opinion, the respondents thereby meant to assert, and do assert, is that the appellant was not in a position to give them an absolute right to form the tramway upon that part of the road which intersects the yard of the co-operative company—that the appellant was bound, under the agreement of February 1878, to give them an absolute right to ground for the tramway, free of all claims at the instance of third parties—and that, being unable to fulfil that obligation by giving a route through the co-operative company's yard, he must implement it by giving a route through his policy.

Sinclair v.

Caithness

Flagstone

Quarrying Co.

The appellant meets these allegations with a general denial, and the only substantive defence which he sets up is founded on two missives, dated respectively the 28th of September and the 21st of October 1878, by which he maintains a valid agreement was constituted, binding the company, subject to the provisions therein made in his favour, to take a strip of the policy ground twenty feet in breadth, along the east side of the private road, for the formation of their tramway. The following is the history of those two missives. At a meeting which took place on the 28th of September, between the appellant, his factor, and several members of the respondent company, an offer was written by Mr Logan, to the appellant's dictation, by which, in consideration of certain alterations to be made upon the conditions of the respondents' lease, the appellant undertook to give them the said strip of ground, provided they took down the policy wall and rebuilt it on the east side of the tramway. That writing was handed, unsigned, to the members of the company present, by the appellant, and the offer therein contained was formally accepted, by a holograph letter, written and subscribed by the managing partner of the company, dated the 21st of October 1878.

I think the Lord President is under a misapprehension when he says that the contract embodied in these two missives "was no sooner agreed to than the parties differed as to what it meant." On the contrary, whilst both parties acted on the footing that the contract was binding until June 1879, I can find no trace of any difference having arisen as to its meaning before the month of May 1879. It appears to have been assumed on both sides that the execution of another deed was necessary in order to give effect to the provisions of the contract, and accordingly, on the 29th of October 1878, a deed of agreement, in duplicate, subscribed by the appellant, was sent by Mr Logan to the respondents for their signature, with a request that one of the duplicates should be returned to him, to be put up with the principal lease. So far from objecting to the terms of the deed, the managing partner of the respondent company, on the 31st of October, informed Mr Logan by letter that it could not be signed by all the partners owing to the absence of one of them, and a month afterwards he wrote to Mr Logan that, in consequence of the continued absence of that partner, he could not yet send the signed deed, but would do so as soon as possible. It does, however, appear that in May 1879 some objection was taken by the respondents to the terms of the agreement, whereupon a minute was substituted for it, which was sent in draft to the respondents on the 19th of May by the appellant's solicitors. On the 31st of May the respondents wrote that they had not been able to finish the revisal of the draft minute, but hoped to be able to do so in a day or two. The objections which they ultimately stated to the terms of the minute were confined to one clause, providing "that the tenants shall have liberty to occupy the said strip of ground for a tramway only, and that until the expiry of the said lease at the term of Martinmas 1895, and no longer." They apparently asserted their right to use the strip in question in perpetuity, and that not only for tramway purposes, but as storage ground. Mr Logan, on the 9th of June 1879, refused to concede that right, and refused to give them possession of the ground until the clause was adjusted, either amicably or by a Court of law. In reply to that communication the respondents, on the 17th of June, intimated that they resiled from the contract of September and October, and reverted to their rights under the agreement of February 1878; and they at the same time requested Mr Logan to point out the route along which their tramway was to be laid in terms of that agreement. I observe that two of the learned Judges of the First Division regard the words of the disputed clause as additional to and constructive of the contract, and hold that the respondents were ready to adopt, in the minute proposed, the ipseissima verba of the contract, and that Mr Logan was wrong in insisting that words should be inserted which were not in the original writing. I am unable to concur in that view, because it is based on the assumption that the whole terms of the contract were to be found in the appellant's unsigned offer of the 28th of September, and ignores the fact that, in the respondents' acceptance, which is pars contractus, the strip of land in question is described by them as "tramway route added to our present lease."

From the time when they first intimated their departure from the September-October agreement, the respondents have persistently claimed either the route staked out by them in July 1878, or some other equally convenient route through the policy of Thurso Castle. On the other hand, the appellant has, with no less persistency, maintained that the respondents are still bound by the agreement of September-October, and that they must, subject to its conditions, take the strip of land therein specified. In their eagerness to make good these respective contentions, the parties seem to have lost sight of the possible alternative of the respondents being only entitled, under the agreement of February, to complete their tramway along a line outside the policy. But the case, as presented to the House, affords ample materials for disposing of that alternative, which is certainly within the conclusions of the summons. The respondents' allegations, which I have already quoted, negating the possibility of any route without the policy, and the appellant's denial of them, have been supported by proof; and they appear to me directly to raise these two questions—(1) whether, by the agreement of February, the appellant is under an absolute obligation to provide the ground necessary for the formation of the tramway; and (2) whether there is any possible route outside the policy.

I shall now advert to the manner in which the case has been dealt with in the Court below.

The Lord Ordinary (Lord Rutherford Clark) assoilzied the appellant from the conclusions of the summons; and the grounds of his judgment are given in the opinion which his Lordship delivered when advising the cause. The learned Judge did not think it necessary to dispose of the appellant's defence, founded on the agreement of September and October 1878. He held that the respondents' case failed, because, according to the just construction of the agreement of February, upon which it was laid, the tramway was to be constructed not within but without the policy, and the appellant merely assented, so far as his rights and interests were concerned, to the respondents making a tramway, and did not undertake to find them the means of making it. No. 8.

The Lords of the First Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and found (1st) that under the agreement of February the respondents are "entitled and bound to construct the tramway therein mentioned;" and (2d) that the defender, on the other hand, is bound to "furnish gratuitously" the ground necessary for the formation of the tramway throughout its whole length, and, in particular, the ground necessary for the formation of that portion hitherto unformed; and, with these findings, they appointed the appellant "to state in a minute in what line he proposes that this portion of the tramway shall be formed, and what ground he proposes to 'furnish' for that purpose." The proposition affirmed by the first of these findings does not appear to have been disputed by either of the parties. In the second the words "furnish gratuitously" were introduced for the purpose of construing, in accordance with the opinions of the majority of the Judges, the expression "give gratuitously," which occurs in the agreement, as implying an obligation on the appellant to give land for the tramway, unincumbered by the rights or interests of any third parties.

The majority consisted of the Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure. The Lord President said,—“Sir Tollemache Sinclair is under an obligation to find a way for this tramway to go from the public road up to the works at Thurso East; and it will be for him to consider in what way he can best fulfil that obligation.” Lord Deas was of opinion that the difficulty of carrying the tramway through the works of the co-operative company was a “difficulty which must be overcome by the landlord;” whilst Lord Mure held the deed of February 1878 to be “an agreement binding Sir Tollemache Sinclair to find ground for the use of that company for the purposes of the tramway to be made to their works.” Their Lordships were of opinion that, according to their primary meaning, the words “by the end of the policy” indicated a line of tramway without the policy; but it is my impression that in the event of the appellant being unable or unwilling to furnish a line through the co-operative company's yard, their Lordships would have construed these words as imposing upon him an obligation to give a route through his policy. Upon this point the Lord President said,—“But while I construe the agreement in his favour as not imposing upon him an absolute obligation to permit the tramway to go through his policy, I think it does impose upon him an obligation to do what is necessary on his part to enable the pursuers to fulfil their obligation to him, to construct the tramway from one of its termini to the other.” Their Lordships were unanimously of opinion that the agreement of September-October was improbativ, and that no rei interventus having followed, the respondents were entitled to rescind from it in June 1879. Lord Shand differed from his three brethren as to the construction of the contract, holding, with the Lord Ordinary, that under the agreement of February the line of tramway was not to be within the policy, and that the appellant only undertook to give such right to the land required as he was possessed of.

Upon the assumption that the agreement of February 1878 was rightly construed by the Judges of the majority, I should be of opinion that they did right in appointing the appellant to lodge a minute stating what ground he proposed to furnish. If the appellant, in obedience to that order, had judicially stated that he was able and willing to secure to the respondents the right to lay their tramway along the private road, including that portion of it which passes through the yard of the co-operative company, I see no reason to doubt that the Court would have proceeded, failing the agreement of parties, to settle the line of tramway along that road. On the other hand, if the appellant had lodged a minute setting forth that he was willing, so far as his rights were concerned, to permit the tramway to be formed along the private road, but declined to make any arrangement with the co-operative company, I think the Court would have compelled him to give ground within his policy.

hote | I am of opinion, with all the Judges of the First Division, that the missive of the 28th of September 1878 is not a valid holograph writ. I do not doubt that a missive written and signed by a factor or agent, professing to bind his principal, is a probative holograph writ according to the law of Scotland; and that, when duly accepted, it will bind the principal if he gave authority, and will subject the writer in damages, if he did not. It appears to me, however, to be sufficient for the decision of this point that Mr Logan, who wrote the document, was not, in any sense, a party to the negotiations on the 28th of September, which resulted in its delivery to the respondents, for their consideration and acceptance. These negotiations were conducted by the appellant in person, and it does not appear from the evidence that Mr Logan ever had, or supposed he had, any authority from the appellant to make such an offer. Even if Mr Logan had been the sole negotiator, acting in the appellant's absence, and by his instructions, I doubt whether the writing would have been thereby validated. The general rule of the law of Scotland is that a holograph writing, in order to be effectual, must be subscribed by the writer. In the absence of subscription equivalents have been admitted, such as a reference to the document in a subsequent holograph and subscribed writing by the same person, or the occurrence of the writer's name in the body of the unsigned writing. In the present case there is no such subsequent writ, and the name which does occur in the writing itself, as that of the offerer, is unfortunately not the name of the writer. The appellant's allegations of rei interventus are so palpably irrelevant that I do not think it necessary to make any further reference to them.

But I cannot agree with the construction which has been put by the Lord President and by Lords Deas and Mure upon the agreement of February 1878. The primary meaning of the expression, "by the end of the policy," certainly is that the line shall be carried without the policy. No doubt "by" is a flexible word, and its meaning may vary with the context. It may signify "by means of," as in the expression "going by a road." Or it may mean "through," as when one speaks of going "by a field" to a point which is on the other side of it. But, à priori, the presumption is that a gentleman who stipulates that a tramway shall be carried "by the end" of his policy does not intend that it shall go through his policy. And that such was not the intention of the parties to the agreement of February becomes the more apparent on referring to the Ordnance sheet, which is incorporated with the conclusions of the action. The policy of Thurso Castle comes to a very narrow point at its southmost corner or extremity, where the private road to the respondents' yard strikes off from the county road. That southmost corner is plainly what the parties intended to designate by the expression "the end of the policy," and even if the word "by" were read as "through," it appears to me that no route could, in any reasonable sense, be described as "through the end of the policy," which did not lead from the county road to the private road. The line of tramway which the respondents claim is a line running, not through the end of the policy, but through the policy itself.

Accordingly concur with Lord Rutherford Clark and Lord Shand in holding that, under the agreement libelled, the stipulation of the parties is that the tramway shall pass outside the walls which enclose the policy of Thurso Castle. No. 8.
April 7, 1881.

I am also of opinion that, by agreeing to "give gratuitously" the land required for the tramway, the appellant merely undertook to give the respondents such right as was vested in him, leaving them to settle with any persons who might have a right or interest entitling them to object to the formation of a tramway. It appears to me that these words, according to their natural import, do not mean that the appellant shall purchase or procure the interests of third parties in the ground to be occupied by the tramway, for the benefit of the respondents, but that he shall permit the respondents to use his rights in the solum without making any charge therefor; and I am unable to find, either in the terms of the agreement or in the circumstances of the case, aught that compels me to attach to the words any other than their natural meaning. The evidence shews that, practically, the only route from the county road to the respondents' yard, outwith the policy of Thurso Castle, is along the private road already described; and the only obstacle to laying the tramway along that road which the respondents have suggested is, that the co-operative company may refuse to allow its being laid along that portion of the private road which intersects their works. Although there are no termini habiles for deciding the point, in the absence of the co-operative company, I can see no reasonable ground for holding that the company could successfully resist the continuation of the tramway to the respondents' works, and there is no evidence that they have attempted or intend to offer any resistance. The terms upon which they proposed to allow the tramway to be made through their works had no reference to its construction along the road, but upon the solum of the yard exclusively occupied by them, and that was an operation which they had an undoubted right to prevent. I do not think it ever occurred to the parties, when they contracted in February 1878, that any difficulty would be raised by the co-operative company, and I am confirmed in that impression by the fact that the respondents subsequently negotiated with the appellant on the footing that the strip of land, which he was to give for the formation of the tramway, should terminate at the yard of the co-operative company. Of course the appellant must not only give the respondents such rights as he has, but must also allow them to use his name in any proceedings which may become necessary for the vindication of these rights. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to decree of absolvitor from the conclusions of the action, so far as these conclude that he shall be ordained to give possession and use of any part of his policy for the formation of a tramway. The sixth article of the revised condescendence for the respondents is so framed that the Court below might have difficulty, owing to the present shape of the record, in adjusting a line of tramway without the policy by a decree under the conclusions of the summons. But that difficulty may be removed by a very slight amendment of the record; and it is plainly for the interest of both parties that the whole matter in dispute between them should be disposed of without resort being had to a new action. I therefore think your Lordships ought to reverse the interlocutor appealed against, except in so far as it recalls the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 27th of February 1880; to declare that the appellant is entitled to absolvitor from the first alternative conclusion of the summons, and also from the second alternative conclusion, in so far as the same relates to the possession and use of land within the policy of Thurso Castle, and that, under the agreement of the 21st of February 1878, the appellant is not bound to give to the respondents any rights in the ground required for the completion of the tramway, except such rights as belonged to him, he being always bound to allow the respondents to use his name in any proceedings they may be advised to take for the vindication of these rights; and subject to these declarations, to remit the cause to the First Division of the Court of Session, with directions to dispose of the second alternative conclusion of the summons, in so far as the same relates to the possession and use of land without the policy of Thurso Castle, and to allow the parties to make such amendments of the record as may be necessary for that purpose. And, seeing that the appellant has succeeded in his resistance to the demands of the respondents, for a line through his policy, and that he was justified in coming to this House in order to get rid of the finding pronounced by the First Division, I think he ought to have the costs of the appeal and his expenses in the Court below.

“ORDERED and adjudged:—That the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the First Division, of the 9th of July 1880, complained of in the said appeal, be and the same is hereby reversed, except in so far as it recalls the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 27th of February 1880: And it is declared that the appellant is entitled to absolvitor from the first alternative conclusion of the summons, and also from the second alternative conclusion, in so far as the same relates to the possession and use of land within the policy of Thurso Castle, and that under the agreement of the 21st of February 1878 the appellant is not bound to give to the respondents any rights in the ground required for the completion of the tramway, except such rights as belonged to him, he being always bound to allow the respondents to use his name in any proceedings they may be advised to take for the vindication of their rights; and, subject to these declarations, it is ordered that the cause be and the same is hereby remitted to the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions to dispose of the second alternative conclusion of the summons, in so far as the same relates to the possession and use of land without the policy of Thurso Castle, and to allow the parties to make such amendments of the record as may be necessary for that purpose: And it is further ordered that the respondents do pay or cause to be paid to the said appellant the costs incurred by him in respect of the said appeal to this House, and also his expenses in the Court below,” &c.

Superior and Vassal—Non-entry—Proof of Superior's title.—In 1821 A entered with B as his superior in the lands of S. A's predecessors had entered in the same way with B's predecessors in 1740 and 1795. The lands of S were subsequently sold, but no entry was asked by B or his successors from 1821 down to 1879, when B's successor brought an action for payment of casualty against a singular successor of A. The defender maintained that there was no evidence to establish the identity of the lands of S possessed by him with the lands of which the pursuer held the superiority, and that his lands of S really held of another subject superior. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that as the defender had failed to prove that the superiority of his lands of S belonged to some one other than the representative of the superior with whom the previous entries had been made he was liable in the casualty.

Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), secs. 7 and 37—Effect of adoption of Act in one county and not in adjoining county where bridge and road situated partly in both.

THE Wellington Suspension Bridge, over the river Dee at Aberdeen, was erected and maintained under the local Acts 10 Geo. IV. c. xliii., and 23 Vict. c. xxvi. The trust created by the above-mentioned Acts embraced not only the bridge but 650 yards of road in the parliamentary burgh and county of Aberdeen, and four miles of road in the county of Kincardine.

Lord Watson.

In consequence of the county of Kincardine having adopted the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, while the county of Aberdeen had not yet done so, Mr A. D. Morice, clerk to and as representing the Wellington Suspension Bridge Trustees, raised this action against the County Road Trustees of Kincardine, and the Commissioners of Supply of the County of Aberdeen, concluding that it "ought and should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, that the Act 10 George IV. cap. xliii., . . . and the Act 23 Vict. cap. xxvi., . . . have ceased to be of force and effect within the county of Kincardine; and farther, and whether or not it be so found and declared, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the pursuers have ceased to be under any obligation, right, privilege, or duty in regard to the management or maintenance of the said bridge over the river Dee, . . . known as the Wellington Suspension Bridge, and the road . . . by the said bridge toward the city of Aberdeen, and that the defenders, the said County Road Trustees of Kincardine, and the Commissioners of Supply of the county of Aberdeen, are bound to maintain and keep in proper repair the said bridge and road; and further, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the pursuers have ceased to be liable for the debts incurred by them as trustees foresaid, and for the sums subscribed for the erection and creation of the said bridge and road, and that the defenders, the said County Road Trustees of Kincardine, and the Commissioners of Supply of the county of Aberdeen, are jointly and severally liable therefor, and are bound to free and relieve the pursuers thereof: Or otherwise, in the event of the pursuers being under any obligation, right, privilege, or duty in regard to the management or maintenance of the said bridge and road, or any part thereof, then it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the pursuers are entitled to demand and take, or cause to be demanded and taken, within the county of Aberdeen, as or for tolls or pontage, before any passage over the said bridge shall be permitted, the various sums provided and in manner provided by the said Act 10 George IV. cap. xliii."

On 3d January 1880, the Lord Ordinary (Young) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences for the Commissioners of Supply of the county of Aberdeen: Decerns and declares in terms of the first alternative conclusions of the summons, with the qualifying declaration that the liability of the defenders respectively is according to the proportions in which the road and bridge referred to in the said conclusions are situated in the counties of Kincardine and Aberdeen respectively."

The Kincardine County Road Trustees acquiesced in the judgment, but the Commissioners of Supply for the county of Aberdeen reclaimed.

The Second Division, on 19th March 1880, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The Commissioners of Supply for the county of Aberdeen appealed.

The House of Lords reversed the interlocutors appealed from, and remitted the cause with the declarations "That the true effect of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, is to continue in force the provisions of the Acts 10 Geo. IV. cap. xliii., and 23 Vict. cap. xxvi., so far as relates to the powers and duties thereby imposed upon the pursuers for the management and maintenance of that part of the bridge and road mentioned in the record which is within the county and the parliamentary burgh of Aberdeen, together with the powers of demanding and taking tolls or pontage within the county and the parliamentary burgh of Aberdeen, conferred by such Acts, so long as the said Roads and Bridges Act shall not be in force in the county and parliamentary burgh of Aberdeen, and that so far, and so far only, as the pursuers may fail in the proper performance of such duties of management and maintenance, or as the receipts from such tolls as aforesaid may be insufficient to provide for the same, the appellants (the Commissioners of Supply for the county of Aberdeen) are likewise bound to maintain and keep in proper repair the said bridge and road within the said county and parliamentary burgh: And that, under and by virtue of the said Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, the liability of the pursuers to the debts incurred by them as trustees under the said Acts of 10 Geo. IV. and 23 Vict. has now ceased, and has fallen upon, and now belongs to, the County Road Trustees of Kincardine and the appellants the said Commissioners of Supply for the county of Aberdeen, severally, in the proportions to be fixed and adjusted under the provisions of the said Roads and Bridges Act; and that the said Commissioners of Supply for the county of Aberdeen are entitled to receive from the pursuers all surplus of income accruing to the pursuers from the tolls which may be exacted on the said bridge or road within the said county and parliamentary burgh of Aberdeen, after providing for the expense of managing and maintaining the said bridge and road; and that the pursuers are and will be entitled to be freed and relieved, by the said Commissioners of Supply, from the proportion of the debts aforesaid, belonging, under the provisions of the said Roads and Bridges Act, to the county and parliamentary burgh of Aberdeen, until the time when the said Roads and Bridges Act shall be in force in the said county and parliamentary burgh of Aberdeen, the pursuers paying over such surplus income, if any, to the said Commissioners of Supply for the county of Aberdeen: And it is declared that so far as relates to that part, and that part only, of the said bridge and road which is within the county of Kincardine, the said Acts of No. 10.

 10 Gorge IV. and 23 Vict. have ceased to be in force, and the pursuers have ceased to be under any obligation or duty, or to have any right or privilege, in respect thereof; and that the said County Road Trustees of Kincardine are bound to maintain and keep in proper repair that part of the said bridge and road which is within the county of Kincardine, and to free and relieve the pursuers from the proportion of the said debts belonging, under the provisions of the said Roads and Bridges Act to the said county of Kincardine: And it is ordered that the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with these declarations and this judgment."

Superior and Vassal—Special stipulations in Feus—Restrictions on Building—Enforcement by one Vassal against another holding of common superior.—The fact of several feuars of adjoining plots of building ground in the same street holding from a common superior does not, by itself, entitle any one of those feuars to claim the benefit of restrictions contained in the feu-contract of another unless some mutuality and community of rights and obligations is otherwise established between them, and this can only be done either (1) by the superior making it an express condition of his feu-contract that he will insert the same general restrictions in all feus granted by him in the same street or locality; or (2) by reasonable implication from a reference in all the feu-contracts to a common plan or scheme of building prepared and adopted by the superior; or (3) by mutual agreement between the feuars themselves.

A superior feued out ground for building detached villas to form one side of a square on his property. All the feuars were put under restrictions as to building, but these restrictions, though similar, were not uniform, but adapted to the situation of the various houses, and there was no reference in the feu-contracts to any general building plan as having been adopted by the superior, and, except that all the houses had a uniform frontage, so far as related to their distance from the street in front, no uniform plan appeared to have been adopted; nor was there any undertaking by the superior in any of the feu-contracts to impose the same or any restrictions upon adjoining feuars. A and B, who held adjacent feus, and whose houses had been built before the date of their feu-contracts, were each restricted from erecting additional buildings, with certain specified exceptions. The excepted buildings were different in each case, but both feuars were restricted from building on the front area between their houses and the street. Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the restrictive provision as to building in B's feu-contract did not create a jus quasi-tum in favour of A, but was merely a condition of tenure between superior and vassal; and that A was not entitled to enforce it against B to the effect of preventing him enclosing the space in front of his house for the purpose of a carriage show-room.

Title to Sue—Effect of "consent and concurrence."—Where the principal party to a suit has an interest or right of his own, but so qualified by or dependent upon some jus tertii or some limitation or condition that he has no title to sue separately, his defect of title may be cured by the "consent and concurrence" of the person by or on whose right his is qualified or dependent. But when the principal party to a suit has no interest or right of his own, his

No. 11. defect of title cannot be cured by the "consent and concurrence" of the person to whom alone the right of action truly belongs.

June 23, 1881.
Hislop v. Mac-
Ritchie's Trustees.

Where a feuar of building ground had no title to enforce a restriction in the feu-contract of a neighbouring feuar, held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the "consent and concurrence of the superior" did not obviate the objection to his title to sue.

Process—Amendment of Record—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.—Observed (per Lord Watson) that the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, did not warrant the importation of a new party into a suit for the purpose of obviating an objection to the title to sue of the original pursuer.

The respondent appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the effect of the interlocutors appealed from in this case is to enforce against the appellant at the suit of the respondents certain restrictions on building contained in a feu-contract dated the 6th of June 1782, between one James Jollie, and Andrew Dick, the appellant's predecessor in title,—Jollie being the superior, and Dick the vassal, under the contract.

These interlocutors are right, if the respondents, who are neighbouring feuars under the same superior, were and are, by the combined effect of their own and the appellant's titles, interested in the obligations and restraints imposed upon the appellant by Dick's feu-contract, so as to be entitled to enforce those obligations and restraints for their own interest; or (however this may be), if the superior is, or ought to be deemed, a party complainant in the action, in such a sense as to be suing for his own separate interest. If neither of those propositions can be established, the appellant ought to have been assoilzied from the action, and the present appeal ought to be allowed.

James Jollie was, in 1782, absolute owner of the whole ground, in the city of Edinburgh, which is now bounded by Gayfield Square to the north-east, East Broughton Place and Union Street to the south-west, and on the other two sides by Antigua Street and Gayfield Street. He divided it into four plots or parcels, one of which, consisting of two roods or thereabouts, was feued by him to Andrew Dick on the 6th of June 1782. This feu-contract recites that Dick had then lately enclosed that parcel of land and had built upon it two separate houses, conform to a plan of elevation approved by Jollie. The feu is described as, in one part bounded by ground lately feued by James Jollie to persons named Besillie and Moffat, and in all other parts by Jollie's remaining property, and by the street (then belonging to Jollie) upon the north-east. This feu-contract contained the restrictions on building which the respondents seek to enforce; and it also contained an agreement concerning certain walls of enclosure which Dick had built, or was to build, for the purpose of dividing his land from the parcels adjoining it, to the effect that such walls of enclosure were to "be mutual," and that "one half of the expense of building the said mutual walls should be paid by the neighbouring feuars," Jollie thereby becoming bound "that the said feuars should fulfil that part of the agreement." There is no provision in this contract that either Besillie and Moffat (the persons spoken of as already feuars of part of the adjoining land), or any future feuars of any other part, should have the benefit of, or be in any way interested in, the restrictions as to building, or should be bound in favour of Dick and his successors in title by any similar restrictions. No general scheme or plan of building upon or otherwise using the adjoining parcels of land, or any of them, is indicated or referred to. The express provision already mentioned as to enclosure walls is adverse to any implication of an intention that in other respects mutual burdens, for each other's benefit, should be imposed upon Dick and the adjoining feuars. No. 11.

June 23, 1881.
Hielop v. Mac-
Ritchie's Trustees.

The land so feued to Dick is now divided between two proprietors. The house, No. 2 Gayfield Square, with the ground belonging to it, which is vested in the appellant, constitutes one half of that feu. No. 3 Gayfield Square (now vested in another proprietor), and the ground belonging to it, constitutes the other half, and intervenes between No. 2 and the respondents' feu, No. 4.

No. 1 on the other (or east) side of No. 2 was feued to Besillie and Moffat by contract dated the 14th of June 1783, in implement (doubtless) of some earlier agreement. It contained provisions and restrictions as to building, to the effect that a house or houses, the erection of which was contemplated with a frontage towards Gayfield Square, should be set back from the street, as Dick's houses were, and should not exceed two stories in height. As to the rest of the land in this feu, the stipulations were different from those in Dick's feu-contract, and there was nothing in it, expressly or by implication, communicating to those feuars the benefit of any of the obligations entered into by Dick (except as to the inclosure walls) or making any obligation entered into by those feuars (with the same exception) a jus quæsitum for Dick's benefit.

The next feu granted was of No. 4 Gayfield Square, and the land belonging to it to the respondents' predecessor in title (one Fitzsimmons) on the 13th of February 1784. The house fronting Gayfield Square in line with Nos. 1, 2, and 3, appears to have been then already built upon it, and so far from placing Fitzsimmons under restrictions corresponding with those placed on Dick, he was expressly authorised to build other houses on the south-east part of it, so as to range in point of height with some which Jollie, the superior, then contemplated building towards the street now called East Broughton Place. There is no reference in this feu-contract to the restrictions on building to which Dick's feu was subject, still less anything purporting to communicate to Fitzsimmons any benefit from those restrictions.

The fourth and last plot of ground was afterwards feued, as to part, to Fitzsimmons (who conveyed it to Ferrier), and as to the rest to Ferrier, with provisions as to building similar in substance to those in the feu-contract of No. 4 to Fitzsimmons.

No general scheme or plan of building was embodied or referred to in any of these feu-contracts; and (except that the houses Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, have a uniform frontage, so far as relates to their distance from the street, towards Gayfield Square) no such general plan appears to have been followed in building upon any of the plots of ground feued.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me to be clear that this case does not come within the principle of *M'Gibbon v. Rankin*¹ and the other authorities of that class. The restrictive provision as to building in Dick's feu-contract was not, in any sense, jus quæsitum tertio; it was merely a condition of tenure between superior and vassal. The fact of several feuars of neighbouring plots of building land in the same street holding from a common superior, does not, by itself, entitle one of those feuars to claim the benefit of restrictions

No. 11. contained in the feu-contract of another, unless some mutuality and community of rights and obligations is otherwise established between them; which can only be done by express stipulation in their respective contracts with the superior, or by reasonable implication from some reference in both contracts to a common plan or scheme of building, or by mutual agreement between the feuars themselves. Here there are none of those things. It follows that the respondents at your Lordships' bar have no interest of their own, no right or cause of action against the appellant. They are strangers to the contract in which the restrictions which they seek to enforce are contained.

Hislop v. Mac
Ritchie's Trustees.

The appeal, therefore, must be allowed, unless the fact that the note of suspension and interdict is expressed to be "with consent and concurrence of the Governors of Calvin's Hospital," makes the Governors of the hospital (whom I assume to have now the title of superiority, which at the time when the several feus was granted was vested in James Jollie), parties suing for their own title and interest, independently of any right, title, or interest in the respondents.

The majority of the Judges of the Second Division (Lord Young dissenting), appeared to have thought that the Governors of Calvin's Hospital were, in substance, complainers in this action, so as to cure, by the strength of their title, any infirmity or defect in the title of the respondents. I am not, myself, able to concur in that opinion, and I am not satisfied that it would have been the conclusion of those learned Judges if they had thought (as I do) that the respondents had no title of their own upon which they could sue in their own right.

The pleadings are throughout constructed upon the view that the respondents, the feuars of No. 4 (and they only), are "complainers" in the suit. The reasons of suspension and interdict, the answers to the statement of facts for the present appellant, and the pleas in law for the complainers, are those of the feuars, and of the feuars only. Nor is it easy to conceive why the superiors, if they intended to be complainers at all, should not have been so in the ordinary form. I think it plain, upon the whole record, that the consent and concurrence of the superiors was thought necessary, and was alleged in the note of suspension and interdict, only because it was with and to them that the obligation of which the feuars claimed the benefit was originally undertaken. There is no definite averment of the superior's title, as there surely ought to have been if it had been intended to make a case on which the superiors might stand without the feuars, and which could be met by separate defences available against the superiors only.

This particular form of suit with "consent and concurrence" seems to be not uncommon in Scotland, when the principal parties have an interest or right of their own qualified by or dependent upon some jus tertii or some limitation or condition, which might be an obstacle or impediment to their suing without such consent, but which ceases to be so when they have it. No authority was cited for the general proposition that under this form of suit the consenting or concurring parties ought to be or can be regarded as sole or principal actors, when it turns out that the parties suing as principals on the record have not the interest or right which they claim. I infer from what was said by the Lord Justice-Clerk that his Lordship was not prepared to affirm that general proposition; and I have myself no hesitation in stating that I think it untenable in law.

The result is, that, considering the respondents to be strangers, not entitled to the benefit of the restrictions in the feu-contract of the 6th of June 1782, I think this appeal ought to be allowed; and I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and the case remitted to the Court of Session, with directions to sustain the third plea in law for the appellants, and to refuse the reasons of suspension, with expenses. The costs of the appeal to this House will follow the event.

No. 11.
June 23, 1881.
Hislop v. Mac-Ritchie's Trustees.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, James Jollie, in the years 1782, 1783, and 1784, gave out feus of what now forms one side of Gayfield Square, in Edinburgh. His title is now in the Governors of Cauvin's Hospital.

The Lord Ordinary states the first question thus:—"The feus of Gayfield Square were given out by James Jollie. The complainers (the respondents before this House) are the proprietors of feu No. 4, while the respondent (the appellant before this House) is the proprietor of feu No. 2. The purpose of this action is to restrain the respondent from building in contravention of the conditions of his feu, and to have him ordained to remove such buildings as he has built in contravention of these conditions. The first question is, whether the conditions of the feu-contract of the respondent are enforceable by a co-feuar? The Lord Ordinary thinks that they are. The feu-contracts contain similar, though not identical, conditions as to building. These conditions seem to the Lord Ordinary to have been inserted for the joint behoof of the feuars, and are therefore enforceable by any one against the others."

A great deal of house property in Scotland is held under feus containing in the feu-charters restrictions as to what is to be done. Such restrictions are, prima facie, enforceable only by the superior, who alone is a party to the contract of feu. If he has entered into another contract of feu, the superior may, if he considers that the relations he has entered into with that other feuar render it either morally or legally incumbent on him so to do, enforce those restrictions for the benefit of that feuar, though the latter be no party to the contract which created the restrictions. It may, at first sight, seem not very material whether the restriction is to be enforced by the superior suing at the instance of the co-feuar, probably (after having taken due security for his indemnity) permitting him to conduct the litigation, or by the co-feuar direct; but practically it makes a good deal of difference. I think it must be taken as settled that where it appears that the restrictions were entered into for the benefit of other feus, either already existing or to be created by the superior thereafter, the restriction may be enforced by each co-feuar as far as his interest is concerned. It might have been better if the question whether it so appeared had been from the first considered to depend entirely on the construction of the contract of feu, applying the ordinary rules of construction to the terms used in it; but there are expressions used in some of the judgments on this subject which, if taken literally, seem to go further.

As many houses are bought and sold, the price being regulated according as it is thought that the purchaser has a direct remedy to enforce such restrictions as are in his favour against his neighbours, or, on the other hand, that he can easily by dealing with the superior, and the superior alone, get relieved from such restrictions on his own property as are burdensome, I think it desirable in this, as in all conveyancing questions, not to depart from what has been established.

But I think that in the case now at the bar there is nothing to indicate that restrictions were imposed for the benefit of the co-feuars, beyond the fact that

No. 11. the feus were all given out nearly at the same time, and that some of the conditions inserted in the feus are similar to each other. That, and the fact (which exists in most cases where a square has been built at about the same time, whether on land belonging to one estate or to several), that the houses are built so as to produce a considerable degree of uniformity, are all that the respondents' counsel could point out as tending to shew that the restrictions were originally imposed for the benefit of the co-feuars; and though some expressions used by Lord President Hope¹ and Lord President Inglis seem to indicate an opinion that this is enough to justify the conclusion that the restrictions were imposed for the benefit of the co-feuars, I think no decided judgment has yet been given on the ground that that alone is enough.

June 23, 1881.
Hislop v. Mac-
Ritchie's Trustees.

I come to the conclusion that the cases should not be carried further than they have already been, and consequently I must advise your Lordships to differ from the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary.

The other question is a very technical one of pleading. Practically the difference between being permitted to enforce the restrictions by suing in the co-feuar's name, with the concurrence of the superior, and by suing in the name of the superior for the benefit of the co-feuar, seems to me only to consist in the greater probability that the superior will permit the one course to be taken than the other. I think it more desirable that the superior should distinctly know what he is doing; and there being no authority in favour of the respondents' contention, I think this point also should be decided in favour of the appellant.

I therefore agree with the judgment proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the Governors of Cauvin's Hospital are the superiors of a piece of ground lying upon the west side of Gayfield Square, in the city of Edinburgh, which was feued out in lots for building purposes about the end of last century. The northern portion, consisting of nearly one half of the ground in question, was given off in five separate lots, upon each of which there has been erected a dwelling-house fronting Gayfield Square, with offices behind. These houses are erected on the same building line, and in front of each there is an open space twenty feet in breadth, separated from the street by a low wall and railing, which the feuar is under obligation to maintain. Upon the background of No. 5, which is the northernmost of these lots, there has also been erected a large hall, and upon the background of No. 4 an additional dwelling-house, these buildings having frontage to other streets belonging to the superiors. The buildings which I have just described are sanctioned by the terms of the respective feu-rights, all of which contain an express prohibition against the erection of any other buildings.

The appellant, who is now the proprietor of lot No. 2, was proceeding to convert his dwelling-house and offices into a carriage manufactory, and the alterations which he was in course of making for that purpose included the erection of a show-room, one story in height, upon the vacant space between the house and Gayfield Square, and also the erection of buildings of similar character, and of considerable extent, upon the background. It was not seriously disputed at the bar, and it does not appear to me to admit of reasonable doubt, that these operations were in direct violation of that condition of the appellant's feu-right by which he is bound "not to erect any other buildings upon the said piece of ground (i.e., lot No. 2), except the tenement of houses and walls of enclosure already erected thereon."

Hialop v. Mac-
Ritchie's Trustees.

The process of suspension and interdict, in which the present appeal is taken, was raised at the instance of the respondents, who, as trustees of the late Thomas Elder MacRitchie, W.S., are proprietors of the feu forming lot No. 4, "with consent and concurrence" of the superiors, the Governors of Clauvin's Hospital. The object of the action is to enforce the condition of the appellant's feu-contract, by interdict against the erection of any buildings on lot 2 other than those which are expressly sanctioned by the terms of that contract.

The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the respondents, MacRitchie's trustees, had, per se, a good title to enforce the restriction, and he accordingly granted interdict to the effect craved. On a reclaiming note to the Second Division of the Court, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford (Lord Young dissenting) affirmed the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, on the ground that, assuming the respondents to have no right to enforce the restriction, they were entitled to decree in respect of the consent and concurrence of the superiors, who had the right. Lord Gifford seems to have been of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that the feuars of these five lots were mutually entitled to enforce the conditions of their respective feu-rights. So far as expressed, the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk upon that point is unfavourable to the respondents. Lord Young held that the respondents had of themselves no title to sue, and that the appellant must prevail, because the defective instance of the respondents could not be validated by the mere consent and concurrence of parties having a good title to insist for the same remedy in an action at their own instance.

It is settled by a series of decisions in the Courts of Scotland that every one of a class of feuars deriving their title from a common superior may have an implied right or jus quæsitum to enforce conditions occurring in contracts between the superior and his co-feuars to which he was not a party. In some cases it is made a matter of express stipulation by the superior, in contracting with his vassals, that each of them shall have that right. The right in those cases, when it has been held to arise by implication, appears to me to have been originally admitted upon considerations of expediency, and partly with the view of avoiding circuitous and unnecessary litigation.

Both parties, in their argument at the bar, assumed, and rightly assumed, that in order to the constitution of such a jus quæsitum, it is essential that the conditions to be enforced shall appear in all the feu-rights, that they shall in all cases be similar, if not identical, and of such a character that each feuar has an interest in enforcing them. But the respondents carried their argument so far as to maintain that these considerations, where they are found to co-exist, sufficiently indicate that the conditions of feu were intended for the mutual benefit of all the feuars, and must therefore be held to confer upon each feuar a right of action against his co-feuars for the enforcement of these conditions. The respondents did not assert that the proposition thus advanced by them has as yet been judicially determined in their favour, but they did maintain that it is strictly in accordance with the principle of the decided cases, that contention being founded mainly, if not altogether, upon certain dicta of Lord President Hope in the case of the Governors of Heriot's Hospital v. Cockburn,¹ and of

No. 11. Lord Ardmillan in the recent case of Robertson v. North British Railway Company.¹ In the latter case Lord Ardmillan said:—"Where in titles originally springing from the same person there is an undoubted and substantial interest in one feuar to enforce a restriction such as this, partaking of the nature of a servitude, against another feuar, the law will recognise a title available and sufficient to support his interest and to enforce the restriction."

If these words were taken as a complete statement of the law applicable to cases like the present, they would support the contention of the respondents, and so would the language used by Lord President Hope in the Governors of Heriot's Hospital v. Cockburn which I have not thought it necessary to quote. The soundness of Lord President Hope's dicta has been seriously questioned in subsequent cases, but I doubt whether either of the learned Judges intended, in the passages relied on by the respondents, to give an exhaustive definition of what is requisite in order to create a right in one feuar to enforce the conditions of another feu. Their statements of the law are unimpeachable if read with reference to the circumstances of the case in which they were uttered. If they were intended to have a wider application they were unnecessary for its decision.

The fact of the same condition appearing in feu-charters derived from a common superior, coupled with a substantial interest in its observance, does not appear to me to be sufficient to give each feuar a title to enforce it. No single feuar can, in my opinion, be subjected in liability to his co-feuars, unless it appears from the titles under which he holds his feu that such similarity of conditions and mutuality of interest among the feuars either had been or was meant to be established. According to the tenor of the feu-disposition, or feu-contract, as the case may be, the feuar and his superior are the only parties to it; and I am of opinion that no jus quæsitum can arise to any tertius except by the consent of both these contracting parties. That being so, unless the feuar, either in express words or by implication, gives his consent to the introduction of a tertius, the superior cannot as against him create any such interest, by imposing the same conditions to which he has submitted upon another feu in his vicinity.

In dealing with this question it is necessary to keep in view that when the feuar has a jus quæsitum, his title, and that of the superior, to enforce common feuing conditions are independent and substantially different rights. The title of the superior rests upon contract, a contract running with the estate of superiority and burdening the subaltern estate of the vassal. The right of the feuar, though arising ex contractu, is of the nature of a proper servitude, his feu being the dominant tenement; consequently he cannot enforce it against other feuars except in so far as he can qualify an interest to do so. Again, the superior's consent to discharge the condition cannot affect the right of the feuar, and as little can the feuar's renunciation of his servitude impair the superior's right to enforce the condition. It appears to me that it would be unreasonable and contrary to all principle to hold that a feuar was subject to such a servitude, except upon evidence warranting the inference that in accepting a title to his own feu he had it in contemplation, and tacitly agreed, that such a burden should be imposed upon him. And seeing that the burden when imposed affects the land which is the subject of his feu, I think the evidence of his consent to its imposition can only be derived from the titles under which his feu is held. What kind or amount of evidence derivable from his titles will suffice to indicate the feuar's consent is a question which must depend upon the circumstances of each case.

Hialop v. Mac-
tees.

If the dicta upon which the respondents found were to be taken per se, and as expressing all that is required in order to create mutual servitudes as between the feuars, the superior would necessarily have the power of creating such servitudes without the consent, and even against the wish, of the feuars burdened thereby. I should not have been prepared to except to that view of the law, had I been of opinion that the creation of such servitudes was in substance and effect nothing more than an assignation to each feuar of the superior's right as against his co-feuars. But the effect of an assignation is to divest the cedent of his right, at least to the extent to which it is assigned; whereas the effect of creating mutual servitudes among the feuars is to leave the superior's right as against each of them undiminished and unimpaired, and to subject the feuar in liability to a body of servitude owners, whose interest, as well as that of the superior, he must purchase or settle for before he can obtain a release from the conditions of his feu-charter. I know of no principle upon which that liability ought to be imposed upon a feuar except of his own consent; and, so far as I am aware, there is no decision by which his liability has been affirmed in the absence of evidence from which his consent was matter of legitimate inference.

The first case in which it was held that each member of a class of feuars had an implied right to enforce a common condition was that of the Governors of Heriot's Hospital v. Cockburn, already referred to. But the judgment of the Court of Session was reversed by this House, as being unnecessary to the disposal of the cause. The next decision was in the Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Macfarlane,¹ and similar judgments have been given in subsequent cases. All of these appear to me to fall under one or other of two categories, either (1) where the superior feus out his land in separate lots for the erection of houses, in streets or squares, upon a uniform plan; or (2) where the superior feus out a considerable area with a view to its being subdivided and built upon, without prescribing any definite plan, but imposing certain general restrictions which the feuar is taken bound to insert in all sub-feus or dispositions to be granted by him.

To the first of these categories belongs M'Gibbon v. Rankin.² The superior in that case had laid off a piece of ground for the formation of a continuous line of houses or terrace, and from time to time granted separate feu-charters of the site of each house, and in each charter there occurred the same condition regarding the size and design of the buildings to be erected, coupled with a stipulation that it should be inserted by the superior in all the other feu-rights of the terrace. The defender, who was infringing the condition, objected to the title of the pursuer, whose charter of feu was posterior in date to his own; but the Court held that, in stipulating that the condition should be imposed upon his co-feuars, the defender must have had in contemplation that it was to operate for the mutual benefit of all the feuars, and be mutually enforceable by them.

*Robertson v. North British Railway Company*³ affords an illustration of the cases falling under the second category. A superior feued to A a piece of ground lying within the city of Glasgow, subject to the restriction, inter alia,

No. 11. that no part of it should be used for the storage of manure ; and on the express condition that the restriction was to be imposed by A upon all his disponees or sub-feuars. A, without taking infestment, conveyed part of the ground to B, June 23, 1881. Hislop v. Mac- and the remainder to C. The restriction was duly inserted in the feudal title Ritchie's Trustees. completed by B ; but C made up his title without any notice of the restriction, and subsequently conveyed to D, a singular successor, against whom an action was brought to enforce the restriction, by a pursuer deriving right from B. The defender maintained that the restriction was not validly imposed upon him, and that, even if it were, B and those in his right had no title to enforce it. As to the first of these points, the majority of the First Division were of opinion, upon grounds which appear to me to admit of considerable doubt, that the restriction was well imposed upon D as well as upon his author, C ; and upon that footing their Lordships were of opinion that it was a mutual restriction, and that B had a good title to compel its observance by D.

The ratio decidendi in such cases as M'Gibbon v. Rankin seems to have been that a feuar, who stipulates with his superior that a particular restriction shall be imposed upon all his fellow-feuars as well as upon himself, must intend that he shall have the power of enforcing it against them, and that they shall have the like power as in a question with him. In Robertson v. North British Railway Company, and similar cases, the principle of decision appears to me to have been that a sub-feuar or disponee acquiring a building lot, subject to a particular condition, with notice in his titles that the common author, whether his immediate or over-superior, has imposed that condition upon the whole area of which his lot formed a part, must be taken as consenting that the condition shall be for mutual behoof of all the feuars or disponees within the area, and that all who have interest shall have a title to enforce it. In other words, the feuar is held as consenting to be bound by the law laid down by the common author for the benefit of all future feuars. I have been unable to find any decision proceeding upon the principle that a superior who feus out a portion of his estate to A under a precise restriction as to building, and who, in giving a title to A, neither undertakes, nor intimates an intention, to impose similar restrictions in feuing the remainder of his ground, can thereafter confer upon every feuar who acquires a building lot in the vicinity a jus quæsitum enabling him to sue A directly.

In the present case, the respondents' title to sue appears to me to fail in two essential particulars. The titles to the appellant's feu are of older date than those of any other of the five lots in question, with the exception of lot 3, which was originally included in the same feu-contract of the 6th of June 1782. That deed lays no obligation upon the superior to observe any limitation in building upon the adjacent ground, or to impose any such limitation upon those to whom he might subsequently feu or dispose it. No doubt there are words occurring in the deed from which it might be inferred that it was in the view of the superior to feu the adjoining ground on both sides ; but there is not a single expression which can reasonably be held to indicate the superior's intention to restrict the adjoining feuars, and still less to imply that he meant to come under an obligation to that effect. Again, the several restrictions as to building contained in the titles of the appellant and the respondents do not, in my opinion, so resemble each other as to raise the inference that they were intended to be mutual. These restrictions are, in both sets of titles, expressed in the same words ; but in substance they are very different. The one is a prohibition against building anything except a single house, fronting Gayfield Square, with offices. The other is a prohibition against building anything more than two dwelling-houses with offices, the one fronting to Gayfield Square on the east, and the other to street on the west. The restriction imposed upon the appellant has, in the case of the respondents, been departed from to the extent of allowing them to build a second dwelling-house upon the west end of their feu—a departure which seems to me to be fatal to the existence of that similarity and consequent mutuality of restriction upon which the argument of the respondents was mainly rested.

I have accordingly come to the conclusion that the respondents had and have no title, in their own persons, to raise and insist in the present action. That leaves the question whether their right to sue, which I assume to be nil, has been validated by the consent and concurrence of their superiors, to the effect of entitling them to decree in the terms of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict.

It was argued for the appellant that the superiors, the trustees of Cauvin's Hospital, have waived their right to enforce the restriction in his titles by permitting others of their feuars in the vicinity to violate the building conditions to which they were subject. If that proposition were clearly made out, it would be sufficient for the disposal of the case; but I am unable to adopt the appellant's argument, which was necessarily based upon an implied obligation on the part of the superiors to impose and enforce these conditions for his behoof. It appears to me that the case must be disposed of on the footing that the superiors have still a good title to enforce the restriction as against him; and that they have given their consent and concurrence to the instance of the respondents. I think the appellant is barred, by his pleadings on the record, from maintaining that such consent and concurrence was not in point of fact given. Upon this branch of the case I concur in the views which were expressed by Lord Young in the Court below. Actions at the instance of one party with the consent and concurrence of another, are of every day occurrence in the practice of the Courts of Scotland. In all such cases, the proper instance is that of the leading pursuer or complainer who sues in his or her own right and title. Thus a wife, dante matrimonio, sues with consent of her husband, and a minor with consent of his curators; but the right of action is vested in the wife and the minor only, and decree passes in their favour, the interposition of their legal guardians, as parties consenting, being merely required as a judicial precaution against any neglect of their interests in the conduct of the suit. Various other illustrations of the practice are to be found in the opinion of Lord Young, and it is unnecessary to repeat them here. But I know of no authority for holding that, according to the law or practice of Scotland, a person who has no right or title whatever can sue an action, provided he obtain the consent and concurrence of the party to whom alone such right or title belongs.

The reasons assigned for their judgment by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford appear to me to be unsatisfactory. The Lord Justice-Clerk deals with the case as if the superiors had the primary right and the respondents "a subordinate and derivative title to enforce" the restriction in question. If the respondents were really possessed of a subordinate and derivative title, I should come to the same conclusion as his Lordship; but that is not their true position. The respondents may, indeed, have an interest to prevent the erection of the buildings contemplated by the appellant; but their interest is no greater than tees.

Ritchie's Trus-

it would be if they had no feudal relation to the superiors of the appellant's feu, or if there were no restriction in the appellant's titles. They have no right or title, primary or subordinate, to enforce the restriction, neither have they any title to compel the superiors to enforce it. Lord Gifford, on the other hand, seems to hold it conclusive of the present question that "he who is merely a consentor to a disposition of heritage is held to be really a disposer, if the true title of the subject be found to be in him." That illustration embodies a correct statement of the law, but it has no bearing upon judicial procedure; and if admitted as an analogy would necessarily lead to the result that any stranger might insist in an action with regard to landed estate in which he had no right or interest, provided he sued with the consent and concurrence of the proprietor.

It was suggested by Lord Gifford that the instance of the respondents, assuming it to be defective, might be cured by amending the libel, to the effect of allowing the superiors to stand as complainers for their interest, under the provisions of section 29 of the Court of Session Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100). That clause enacts that "all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made." I cannot doubt that the amendment proposed by the learned Judge would have been unwarranted by the terms of the statute, which contemplate alterations on the record with the view of facilitating the determination of the real questions at issue between the original parties, but not the importation of new parties into the litigation.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the interlocutors under appeal ought to be reversed, and a remit made in the terms proposed by your Lordships.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed, with costs, and the cause "remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions to sustain the third plea in law for the appellant, and to refuse the reasons of suspension, and find the respondents liable in expenses, and to ordain the respondents to repay to the appellant the expenses in the Court of Session."

Sale—Delivery—Ship—Payment by instalments during construction—Bankruptcy of shipbuilder—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.—Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) that the rule introduced by sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act whereby a purchaser's right to enforce delivery from the seller is secured against the subsequent diligence of the seller's creditors, "including sequestration," applied in a case where a ship was sold by the builder in the course of construction, and remained in the seller's hands undelivered at the date of his sequestration.

Question, whether by the common law of Scotland the property of the ship passes to the purchaser without delivery as the instalments of the price are paid.

Observations on the case of Simpson v. Duncanson, 1786, M. 14,204.

Sale—Right in security—Security over moveables—Ship—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.—A, a shipbuilder who had a vessel on the stocks, applied to B & Co., to whom he was already indebted, to assist him with advances to enable him to complete the vessel. B & Co. only consented on condition that the vessel should be sold to them, as they considered that in no other way would they be safe to make the advances asked. This was agreed to, and an absolute contract of sale was entered into by the parties unqualified in any way, though there was admittedly an honourable understanding that should the vessel realise a profit beyond the sum paid by B & Co., they would communicate the benefit to A.

The advances already made were attributed towards the agreed-on price, the balance of which was paid by instalments as required, for which receipts were granted by the seller "to account of the purchase price." At the same time, to raise money to keep the purchasers out of cash advances, bills to the necessary amount were drawn by B & Co. and accepted by A and discounted by B & Co. While the vessel was in course of completion B & Co. entered into negotiations for the sale of the vessel, in which they described it as a vessel belonging to A in which they had a personal interest, as they were under considerable advances to A against the vessel. They did not succeed in selling the vessel, and before it was completed and delivered A was sequestered. The accommodation-bills above mentioned were not retired by B and Co. till after A's sequestration.

Held that though the motive of the transaction undoubtedly was to secure advances made and to be made by B & Co., and although there might be not only an honourable understanding but even a binding collateral agreement as to the appropriation of any surplus on the sale of the vessel over the sum advanced, still the contract was a clear contract of sale and nothing else, which fulfilled every condition of the provision of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1, and that there was nothing in the transaction or the accompanying circumstances to affect the operation of that provision as regarded the rights of the creditors of the seller.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, your Lordships have listened to lengthened arguments in this case, but it appears to me that there are really only two questions which are ultimately material to the judgment. The first is, whether this is a contract of sale. Now, the appellant is under very great difficulties when he denies that it is a contract of sale, because upon the face of the instrument it is as carefully prepared and clearly expressed a contract of sale as anything can possibly be. And when we turn to the parole evidence, although no doubt on the one side and on the other there is a contrariety of statement, yet the purchasers (the respondents) most positively say that what is expressed in the instrument is that which was intended. It was done, no doubt, with the motive of securing the money which the purchasers had at stake, but it was done deliberately by way of purchase, because that was the best and most effectual way of accomplishing the object which the parties had in view. In corroboration of that, if corroboration were necessary, we find that the preliminary heads of the agreement, afterwards extended by this contract, begin, "memorandum for contract of sale and building contract;" and, if they could properly be looked to, the entries in the books of the law-agent are to the same effect. The statement on the other side is absolutely inconsistent with what appears upon the face of the instrument, and there is no reduction of the instrument asked for. It is not an allegation of something consistent with the instrument; it is an allegation entirely destructive of it. Therefore, as it appears to me, my Lords, the first point must be decided, in accordance with the instrument, that this was a sale, whatever may have been the motive, reason, and purpose which led to that sale; and its bona fides is really not in dispute.

M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

My Lords, I think I may, under those circumstances, pass very lightly over what was afterwards written and done. There was a course of action upon this contract, shewing, as I think, a clear intention to adhere to it; because certain cheques were from time to time drawn, by the persons who under the contract are technically, at all events, purchasers, for the whole amount of the agreed purchase-money, namely, £2500, and £50 further, which represents, as I understand, certain extra work done upon the ship. The fact that those were payments of purchase-money under the contract is evidenced by a series of documents signed, as often as any of those payments were made, expressly stating that they were "to account of the purchase price" payable by the purchasers for the ship in question, and these documents are all subscribed by Roney, who was, on the face of the contract, the seller. It is said that those payments are not to be regarded as real payments, because, not for all of them, but for all except £120 in the whole, there were acceptances given at the same time by Roney, who received the money. But it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the object of those acceptances was simply to keep the purchasers out of cash advances until the period of time at which, if those payments had not been made, the purchase-money would have been payable under the contract. Looking to this appropriation of payments made by the receipts for the cheques, it appears to me to be an irresistible conclusion that as between Roney and the purchasers, the purchasers, and not Roney, were liable and bound to take up those bills, as in point of fact they did, although not, as far as I know, till after the sequestration. In that state of things, those bills having been taken up, the money has in fact been paid by the purchasers, and to the full amount.

My Lords, I cannot but observe that, whatever may have been the intentions of the parties with regard to any ulterior arrangements or settlements between them, I find nothing to lead me to the conclusion that those intentions extended so far as in any event whatever to pay, or repay, the £2550 to the purchasers, otherwise than by means of the realisation of the property purchased. Personal debt, independent of this contract, I do not find to have resulted from the transaction between the parties. What is alleged is this—and there is undoubtedly some evidence in support of it—that the parties contemplated that the purchasers should realise this ship by sale, but that having originally gone into the transaction in a certain sense with a view to their own security, and evidently not having fixed the £2500 as a price in the ordinary way of bargain where the motive is to become possessed of and to retain the article purchased, the purchasers would not, if the article when sold fetched more than that amount, and any interest, costs, and so on, which might be due, take advantage of any gain or profit, which, according to the letter of the contract, they might possibly be able to realize.

My Lords, I cannot say that I find in this evidence any very clear or satisfactory proof of a positive agreement having been at any time made for that purpose, although I do find something sufficient to shew that there was a sense of moral obligation, at all events on the part of the purchasers, so to act, and that it was their apparent intention so to act. It may be that what happened between them may raise that, beyond moral obligation, into a legal or equitable obligation, which the Courts would enforce; and that certainly, I think, appears to have been the opinion of the learned Judges in the Court below. I will assume for the present purpose, that there might be sufficient grounds for that conclusion, but at the most it can come to nothing more than this—that this being in intention expressly a contract of sale, there is a bye-agreement, a collateral agreement, not in form of a regular back-bond, but of that nature, by reason of which, when the property purchased is realized by a subsequent sale, something will be done between the parties to adjust the mutual rights or equities which they have consented to establish between them. That appears to me not only not to destroy the sale as a sale, but really to proceed upon the contract as its foundation and basis, and to be something growing out of that contract which the parties, according to the hypothesis, agreed to do. Therefore, it appears to me that there is no ground whatever for treating this otherwise than as a sale.

I postpone the consideration of the correspondence which passed with a view to the subsequent sale or re-sale of this property, because that seems to connect itself naturally with another argument on the question of reputed ownership. Postponing that, I have first very lightly to pass over the argument founded upon the Scotch law as laid down in the case of Simpson v. Duncanson,¹ or supposed to be laid down in that case, independently of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. I frankly confess that unless Duncanson's case is to be explained, as it was put at the bar, upon the footing of a constructive delivery, I do not very distinctly or clearly understand what the law is which that case decided: it is admitted to be exceptional. Upon the face of the decision itself, as reported by Lord Monboddo, it seems, it was not that the property in the ship had vested, but that there was an obligation on the part of the trustee or assignee in bankruptcy, taking the property, to repay the money which had been laid out upon it,—which is a very different thing. But, put it as you will, the case of Simpson v. Duncanson does not appear to me to be an authority on which it is so satisfactory to rest the decision of the question now before your Lordships as it is to rest it upon the terms of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, which render a consideration of the difficulties which might have arisen in regard to Duncanson's case now immaterial.

By the general law of Scotland there must be tradition, or delivery, in order to give effect to a contract of sale; but by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, for the express purpose of assimilating the law of Scotland, on such points, to the law of England, it is provided that where goods have been sold but have not been delivered to the purchaser, but have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, the mere want of delivery shall not enable the creditors in bankruptcy of the seller to defeat the sale. I have already said that, in my opinion, whether in some sense security was the object or not, there was here a sale in fact and in intent. The statute does not say that, there being a sale, that is to be taken out of the operation of the statute, because the parties may have some further contract or agreement, or understanding inter se, with regard to the subject of the sale. This is a case in which, if there was a sale at all, there was a sale unaccompanied with a delivery to the purchasers. The subject was allowed to remain in the custody of the seller. Every condition of this statute was fulfilled, and I cannot see any ground upon which your Lordships can qualify those conditions of the statute for the purpose of defeating a bona fide transaction which is otherwise lawful. It appears to me, therefore, that the statute removes all the difficulties and questions which might otherwise have arisen as to the doctrine of Simpson v. Duncanson, and that, having regard to that clause of the statute, the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Session is correct, the only difficulty upon that point being that the Court of Session have

With regard to reputed ownership, I really think it is very far from necessary to say much, because beyond all question what Lord Justice Turner said in the case of *Holderness v. Rankin*¹ is true, that the fact of an unfinished ship being in a shipbuilder's yard is not enough by itself to raise a reputation of ownership on the part of the shipbuilder. I see nothing to distinguish this particular case from the ordinary one. If, in point of fact, this ship was not, after the sale, the property of the shipbuilders, the mere fact of its remaining in their yard unfinished could not create the reputation of its being so; and whether or no it was left at their order and disposition for the purpose of creating a reputation of ownership, and to enable them to deal with it in a way which would bring it within the scope of the bankruptcy law, is a question to be determined upon the evidence; and I can see no evidence whatever in support of that proposition. All that is referred to in support of it is a correspondence, shewing plainly enough that communications passed from time to time between the shipbuilder in whose yard this vessel was, and those whom I have called the purchasers, and also the brokers; and latterly, with one intending purchaser. That correspondence, taken as a whole (and every part of it is consistent with the rest), shews plainly, that it was intended and desired to find a purchaser for this unfinished vessel. References were made in the correspondence to the builder, but that would happen in the ordinary course of things if the person to whom the vessel belonged desired that it should be sold, whether it belonged to the builder, and whether it could be sold without his concurrence or not. Nothing was done or said from which I should infer that there was any authority which would have enabled him to deal with it without the concurrence and consent of the respondents. Their interest is several times referred to, and referred to in a manner which appears to me to be perfectly consistent with the absence of any reputation of ownership in the builder, or any intention to create it. No doubt, my Lords, in those letters the ship is frequently spoken of as the builder's ship; but the letters are not written to persons who are induced by their means to deal with the ship upon the footing of its being the property of the builder. They are not published to the world. Nothing appears to have happened with regard to these letters out of which a reputation of ownership could grow. Therefore, my Lords, it appears to me that there is nothing in that argument.

The last point that was mentioned, about the notice extending to the use of the building yard, may be said now to be at rest. It is admitted on all hands that such use as is necessary to enable the ship to be taken away is proper and not in dispute. On the other hand, any indefinite use of the building yard your Lordships do not understand to be claimed, and certainly if it were claimed it would receive no countenance from anything which your Lordships are likely to say.

There remains only the question whether any addition should be made to the interlocutor refusing the interdict. Now, the interdict is simply sought for to prevent those things from being done according to the notice which are authorised by the contract, and necessary to enable possession to be taken of the ship, and the ship to be sold, and such use, as I have already said, to be made of the building-yard as is absolutely necessary and indispensable. The interdict

seeks to prevent that, and the question is, is it according to contract or not? No. 12.
 If the contract is good, as I think your Lordships will hold it to be, those things appear to me to be authorised by the contract; and to refuse an interdict which would prohibit them appears to me to be a necessary consequence. July 27, 1881.
 If your Lordships are of that opinion, it appears to me that to go further, and to enter into the question of the ulterior rights of the parties under any collateral agreement which may exist between them, would not only not be necessary to protect any rights which may exist under such an agreement, but in the present state of the evidence I think your Lordships have not the materials upon which it would be possible or satisfactory to make any such declaration, or right to attempt it. M'Bain v. Wallace & Co. &c.

On the whole, my opinion is that the judgment under appeal is right, and I move your Lordships that the interlocutor be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am entirely of the same opinion.

It seems to me that it will be most convenient to consider first the true effect and construction of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 1. Now, there is a preamble to that Act explaining what the object of it is, and there is a similar preamble explaining the object of another Act, for there was one passed for England and one for Scotland in the same year. The object of the two Acts was this :—They were passed because there was a difference between the mercantile law of England and the mercantile law of Scotland which was found inconvenient in practice, and therefore it was desired to assimilate them in certain respects,—in some respects, doubtless, by making the English law similar to the Scotch, and in other respects by making the Scotch law similar to the English. It is therefore almost as important in construing that Act to know what was the English law as to know what was the Scotch law, and I believe that upon neither is there any real dispute.

By the English law when there was what civilians would call emptio perfecta, and what English lawyers call a bargain and sale,—a contract for good and valuable consideration to pass the property in particular chattels,—as soon as that was ascertained—the property did pass, and the purchaser, although he might not be entitled to delivery—for there might be a vendor's lien or something else to prevent delivery—was entitled nevertheless to the property in the goods, to the jus in re as well as to the jus ad rem. That made a very considerable practical difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland, for the law of Scotland was like the civil law upon which it was founded, the maxim of the civil law being traditionibus et usucapionibus non nudis pactis transferuntur rerum dominia. When there was not an actual delivery, however complete the contract might be,—although it was emptio perfecta to the fullest extent, amounting to all that in the great chapter of the Digest upon that subject has been considered to be emptio perfecta, and although every farthing of the price was paid,—yet the dominium rei, the jus in re, did not pass to the purchaser. Although he had the jus ad rem, and could, as long as the vendor was sui juris, compel the vendor to deliver to him the goods, he had not the jus in re. The practical result of that was that a creditor in Scotland might issue diligence and seize the goods, as still the goods of the vendor, that is to say, of the person who had sold them, although every farthing of the price had been paid; and further than that, if a sequestration had taken place, the springing from the same person there is an undoubted and substantial interest in one feuar, to enforce a restriction such as this, partaking of the nature of a servitude, against another feuar, the law will recognise a title available and sufficient to support his interest and to enforce the restriction."

If these words were taken as a complete statement of the law applicable to cases like the present, they would support the contention of the respondents, and so would the language used by Lord President Hope in the Governors of Heriot's Hospital v. Cockburn which I have not thought it necessary to quote. The soundness of Lord President Hope's dicta has been seriously questioned in subsequent cases, but I doubt whether either of the learned Judges intended, in the passages relied on by the respondents, to give an exhaustive definition of what is requisite in order to create a right in one feuar to enforce the conditions of another feu. Their statements of the law are unimpeachable if read with reference to the circumstances of the case in which they were uttered. If they were intended to have a wider application they were unnecessary for its decision.

The fact of the same condition appearing in feu-charters derived from a common superior, coupled with a substantial interest in its observance, does not appear to me to be sufficient to give each feuar a title to enforce it. No single feuar can, in my opinion, be subjected in liability to his co-feuars, unless it appears from the titles under which he holds his feu that such similarity of conditions and mutuality of interest among the feuars either had been or was meant to be established. According to the tenor of the feu-disposition, or feu-contract, as the case may be, the feuar and his superior are the only parties to it; and I am of opinion that no jus quæsitum can arise to any tertius except by the consent of both these contracting parties. That being so, unless the feuar, either in express words or by implication, gives his consent to the introduction of a tertius, the superior cannot as against him create any such interest, by imposing the same conditions to which he has submitted upon another feu in his vicinity.

In dealing with this question it is necessary to keep in view that when the feuar has a jus quæsitum, his title, and that of the superior, to enforce common feuing conditions are independent and substantially different rights. The title of the superior rests upon contract, a contract running with the estate of superiority and burdening the subaltern estate of the vassal. The right of the feuar, though arising ex contractu, is of the nature of a proper servitude, his feu being the dominant tenement; consequently he cannot enforce it against other feuars except in so far as he can qualify an interest to do so. Again, the superior's consent to discharge the condition cannot affect the right of the feuar, and as little can the feuar's renunciation of his servitude impair the superior's right to enforce the condition. It appears to me that it would be unreasonable and contrary to all principle to hold that a feuar was subject to such a servitude, except upon evidence warranting the inference that in accepting a title to his own feu he had it in contemplation, and tacitly agreed, that such a burden should be imposed upon him. And seeing that the burden when imposed affects the land which is the subject of his feu, I think the evidence of his con-mentioned exists, but it is not made by statute applicable to sequestration, or a case where the party has failed, but it rests upon the grounds of common law. A simple creditor who issues process and poinds the goods might at common law poind them as against the person who has sold the goods, if that person retained the jus in re, though he had lost the jus ad rem; notwithstanding the statute he may poind them as a creditor where the possession of the vendor (to borrow the phrase used by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of Sim v. Grant,¹) has been allowed by the purchaser to be such as is quite inconsistent with his having the jus ad rem by virtue of his personal contract of sale. It is very true that inasmuch as the vendor had, by the common law of Scotland before this Act was passed, the legal right of property, you could not properly say that he was "the reputed owner" of goods of which he was himself the actual owner. But the same principle which would have made a third person become the reputed owner, so as to give a creditor a right to seize them in his possession because the true owner had allowed them to be in his possession, appears to me to apply when you are applying the statute. If you can shew that the man who has acquired the jus ad rem has allowed the vendor to keep possession of the goods in such a way as is quite inconsistent with his jus ad rem, it seems very reasonable indeed to say that that shall be considered as analogous to a case of reputed ownership, and, that being so, the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act does not take the goods out of it. It says that, without delivery, a contract of sale shall be good to pass the property as against creditors, but it does not say that, without delivery, the property shall pass, where, if there had been delivery, and the goods had been left in this particular way with the vendor afterwards, they would have been made liable to the diligence of his creditors. So far, I think, the argument is quite right, but it is inapplicable to the present case. The effect of the contract of sale upon the goods with reference to the diligence of creditors is made exactly the same as if there had been an actual delivery, and as it would be under the English law.

It has been endeavoured to be argued that if there was here, by the side of the contract of sale, a collateral agreement that the ship should be only held as security, that would prevent the contract of sale operating under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act so as to require no delivery to prevent any diligence or sequestration. I cannot agree with that argument at all. I do not think that the point exactly arises here. I listened to the observations of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, and I agreed in the reasons which he gave. It seems to me that in this case the contract of sale was agreed upon probably with the motive and intention that the party should thereby be able safely to make advances and have the security of the goods that had been sold to him; but, whatever the motive and intention might be, it was as clear a contract of sale as anything could possibly be in its inception. I think that is perfectly plain. The evidence also leaves no doubt upon my mind that there was in this case a feeling of moral obligation on the part of Messrs Wallace that, if this ship should turn out to be worth much more than the £2500, they would not keep the surplus. I think that that is repeatedly recognised in the different letters which passed. My present idea would be that, although there was that moral obligation or honorary obligation, it never was reduced to a contract at all. The Solicitor-General says—If there was such a contract, when was it made, where that no part of it should be used for the storage of manure; and on the express condition that the restriction was to be imposed by A upon all his disponees or sub-feuars. A, without taking infeftment, conveyed part of the ground to B, and the remainder to C. The restriction was duly inserted in the feudal title completed by B; but C made up his title without any notice of the restriction, and subsequently conveyed to D, a singular successor, against whom an action was brought to enforce the restriction, by a pursuer deriving right from B. The defender maintained that the restriction was not validly imposed upon him, and that, even if it were, B and those in his right had no title to enforce it. As to the first of these points, the majority of the First Division were of opinion, upon grounds which appear to me to admit of considerable doubt, that the restriction was well imposed upon D as well as upon his author, C; and upon that footing their Lordships were of opinion that it was a mutual restriction, and that B had a good title to compel its observance by D.

The ratio decidendi in such cases as M'Gibbon v. Rankin seems to have been that a feuar, who stipulates with his superior that a particular restriction shall be imposed upon all his fellow-feuars as well as upon himself, must intend that he shall have the power of enforcing it against them, and that they shall have the like power as in a question with him. In Robertson v. North British Railway Company, and similar cases, the principle of decision appears to me to have been that a sub-feuar or disponee acquiring a building lot, subject to a particular condition, with notice in his titles that the common author, whether his immediate or over-superior, has imposed that condition upon the whole area of which his lot formed a part, must be taken as consenting that the condition shall be for mutual behoof of all the feuars or disponees within the area, and that all who have interest shall have a title to enforce it. In other words, the feuar is held as consenting to be bound by the law laid down by the common author for the benefit of all future feuars. I have been unable to find any decision proceeding upon the principle that a superior who feus out a portion of his estate to A under a precise restriction as to building, and who, in giving a title to A, neither undertakes, nor intimates an intention, to impose similar restrictions in feuing the remainder of his ground, can thereafter confer upon every feuar who acquires a building lot in the vicinity a jus quassitum enabling him to sue A directly.

In the present case, the respondents' title to sue appears to me to fail in two essential particulars. The titles to the appellant's feu are of older date than those of any other of the five lots in question, with the exception of lot 3, which was originally included in the same feu-contract of the 6th of June 1782. That deed lays no obligation upon the superior to observe any limitation in building upon the adjacent ground, or to impose any such limitation upon those to whom he might subsequently feu or dispoise it. No doubt there are words occurring in the deed from which it might be inferred that it was in the view of the superior to feu the adjoining ground on both sides; but there is not a single expression which can reasonably be held to indicate the superior's intention to restrict the adjoining feuars, and still less to imply that he meant to come under an obligation to that effect. Again, the several restrictions as to building contained in the titles of the appellant and the respondents do not, in my opinion, so resemble each other as to raise the inference that they were intended to be mutual. These restrictions are, in both sets of titles, expressed in the same words; but substance they are very different. The one is a prohibition against building anything except a single house, fronting Gayfield Square, with offices. The other is a prohibition against building anything more than two dwelling-houses, with offices, the one fronting to Gayfield Square on the east, and the other to a street on the west. The restriction imposed upon the appellant has, in the case of the respondents, been departed from to the extent of allowing them to build a second dwelling-house upon the west end of their feu—a departure which seems to me to be fatal to the existence of that similarity and consequent mutuality of restriction upon which the argument of the respondents was mainly rested.

June 23, 1881.
Hislop v. Mac-
Ritchie's Trus-
tees.

I have accordingly come to the conclusion that the respondents had and have no title, in their own persons, to raise and insist in the present action. That leaves the question whether their right to sue, which I assume to be nil, has been validated by the consent and concurrence of their superiors, to the effect of entitling them to decree in the terms of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict.

It was argued for the appellant that the superiors, the trustees of Cauvin's Hospital, have waived their right to enforce the restriction in his titles by permitting others of their feuars in the vicinity to violate the building conditions to which they were subject. If that proposition were clearly made out, it would be sufficient for the disposal of the case; but I am unable to adopt the appellant's argument, which was necessarily based upon an implied obligation on the part of the superiors to impose and enforce these conditions for his behoof. It appears to me that the case must be disposed of on the footing that the superiors have still a good title to enforce the restriction as against him; and that they have given their consent and concurrence to the instance of the respondents. I think the appellant is barred, by his pleadings on the record, from maintaining that such consent and concurrence was not in point of fact given. Upon this branch of the case I concur in the views which were expressed by Lord Young in the Court below. Actions at the instance of one party with the consent and concurrence of another, are of every day occurrence in the practice of the Courts of Scotland. In all such cases, the proper instance is that of the leading pursuer or complainer who sues in his or her own right and title. Thus a wife, sente matrimonio, sues with consent of her husband, and a minor with consent of his curators; but the right of action is vested in the wife and the minor only, and decree passes in their favour, the interposition of their legal guardians, as parties consenting, being merely required as a judicial precaution against any neglect of their interests in the conduct of the suit. Various other illustrations of the practice are to be found in the opinion of Lord Young, and it is unnecessary to repeat them here. But I know of no authority for holding that, according to the law or practice of Scotland, a person who has no right or title whatever can sue an action, provided he obtain the consent and concurrence of the party to whom alone such right or title belongs.

The reasons assigned for their judgment by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford appear to me to be unsatisfactory. The Lord Justice-Clerk deals with the case as if the superiors had the primary right and the respondents "a subordinate and derivative title to enforce" the restriction in question. If the respondents were really possessed of a subordinate and derivative title, I should come to the same conclusion as his Lordship; but that is not their true position. The respondents may, indeed, have an interest to prevent the erection of the buildings contemplated by the appellant; but their interest is no greater than

No. 11. it would be if they had no feudal relation to the superiors of the appellant's feu, or if there were no restriction in the appellant's titles. They have no right or title, primary or subordinate, to enforce the restriction, neither have they any title to compel the superiors to enforce it. Lord Gifford, on the other hand, seems to hold it conclusive of the present question that "he who is merely a consentor to a disposition of heritage is held to be really a disponent, if the true title of the subject be found to be in him." That illustration embodies a correct statement of the law, but it has no bearing upon judicial procedure; and if admitted as an analogy would necessarily lead to the result that any stranger might insist in an action with regard to landed estate in which he had no right or interest, provided he sued with the consent and concurrence of the proprietor.

Hislop v. Mac-
Ritchie's Trus-
tees.

It was suggested by Lord Gifford that the instance of the respondents, assuming it to be defective, might be cured by amending the libel, to the effect of allowing the superiors to stand as complainers for their interest, under the provisions of section 29 of the Court of Session Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100). That clause enacts that "all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made." I cannot doubt that the amendment proposed by the learned Judge would have been unwarranted by the terms of the statute, which contemplate alterations on the record with the view of facilitating the determination of the real questions at issue between the original parties, but not the importation of new parties into the litigation.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the interlocutors under appeal ought to be reversed, and a remit made in the terms proposed by your Lordships.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed, with costs, and the cause "remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions to sustain the third plea in law for the appellant, and to refuse the reasons of suspension, and find the respondents liable in expenses, and to ordain the respondents to repay to the appellant the expenses in the Court of Session."

Sale—Delivery—Ship—Payment by instalments during construction—Bankruptcy of shipbuilder—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.—Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) that the rule introduced by sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act whereby a purchaser's right to enforce delivery from the seller is secured against the subsequent diligence of the seller's creditors, "including sequestration," applied in a case where a ship was sold by the builder in the course of construction, and remained in the seller's hands undelivered at the date of his sequestration.

Question, whether by the common law of Scotland the property of the ship passes to the purchaser without delivery as the instalments of the price are paid.

Observations on the case of Simpson v. Duncanson, 1786, M. 14,204.

Sale—Right in security—Security over moveables—Ship—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.—A, a shipbuilder who had a vessel on the stocks, applied to B & Co., to whom he was already indebted, to assist him with advances to enable him to complete the vessel. B & Co. only consented on condition that the vessel should be sold to them, as they considered that in no other way would they be safe to make the advances asked. This was agreed to, and an absolute contract of sale was entered into by the parties unqualified in any way, though there was admittedly an honourable understanding that should the vessel realise a profit beyond the sum paid by B & Co., they would communicate the benefit to A.

The advances already made were attributed towards the agreed-on price, the balance of which was paid by instalments as required, for which receipts were granted by the seller "to account of the purchase price." At the same time, to raise money to keep the purchasers out of cash advances, bills to the necessary amount were drawn by B & Co. and accepted by A and discounted by B & Co. While the vessel was in course of completion B & Co. entered into negotiations for the sale of the vessel, in which they described it as a vessel belonging to A in which they had a personal interest, as they were under considerable advances to A against the vessel. They did not succeed in selling the vessel, and before it was completed and delivered A was sequestered. The accommodation-bills above mentioned were not retired by B and Co. till after A's sequestration.

Held that though the motive of the transaction undoubtedly was to secure advances made and to be made by B & Co., and although there might be not only an honourable understanding but even a binding collateral agreement as to the appropriation of any surplus on the sale of the vessel over the sum advanced, still the contract was a clear contract of sale and nothing else, which fulfilled every condition of the provision of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1, and that there was nothing in the transaction or the accompanying circumstances to affect the operation of that provision as regarded the rights of the creditors of the seller.

Mr M'Bain, Roney's trustee, appealed.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, your Lordships have listened to lengthened arguments in this case, but it appears to me that there are really only two questions which are ultimately material to the judgment. The first is, whether this is a contract of sale. Now, the appellant is under very great difficulties when he denies that it is a contract of sale, because upon the face of the instrument it is as carefully prepared and clearly expressed a contract of sale as anything can possibly be. And when we turn to the parole evidence, although no doubt on the one side and on the other there is a contrariety of statement, yet the purchasers (the respondents) most positively say that what is expressed in the instrument is that which was intended. It was done, no doubt, with the motive of securing the money which the purchasers had at stake, but it was done deliberately by way of purchase, because that was the best and most effectual way of accomplishing the object which the parties had in view. In corroboration of that, if corroboration were necessary, we find that the preliminary heads of the agreement, afterwards extended by this contract, begin, "memorandum for contract of sale and building contract;" and, if they could properly be looked to, the entries in the books of the law-agent are to the same effect. The statement on the other side is absolutely inconsistent with what appears upon the face of the instrument, and there is no reduction of the instrument asked for. It is not an allegation of something consistent with the instrument; it is an allegation entirely destructive of it. Therefore, as it appears to me, my Lords, the first point must be decided, in accordance with the instrument, that this was a sale, whatever may have been the motive, reason, and purpose which led to that sale; and its bona fides is really not in dispute.

M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

My Lords, I think I may, under those circumstances, pass very lightly over what was afterwards written and done. There was a course of action upon this contract, shewing, as I think, a clear intention to adhere to it; because certain cheques were from time to time drawn, by the persons who under the contract are technically, at all events, purchasers, for the whole amount of the agreed purchase-money, namely, £2500, and £50 further, which represents, as I understand, certain extra work done upon the ship. The fact that those were payments of purchase-money under the contract is evidenced by a series of documents signed, as often as any of those payments were made, expressly stating that they were "to account of the purchase price" payable by the purchasers for the ship in question, and these documents are all subscribed by Roney, who was, on the face of the contract, the seller. It is said that those payments are not to be regarded as real payments, because, not for all of them, but for all except £120 in the whole, there were acceptances given at the same time by Roney, who received the money. But it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the object of those acceptances was simply to keep the purchasers out of cash advances until the period of time at which, if those payments had not been made, the purchase-money would have been payable under the contract. Looking to this appropriation of payments made by the receipts for the cheques, it appears to me to be an irresistible conclusion that as between Roney and the purchasers, the purchasers, and not Roney, were liable and bound to take up those bills, as in point of fact they did, although not, as far as I know, till after the sequestration. In that state of things, those bills having been taken up, the money has in fact been paid by the purchasers, and to the full amount.

My Lords, I cannot but observe that, whatever may have been the intentions of the parties with regard to any ulterior arrangements or settlements between them, I find nothing to lead me to the conclusion that those intentions extended so far as in any event whatever to pay, or repay, the £2550 to the purchasers, otherwise than by means of the realisation of the property purchased. Personal debt, independent of this contract, I do not find to have resulted from the transaction between the parties. What is alleged is this—and there is undoubtedly some evidence in support of it—that the parties contemplated that the purchasers should realise this ship by sale, but that having originally gone into the transaction in a certain sense with a view to their own security, and evidently not having fixed the £2500 as a price in the ordinary way of bargain where the motive is to become possessed of and to retain the article purchased, the purchasers would not, if the article when sold fetched more than that amount, and any interest, costs, and so on, which might be due, take advantage of any gain or profit, which, according to the letter of the contract, they might possibly be able to realize.

My Lords, I cannot say that I find in this evidence any very clear or satisfactory proof of a positive agreement having been at any time made for that purpose, although I do find something sufficient to shew that there was a sense of moral obligation, at all events on the part of the purchasers, so to act, and that it was their apparent intention so to act. It may be that what happened between them may raise that, beyond moral obligation, into a legal or equitable obligation, which the Courts would enforce; and that certainly, I think, appears to have been the opinion of the learned Judges in the Court below. I will assume for the present purpose, that there might be sufficient grounds for that conclusion, but at the most it can come to nothing more than this—that this being in in-tion expressly a contract of sale, there is a bye-agreement, a collateral agreement, not in form of a regular back-bond, but of that nature, by reason of which, when the property purchased is realized by a subsequent sale, something will be done between the parties to adjust the mutual rights or equities which they have consented to establish between them. That appears to me not only not to destroy the sale as a sale, but really to proceed upon the contract as its foundation and basis, and to be something growing out of that contract which the parties, according to the hypothesis, agreed to do. Therefore, it appears to me that there is no ground whatever for treating this otherwise than as a sale.

I postpone the consideration of the correspondence which passed with a view to the subsequent sale or re-sale of this property, because that seems to connect itself naturally with another argument on the question of reputed ownership. Postponing that, I have first very lightly to pass over the argument founded upon the Scotch law as laid down in the case of Simpson v. Duncanson,¹ or supposed to be laid down in that case, independently of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. I frankly confess that unless Duncanson's case is to be explained, as it was put at the bar, upon the footing of a constructive delivery, I do not very distinctly or clearly understand what the law is which that case decided: it is admitted to be exceptional. Upon the face of the decision itself, as reported by Lord Monboddo, it seems, it was not that the property in the ship had vested, but that there was an obligation on the part of the trustee or assignee in bankruptcy, taking the property, to repay the money which had been laid out upon it,—which is a very different thing. But, put it as you will, the case of Simpson v. Duncanson does not appear to me to be an authority on which it is so satisfactory to rest the decision of the question now before your Lordships as it is to rest it upon the terms of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, which render a consideration of the difficulties which might have arisen in regard to Duncanson's case now immaterial.

By the general law of Scotland there must be tradition, or delivery, in order to give effect to a contract of sale; but by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, for the express purpose of assimilating the law of Scotland, on such points, to the law of England, it is provided that where goods have been sold but have not been delivered to the purchaser, but have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, the mere want of delivery shall not enable the creditors in bankruptcy of the seller to defeat the sale. I have already said that, in my opinion, whether in some sense security was the object or not, there was here a sale in fact and in intent. The statute does not say that, there being a sale, that is to be taken out of the operation of the statute, because the parties may have some further contract or agreement, or understanding inter se, with regard to the subject of the sale. This is a case in which, if there was a sale at all, there was a sale unaccompanied with a delivery to the purchasers. The subject was allowed to remain in the custody of the seller. Every condition of this statute was fulfilled, and I cannot see any ground upon which your Lordships can qualify those conditions of the statute for the purpose of defeating a bona fide transaction which is otherwise lawful. It appears to me, therefore, that the statute removes all the difficulties and questions which might otherwise have arisen as to the doctrine of Simpson v. Duncanson, and that, having regard to that clause of the statute, the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Session is correct, the only difficulty upon that point being that the Court of Session have

With regard to reputed ownership, I really think it is very far from necessary to say much, because beyond all question what Lord Justice Turner said in the case of *Holderness v. Rankin*¹ is true, that the fact of an unfinished ship being in a shipbuilder's yard is not enough by itself to raise a reputation of ownership on the part of the shipbuilder. I see nothing to distinguish this particular case from the ordinary one. If, in point of fact, this ship was not, after the sale, the property of the shipbuilders, the mere fact of its remaining in their yard unfinished could not create the reputation of its being so; and whether or no it was left at their order and disposition for the purpose of creating a reputation of ownership, and to enable them to deal with it in a way which would bring it within the scope of the bankruptcy law, is a question to be determined upon the evidence; and I can see no evidence whatever in support of that proposition. All that is referred to in support of it is a correspondence, shewing plainly enough that communications passed from time to time between the shipbuilder in whose yard this vessel was, and those whom I have called the purchasers, and also the brokers; and latterly, with one intending purchaser. That correspondence, taken as a whole (and every part of it is consistent with the rest), shews plainly, that it was intended and desired to find a purchaser for this unfinished vessel. References were made in the correspondence to the builder, but that would happen in the ordinary course of things if the person to whom the vessel belonged desired that it should be sold, whether it belonged to the builder, and whether it could be sold without his concurrence or not. Nothing was done or said from which I should infer that there was any authority which would have enabled him to deal with it without the concurrence and consent of the respondents. Their interest is several times referred to, and referred to in a manner which appears to me to be perfectly consistent with the absence of any reputation of ownership in the builder, or any intention to create it. No doubt, my Lords, in those letters the ship is frequently spoken of as the builder's ship; but the letters are not written to persons who are induced by their means to deal with the ship upon the footing of its being the property of the builder. They are not published to the world. Nothing appears to have happened with regard to these letters out of which a reputation of ownership could grow. Therefore, my Lords, it appears to me that there is nothing in that argument.

The last point that was mentioned, about the notice extending to the use of the building yard, may be said now to be at rest. It is admitted on all hands that such use as is necessary to enable the ship to be taken away is proper and not in dispute. On the other hand, any indefinite use of the building yard your Lordships do not understand to be claimed, and certainly if it were claimed it would receive no countenance from anything which your Lordships are likely to say.

There remains only the question whether any addition should be made to the interlocutor refusing the interdict. Now, the interdict is simply sought for to prevent those things from being done according to the notice which are authorised by the contract, and necessary to enable possession to be taken of the ship, and the ship to be sold, and such use, as I have already said, to be made of the building-yard as is absolutely necessary and indispensable. The interdict

 If the contract is good, as I think your Lordships will hold it to be, those things appear to me to be authorised by the contract; and to refuse an interdict which would prohibit them appears to me to be a necessary consequence. July 27, 1881.
 If your Lordships are of that opinion, it appears to me that to go further, and to enter into the question of the ulterior rights of the parties under any collateral agreement which may exist between them, would not only not be necessary to protect any rights which may exist under such an agreement, but in the present state of the evidence I think your Lordships have not the materials upon which it would be possible or satisfactory to make any such declaration, or right to attempt it. M'Bain v. Wallace & Co. &c.

On the whole, my opinion is that the judgment under appeal is right, and I move your Lordships that the interlocutor be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am entirely of the same opinion.

It seems to me that it will be most convenient to consider first the true effect and construction of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 1. Now, there is a preamble to that Act explaining what the object of it is, and there is a similar preamble explaining the object of another Act, for there was one passed for England and one for Scotland in the same year. The object of the two Acts was this :—They were passed because there was a difference between the mercantile law of England and the mercantile law of Scotland which was found inconvenient in practice, and therefore it was desired to assimilate them in certain respects,—in some respects, doubtless, by making the English law similar to the Scotch, and in other respects by making the Scotch law similar to the English. It is therefore almost as important in construing that Act to know what was the English law as to know what was the Scotch law, and I believe that upon neither is there any real dispute.

By the English law when there was what civilians would call emptio perfecta, and what English lawyers call a bargain and sale,—a contract for good and valuable consideration to pass the property in particular chattels,—as soon as that was ascertained—the property did pass, and the purchaser, although he might not be entitled to delivery—for there might be a vendor's lien or something else to prevent delivery—was entitled nevertheless to the property in the goods, to the jus in re as well as to the jus ad rem. That made a very considerable practical difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland, for the law of Scotland was like the civil law upon which it was founded, the maxim of the civil law being traditionibus et usucapionibus non nudis pactis transferuntur rerum dominia. When there was not an actual delivery, however complete the contract might be,—although it was emptio perfecta to the fullest extent, amounting to all that in the great chapter of the Digest upon that subject has been considered to be emptio perfecta, and although every farthing of the price was paid,—yet the dominium rei, the jus in re, did not pass to the purchaser. Although he had the jus ad rem, and could, as long as the vendor was sui juris, compel the vendor to deliver to him the goods, he had not the jus in re. The practical result of that was that a creditor in Scotland might issue diligence and seize the goods, as still the goods of the vendor, that is to say, of the person who had sold them, although every farthing of the price had been paid; and further than that, if a sequestration had taken place, the

No. 12.

 M'Bain v.
 Wallace & Co.

vendor having become a bankrupt, the property passed to the trustee in the sequestration who was entitled to hold it, leaving the man who had perhaps paid every farthing of the price to prove against the estate. That was the state of the law in Scotland, and it is obvious that there was a very considerable difference in the practical working of the English law and the Scotch. If a man purchased a quantity of goods, one half of which lay at Greenock and the other half at Liverpool, the creditors of the vendor might seize the goods in Greenock, but no creditor could touch the goods in Liverpool. In the case of a sequestration in Scotland, the trustee could take the goods in Greenock, but in the case of a bankruptcy in England, the assignee in bankruptcy could not touch the goods in Liverpool.

Those were the differences between the laws of the two countries.

Then comes the Act of Parliament for the purpose of assimilating the two laws, and it says this :—"Where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller after the date of such sale to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser, or others in his right, from enforcing the delivery of the same." Now, I quite agree that that does not say that a contract of sale,—emptio perfecta,—in Scotland shall pass the property—shall pass the jus in re—and so far it does not assimilate it to the English law at all. The chief practical difference arising from the jus in re remaining in the vendor and the jus ad rem going to the purchaser was that the vendor's creditors by pouncing and by sequestration could take the goods. There is a nominal difference still between the law of England and the law of Scotland, but for all practical purposes the law of Scotland, where there has been a contract of sale, though no delivery, is made identical with the law of England in the actual result.

Now, my Lords, an argument has been based upon the words of the Act "where goods have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller." An attempt has been made to give a meaning to those words with which I cannot agree. I think that when you take the existing law of England and Scotland, as I have mentioned, and see what was the object of the Legislature in using these words, it is plain that they could not have intended by such words as these: "been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller," to introduce a new and complicated difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland. It is perfectly true, I think, as regards the law of Scotland, and it is to some extent true also as regards the law of England, that, independent of bankruptcy and before there is bankruptcy at all, where one person has allowed another to have possession of goods under such circumstances, and in such a way as to accredit that other person, and entitle him to sell them, or to acquire credit upon them—if the true owner has allowed this to take place—he should be responsible for the consequences, and it would be unjust for him to take away the goods to the damage of those who may, in consequence of his having accredited the other person, have acquired a right over them, though before there has been bankruptcy. In England, when there has been bankruptcy this principle has been now for a very long time carried out by force of a statute which we need not now consider, because it is not under the English statute of bankruptcy at all that the question now arises. In Scotland, I understand that something very similar to the principle I have mentioned exists, but it is not made by statute applicable to sequestration, or to a case where the party has failed, but it rests upon the grounds of common law. No. 12.

 A simple creditor who issues process and poinds the goods might at common law July 27, 1881.
 poind them as against the person who has sold the goods, if that person retained M'Bain v.
 the jus in re, though he had lost the jus ad rem; notwithstanding the statute Wallace & Co.
 he may poind them as a creditor where the possession of the vendor (to borrow &c. the phrase used by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of Sim v. Grant,¹) has been allowed by the purchaser to be such as is quite inconsistent with his having the jus ad rem by virtue of his personal contract of sale. It is very true that inasmuch as the vendor had, by the common law of Scotland before this Act was passed, the legal right of property, you could not properly say that he was "the reputed owner" of goods of which he was himself the actual owner.
 But the same principle which would have made a third person become the reputed owner, so as to give a creditor a right to seize them in his possession because the true owner had allowed them to be in his possession, appears to me to apply when you are applying the statute. If you can shew that the man who has acquired the jus ad rem has allowed the vendor to keep possession of the goods in such a way as is quite inconsistent with his jus ad rem, it seems very reasonable indeed to say that that shall be considered as analogous to a case of reputed ownership, and, that being so, the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act does not take the goods out of it. It says that, without delivery, a contract of sale shall be good to pass the property as against creditors, but it does not say that, without delivery, the property shall pass, where, if there had been delivery, and the goods had been left in this particular way with the vendor afterwards, they would have been made liable to the diligence of his creditors.
 So far, I think, the argument is quite right, but it is inapplicable to the present case. The effect of the contract of sale upon the goods with reference to the diligence of creditors is made exactly the same as if there had been an actual delivery, and as it would be under the English law.

It has been endeavoured to be argued that if there was here, by the side of the contract of sale, a collateral agreement that the ship should be only held as security, that would prevent the contract of sale operating under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act so as to require no delivery to prevent any diligence or sequestration. I cannot agree with that argument at all. I do not think that the point exactly arises here. I listened to the observations of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, and I agreed in the reasons which he gave. It seems to me that in this case the contract of sale was agreed upon probably with the motive and intention that the party should thereby be able safely to make advances and have the security of the goods that had been sold to him; but, whatever the motive and intention might be, it was as clear a contract of sale as anything could possibly be in its inception. I think that is perfectly plain. The evidence also leaves no doubt upon my mind that there was in this case a feeling of moral obligation on the part of Messrs Wallace that, if this ship should turn out to be worth much more than the £2500, they would not keep the surplus. I think that that is repeatedly recognised in the different letters which passed. My present idea would be that, although there was that moral obligation or honorary obligation, it never was reduced to a contract at all. The Solicitor-General says—If there was such a contract, when was it made, where

No. 12.

M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

was it made? from which he concludes that it must have existed ab initio; I think, on the contrary, that it may be concluded that it never existed at all. That would be my impression, certainly, if I were going to decide it; but that was not the impression of the Court below, and it is not necessary to decide it. But supposing there was this completed collateral contract—not only an honorary contract, which I have no doubt that there was, but a binding, legal, and enforceable contract—that this should be a security, I do not see the slightest ground for saying that that undoes the effect of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which says that goods having been sold (as these were, although with a motive no doubt to produce this effect), as far as regards the rights of creditors of the vendor to prevent delivery of the goods either by sequestration or pouding, they shall have none, but the matter shall stand as it would under the English law. That, I think, is the point that will be decided here.

Upon the rest of the case, my Lords, I think I need hardly say anything more. Supposing it to be the fact that there was a collateral contract of that sort, doubtless in the possible event of the ship proving to be worth more than the advances which have been made, it may be that it will come into operation. I expect, however, and I fear, for the sake of both parties, that it will turn out that it never will come into operation, because the ship will never sell for so much as has been advanced in respect of it. But that we have nothing to do with. As to all the rest of the case, I think the interdict here is asked for against their fulfilling the very terms of the contract which they have made. The interdict would have the effect of preventing the purchaser from enforcing delivery of the ship. That is exactly what the Mercantile Law Amendment Act says shall not be done by the creditors of the seller by any process of law, including sequestration. It seems to me, therefore, that the interdict should be refused. And I do not see the slightest occasion for doing anything further; indeed, I think mischief would probably be done by declaring any rights or doing anything at all further. I quite agree in thinking that when there is a ship standing in a dockyard unfinished, as this was, the purchaser, if he has a right to the ship, must necessarily have a right to do what is necessary and proper for taking the ship out of that dockyard; and it is impossible to suppose that sequestration would prevent his doing it. I also agree that the parties neither claimed nor intended to claim any right to let the ship remain for two years in the dock, and to occupy the dock while it was being built. I do not think they claimed anything so unreasonable, and, consequently, I do not think it is necessary to say anything at all against their having such a claim. It seems to me that, if they do make such a claim, it must be left to the sequestrator, or the trustee, or the landlord of the dock (for I understand it is a leasehold) to take proper steps to eject them. It is not necessary now to say anything at all about it.

Therefore, my Lords, I quite agree that the interlocutor of the Court below is right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, I entirely concur in the view that your Lordships take upon this case.

I cannot doubt that the contract between these parties is in terms a contract of sale and nothing else. It is a binding contract reduced to writing, and I think it must, so far as it is not legitimately controlled by the terms of some other collateral contract, take effect between the two parties to it in terms as a contract of sale. I must confess that I very greatly doubt the competency of importing into the construction of that written contract a very great deal of the evidence that was taken in this case. It appears to me that a great deal of it consists of antecedent communings, which, according to the law of Scotland, can have no effect whatever in indicating what is to be the true construction of the concluded contract in which the parties embodied their stipulations in writing. The very purpose of reducing them to writing was to get rid of all the doubt and perplexity that would arise as to the terms of the contract, if it had been left to stand upon the antecedent negotiations which had taken place, whether orally or by letter. But, my Lords, there is evidence as to the actings of the parties under the contract, as to their writings when the contract was in course, I may say, of execution; and those might, according to my view of the law of evidence in Scotland, be legitimately referred to as clearing up any point which might be doubtful. I cannot say that I find anything doubtful in this contract requiring elucidation from those sources, and upon looking to the correspondence and to the oral evidence, I can find nothing there which in the least degree conflicts with the construction which the contract, according to its own terms, ought, in my opinion, to receive.

No. 12.

July 27, 1881.

M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

Now, the contention of the appellant was twofold. He first maintained, upon the evidence, that he controlled the contract and imported a new meaning into the contract by the evidence which he had led. The Lord Ordinary seems to have given effect to that view, and to have held that the contract did not set forth the true agreement between the parties, that their agreement in reality was one for a loan upon security and not for a sale and purchase; and if that view were well founded, the judgment of the Lord Ordinary undoubtedly is equally so. But, my Lords, I find it impossible to accept that view, and I therefore turn to the alternative view which was presented in argument at the bar. It was to this effect; that although in form this might be a contract of sale, it was in substance intended thereby to give a security only. That really resolves itself into an allegation that the motive of the parties in making the contract was to effect that which might more directly, had the circumstances of the case rendered it advisable, have been effected by a loan on the security of the vessel. But, my Lords, I cannot conceive that the contract is not to take effect according to its legal terms and legal meaning, simply because it was thereby intended by the purchasers to give to the seller the benefits which they found it impracticable, with safety to themselves, to give him as a loan.

My Lords, the question raised in this case which I come to next (and I take it in this order because it seems to me to be sufficient for the disposal of the case) is the question of the effect of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856. Now, my Lords, being of opinion that this is a pure contract of sale, I think it necessarily follows that, according to the law of Scotland as it stands, and as it stood, irrespective of the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, it would have been valid as against the trustee in bankruptcy if it had been followed by actual tradition or delivery of the ship. I say nothing at present of constructive delivery as equivalent to actual, in a question with the trustee. That being so, what is the effect of the Act? It is necessary to consider for a moment in determining that question how the law stood at the date of the passing of that statute. At that time, by the law of Scotland, a purchaser who had merely a personal contract of sale, could not demand delivery from a trustee in a sequestration of the seller. It was in the option of the trustee to enforce the contract against him by tendering delivery of the vessel

No. 12. and suing for the price. But the purchaser, on the other hand, who had not

July 27, 1881.
M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

got delivery, had no right to compel implement in a question with the trustee. Now, the statute was passed for the purpose of assimilating the law of Scotland to that of England. As I understand the law of England, a concluded contract of sale—what in Scotland is termed a concluded personal contract of sale—has the effect of passing the property or interest in the property of the goods sold to the purchaser. In Scotland it undoubtedly had not that effect, and in order to place a purchaser in Scotland in the same position as a purchaser in England in questions with creditors of a bankrupt or the assignee or trustee in sequestration of a bankrupt, the Legislature did not enact that in Scotland the completion of a personal contract should pass the property, or have the effect of delivery, but it did enact, by the 1st section of the Statute of 1856, that as in a question with the creditors of the seller, or with the trustee in a sequestration of the seller, the purchaser under a personal contract of sale should have precisely the same right to enforce delivery of the goods sold as he would have had against the bankrupt had he remained solvent. That statute appears to me, my Lords, to supply all that is wanting to the completeness and efficacy of the contract in this case. Practically the effect of that section of the statute is to dispense with the necessity for delivery in the case of a purchaser who has a personal contract of sale. You have here a personal contract of sale, and you have here a statute dispensing with the necessity of actual delivery under it. That being so, I think we have, as your Lordships have already indicated, a satisfactory ground for deciding this case apart from all questions as to what the law of Scotland was before the Act was passed.

Now, my Lords, I do not think it necessary to say much upon the question of what the law of Scotland formerly was, because, seeing that the Act of 1856 is held by your Lordships to apply to this case, any question of what the law was before that statute was passed really possesses little more than an antiquarian interest. I think the question raised is a very difficult and a very doubtful one. I rather think there are authorities in the law of Scotland which come nearer to the case presented by the respondents here, than the case of which we have heard so much, namely, Simpson v. Duncanson. Many cases might have been found which would have supported the argument on the part of the respondents with regard to the purchase of an article nearly completed, with instalments of the price paid up to a certain date, the article being left in the hands of the vendor for the purpose of completion, there remaining another instalment which would have to be paid for work at that time undone. I dismiss that, however, because it appears to be unnecessary, for the purposes of this case, to determine anything in regard to it.

But it was said that the respondents in this case cannot have the benefit of the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, because they have permitted Mr Roney, the bankrupt, to deal with this vessel as if he were the owner of it (I dismiss the word "reputed" as not being very applicable to the case of a person in whom the legal estate is vested), and so to raise credit upon the faith of his being the true owner. Now, my Lords, without examining the doctrine of the law of Scotland, which certainly has rested, and was introduced, upon principles of equity, I think it is sufficiently clear that where a purchaser permits the seller to retain the goods and to deal with them as if they were his own, and as if no sale of them had actually taken place, he cannot have any claim to have those goods delivered to him, not as in a question with the seller of the goods, but as in a question with onerous creditors of the seller. But, whilst I admit that the principle contended for exists, and I believe it to be a sound principle, I cannot find the slightest ground of fact for holding that there has been any such holding out of himself as owner on the part of Mr Roney in the present case, whether consented to by the respondents or not. I entirely concur with the observations that were made upon this part of the evidence by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

My Lords, the learned Judges in the Court below have indicated that in this case it is their view that a collateral contract was constituted of a nature which undoubtedly may co-exist with the contract of sale in question. I forbear to offer any opinion upon that point, because I cannot find any such case raised upon this record, and I do not think it desirable to indicate any opinion either for or against the appellant upon that point. But if the appellant has any such right, if he can instruct any such contract, I do not think his interest will be prejudiced by the form of judgment pronounced in the Court below. No doubt the appellant came into Court complaining of the whole terms of the notice which had been served upon him by the respondents; but the mere fact of his complaining of the whole notice, and putting it all in his note of suspension and interdict, does not entitle him to object in this process to that notice upon all and every ground which he may discover. The very object of having a record is to limit the complainer (and especially in a summary proceeding like this) to those grounds of objection which are set forth upon the record. And here there is no allegation, as far as I can find, of any collateral contract, nor is there any allegation that he desires to have any reservation of his rights. He neither alleges that he has a right under a collateral contract, nor does he allege that that right has been invaded. It humbly appears to me, my Lords, that even under the notice it is quite possible for the respondents in this case to proceed without doing anything to prejudice that collateral contract, if it exists; and the form of the record is such as not to prevent the appellant, if he has good cause of complaint, from making that complaint and obtaining his appropriate remedy, in a new and separate proceeding.

I therefore think that the judgment, in the terms in which it was pronounced by the Lords of the Second Division, ought to stand, as your Lordships have already proposed, as the judgment of this House.

the obligation of preserving the same for the purposes of the game of golf. In 1820 the magistrates feued off a strip along the southern boundary of this piece of ground where it abutted on the high road. On this strip of ground houses were built facing the high road, and the actings of the magistrates not being timeously objected to, these feus came in course of time to be no longer in point of law part of the Links. Houses were afterwards built at the north end of these feus facing the part of the Links reserved by the magistrates, and access was obtained to them along the margin of the Links. This becoming cut up by traffic, the magistrates resolved to form a regular metalled road twenty-one feet wide on that part of the Links which adjoined these feus, for the general use of the public as well as of the feuars. This was objected to as an encroachment on the rights of the inhabitants.

Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) that on the evidence adduced the formation of the proposed road would not in the meantime interfere with the use of the Links by the inhabitants as heretofore for the game of golf, and that therefore the magistrates were entitled in their administration of the burgh property to make the said road, but that they were bound to retain the road and the ground on which it was constructed subject to the same uses as any other portion of the Links, and to take such steps as might be necessary to prevent the acquisition by any person or persons of any rights over the same which might conflict with the right of the magistrates to take away or alter said road, or to restrict and regulate the traffic thereon should emerging circumstances render that necessary for the protection of the rights of the inhabitants.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the object of this appeal, as it appears to me, is practically to limit the power of the Magistrates and Town-Council of St Andrews over the Links of St Andrews to a greater extent than that which has been thought necessary or right by the Court of Session. I take the material facts upon which the case is to depend as they are stated in the 3d and 4th paragraphs of the answers for the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of St Andrews, who admit that the Links are held by them, "as by their predecessors from time immemorial, for behoof of the inhabitants, and, inter alia, subject to the obligation of preserving the same for the purposes of the game of golf, and for the recreation and amusement of the inhabitants;" but that "with due regard to these purposes, and acting for the public interest, the present defenders and their predecessors have always from time to time as occasion arose exercised powers of administration and management over the Links now in question."

One of the acts which they say they have been accustomed to perform in the course of that administration and management is the letting of the pasturage and the regulation of bleaching clothes on the Links; and another is the construction of a sloping walk or terrace, much insisted upon by the defenders, in conformity with the minute of council made in the year 1849; and further, the levelling, filling up, and terracing of the ground to the south of the club-house used by the golf club, in conformity with the minute of council of 1854. It appears by the evidence that these allegations are well-founded, and the question arose whether, consistently with the admitted obligation on the one hand, and the exercise of the asserted and proved powers of administration and management on the other, a certain metalled or macadamised road, which the corporation think it expedient to make along the outside boundary of the Links, where that boundary adjoins certain feus let off by them many years ago (which feus must be assumed to be no longer in point of law part of the Links) should be made by them.

My Lords, as far as the question is one of titles, I collect that the admitted obligation is proved by ancient and immemorial use, rather than by an express trust limiting the right of property which the corporation have by their titles. I assume, of course, that this usage is sufficient to establish an obligation, which, indeed, is admitted, as I have said; but the titles, being in themselves general, it would follow that not only the power of administration and management, but also any usufructuary interest which may be consistent with the admitted obligation, would remain to the corporation under these titles; and that, as it appears to me, casts upon the pursuers,—who asked for an interdict to restrain the corporation either from making the road in question or from permitting any road to be used in that place for traffic by carts and carriages,—the obligation of shewing that the making or permission of such a road or use would contravene the admitted or proved obligations. The first of those obligations is that of preserving the Links, I take it, as far as necessary for this part of the case, for the purpose of the game of golf. With regard to that, my Lords, the state of the evidence is this. The direct, ordinary, and proper course of the game of golf is not over the ground which would be occupied by the solum of this road, although in the course of the play balls may be struck from time to time so as to pass over or to lie upon this part of the ground, and in that sense it is not excluded from the golf course. But it is outside the course proper, and it would rather be a deviation from the course of the play, whether intentional or not I do not enter into, it would rather be by deviation than otherwise that the game might have to any extent to be actually played over this particular piece of ground. In that state of things there can be no better evidence to rely upon as to whether this alteration of the surface, and this permission of the use of carts and carriages, will substantially interfere with the obligation of preserving the ground for the purposes of the game of golf, than the consentient evidence of those witnesses who are most skilled in and best understand the game. Of such witnesses we have had the evidence before us of a very considerable number, and the general result of their evidence is, that the making of the road will certainly not interfere with the due prosecution of the game, and that such variation in the state of the ground as it would introduce, would, in the event of balls finding their way there, rather add to than detract from the interest of the game—giving fresh opportunities for skill rather than the contrary.

Paterson, &c.
v. Magistrates of St Andrews,
&c.

My Lords, that is the consentient evidence, and I cannot but observe that, regarding the matter from that point of view, it does not seem to me to be probable that this interference with the ground would for the purpose of golf be more prejudicial or make a substantially greater difference than the acts which are admitted to have taken place upon former occasions, which were to some extent rather impressed into their service by the appellants; because that construction of the sloping walk or terrace instead of the rough ground with many holes in it, which took place under the provostship of Sir Hugh Lyon Playfair, in or after 1849, was at least as material an alteration as this can be; and the object with which that was done, when seats and barriers were placed for the accommodation of spectators, attracting a large number of people, would be at least as likely to interfere in some degree with the course of the game as the occasional traffic backwards and forwards over a macadamised road would be.

So far, therefore, as the obligation of preserving the ground for the purpose of the game of golf is concerned, I come to the same conclusion as that at which the Court of Session arrived, namely, that there is no substantial interference with that obligation, and that the road may be reconciled with its due observance.

Then, with regard to the recreation and the amusement of the inhabitants, it appears to me that convenient means of access, not interfering with the use of the ground for any necessary purposes of the game, are rather in aid of the recreation and amusement of the inhabitants than the contrary; nor can I admit that it makes in that respect any difference, if the fact be, as I have no doubt it is, that there are some particular inhabitants, namely, the feuars having houses upon the ground adjoining the road, to whom the making of this road would be in a special degree convenient. Therefore, my Lords, I agree substantially with the view which was laid down, both by the Lord Ordinary and unanimously by the Second Division of the Court of Session; but the question that remains is this, whether the manner in which the Second Division thought it right to guard their decision, so far in favour of the defenders, is sufficient for the purpose.

Now, as I understand the view of the Second Division, they were clearly of opinion that it would be contrary to the admitted obligations of the corporation for them to alienate any part of the solum of the ground in question, or to abdicate the administration and control of it, and so far they have expressed their intention on the face of the words which they introduced into the interlocutor of the 9th of December 1879. But I collect further, and I also think it follows from the principle which guided them upon that point, that they thought it would be inconsistent with the obligation under which the corporation lay, either to grant private easements, rights of way, or others, over this ground to particular individuals, or, which is a larger operation of the same kind, having made this road, to dedicate it to the public and so create a public easement, to that extent abdicating their existing power of administration and control.

Now, my Lords, that appears to me to be a matter of considerable importance, and in my judgment it goes some way to justify the present appeal; because, in the absence of words which would make that clear, and make it further clear that it is not only inconsistent with the duty of the corporation to grant such rights, but also part of their duty to prevent their being acquired from any neglect on their part. Taking that view, I am bound to say that I think the interlocutor, as it stands, did not give to the public of St Andrews (here represented by the present pursuers, the appellants), that amount of protection and security which was necessary to give effect to the opinion of the Court, as far as it was in their favour.

No. 13.

July 27, 1881.
Paterson, &c.
v. Magistrates
of St Andrews,
&c.

Taking that view, your Lordships have considered what variation of the interlocutor would be proper for the purpose of completely securing that object; and I propose to your Lordships to vary the interlocutor of the 9th of December 1879 by omitting from the declaration therein contained the words "but are bound to retain the same in their own hands for behoof of the community of the burgh," and substituting the words "but are bound to retain the portion of the Links in question in their own hands for behoof of the community of the burgh, so that any road which may be formed thereon shall remain in all time coming a portion of the said Links, held in the same way, subject to the same uses, and for the same purposes as any other portion of the said Links; and that the said provost, magistrates, and town-council are bound to take such steps as may be requisite to prevent either the Police Commissioners of St Andrews or any other person from acquiring any title thereto, or any right to interfere therewith, so that it may always be in the power of the said provost, magistrates, and town-council to take away or alter such road, and in the meantime to restrict and regulate the traffic thereon."

My Lords, it was suggested by the learned counsel for the respondents, the provost and magistrates, that there should be words introduced to prevent any encouragement being held out, by the form of the declaration which your Lordships proposed to introduce, to anything like a capricious or arbitrary exercise of their powers. My Lords, I cannot see that there would be any such encouragement; and, on the other hand, any words which might be introduced for the purpose of discouraging any particular exercise of the powers could hardly be reconciled with the opinion which your Lordships entertain, that it is necessary for the provost, magistrates, and town-council to retain in that respect their whole legal power, unimpaired and unprejudiced by any present exercise of their discretion.

Nothing now remains but to consider the question of costs. Upon that point I am bound to say that I think it is right for your Lordships to bear in mind, not only the fact that the alteration now proposed to be made in the interlocutor of the 9th of December 1879 was wanted to give complete security to the appellants and the interests which they represent, but also that before the action was brought the attitude of both sets of respondents was such as, in my opinion, to justify, I do not say the form of the action, but the institution of some action for the purpose of obtaining from the Court such declarations as will now have been obtained. It is evident to me that the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of St Andrews, in what had previously passed, had been acting upon an assumption of their having larger powers than those which the Court of Session and your Lordships' House have recognised—powers, that is to say, whether upon a bargain with the individual feuers or otherwise, to dedicate to the public this particular part of the ground for the purpose of a public highway. That power, however, your Lordships think they have not; and it does appear to me that their whole proceedings, down to the time when the action was brought, were not only such as to justify the pursuers in thinking that they claimed and might exercise that power, but such as necessarily to justify your Lordships in the conclusion that they did intend to assert that

No. 13. power—that they had intended the use of it, and might revert to that intention afterwards—and even in their pleadings in this action I fail to perceive anything like a renunciation of that power. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the manner in which the Court below has dealt with the costs is at least sufficiently favourable to the respondents, and that the costs of this appeal ought not to be thrown upon the appellants; though, on the other hand, I do not propose that they should be given the other way.

As to the costs, therefore, what I should propose is, that the variation which I have read being made, there should be no costs of this appeal.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I have come to the same conclusion as that stated by my noble and learned friend. The Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of St Andrews hold as part of the common good of the town a portion of the Links. They once had a much more extensive estate, but, like a great many other municipal corporations in Scotland, they have got rid of a great part of their landed property; still they do hold a portion of the Links, some ten acres or so, in their own possession. Their title-deeds do not place any restriction upon the manner in which they are to hold them, but I take it to be the established law of Scotland that a municipal corporation may hold lands subject to an obligation to allow the inhabitants such use as use and wont over a prescriptive period have established that the inhabitants of the town are entitled to. I do not by any means think that this is an incident attached to the fact that the estate is held by the corporation as part of its common good. In old days, when corporations had extensive estates, there were many portions of these estates treated like any ordinary gentleman's estate, in which no one could dream there was any such right as a right to be established by prescriptive usage.

In the present case there is no controversy about it at all. It is admitted that the municipal corporation of St Andrews do in fact hold the lands subject to the rights of the inhabitants of St Andrews to use them, for golf principally, and for other objects of recreation; and I think that in modern times it is not going at all too far to say, as the Judges have done, that that is the primary and principal object for which they are held. Still, subject to that primary and principal object, the municipal corporation has held the lands with the right to make any use or, to quote from the words of Lord Gifford, "to do anything which does not destroy or injure the primary purposes for which the land is held, namely, its public enjoyment for golfing or otherwise." They have the right to do anything that does not injure or interfere with those primary purposes—they have not the right to do anything which does interfere with those primary purposes.

Now, the summons here asks (I pass over the two first conclusions, which are merely general statement) to have it declared that "the magistrates and town-council have no right to encroach, or authorise or permit any encroachment, upon the said Links or any part thereof which shall have the effect of diminishing the space available for the said game of golf, or for the recreation and amusement of the said inhabitants; 3d, that, in particular, the said magistrates and town-council have no right to construct, or authorise, or permit the construction by the other defenders, or any of them, of a road for carts and carriages along the southern boundary of the said Links;" "and 4th, that neither the said magistrates and town-council nor the said other defenders are entitled to use, or authorise or permit the use of, the portion of the said Links adjoining the said northern boundary of the said parcels of ground as an access for carts and carriages." No. 13.

July 27, 1881.
Paterson, &c.
v. Magistrates
of St Andrews,

Now, the proposition put forward in the third and fourth, that those two purposes are under all circumstances, and in every way, beyond the power of the provost, the magistrates, and the town-council, I think it is perfectly plain is a great deal too wide a proposition. Such things may be done in such a way as to interfere with the primary purposes for which the lands are held, namely, golfing and recreation, in which case I agree that they should not be done. On the other hand, such things may be done in such a way as not to interfere with this use, and though the motive may be a wish to give an advantage to a particular person who owns a house, or any other particular motive which the magistrates like, yet so long as it does not injure or interfere with the rights which the inhabitants possess to have those lands preserved for the public recreation and enjoyment, more particularly for the game of golf, I do not see that the appellants have any right to complain or to claim any interdict.

Now, it is upon that that the principal questions arise afterwards. The summons obviously claims too much; and I think, when the evidence is gone into, it will be seen that the making of such a road, that is to say, so far as macadamising the road and allowing carts and carriages to travel along it are concerned, would clearly not to that extent interfere with the game of golf at all; nor do I think it would interfere with the jus spatiandi. You cannot put a precise limit to it—it must depend a good deal upon the discretion of those who have the management of it; but even as regards allowing carts and carriages to carry traffic to houses alongside of it, I do not see that that would necessarily interfere with the enjoyment of the ground.

I can quite imagine there might come a change in course of time; if the town of St Andrews were to grow as great as the town of London, and if a traffic were to go along that road as heavy and as great as the traffic which now goes along the Strand, I can imagine that then it would interfere with the enjoyment of the Links; but that is a remote contingency not particularly likely to happen. At the present time, as things exist, the making of the road and throwing it open to be used by the inhabitants for the time being would not be a matter that would necessarily interfere with the primary purpose for which the magistrates hold the land.

Now, we come to the purpose which I think really was the more important purpose, though it was not very clearly kept in view by those who brought the summons and instituted the action originally. It does appear, I think (more from a confused notion about what their rights and powers were than from any intention to do wrong in any way), to have been the notion entertained by the town-council in 1874 or 1875, that they had the power under certain circumstances to make or allow another person to make the road and sell it to the feuars, or give them the right to use it in future—to part with their rights so that they would no longer have control over it at all. If they did that I certainly think that, whether at the present moment it would interfere with the public right of recreation or not, it is very likely that it would in time injure it. I think the Court below has very properly said that, that being so, they should express themselves in their verbal judgment in such a way as to make it clear that the provost and town-council should not do it, and that there should be some terms put into their interlocutor (that being the way in which they

No. 13. thought it would be best done), to secure that the provost and town-council, if they made this road, though they might allow traffic to go on it, were still to preserve the full control over it, and to hold it subject to all the rights which the inhabitants possess for recreation, not in particular but in general; and that the provost and town-council should keep to themselves the power of regulating the traffic, so as to keep the road whilst the traffic went on it in such a state as that it should not be a nuisance to those in pursuit of recreation. I can perfectly understand that they might make an order that carts carrying manure, for example, should not go along the road from one place to another, or possibly, that the more offensive descriptions of traffic generally should only be driven through it by night, and otherwise, as to many of the numerous purposes as to which bye-laws might properly enough be made; but they must preserve their powers and must take care that they do not part with the road so that anybody else acquires a right paramount to the corporation. I think that object is very clearly expressed in the verbal declarations, but when it came to be put into the interlocutor it was not so fully expressed; consequently, I think there was very considerable reason to doubt whether there might not be future litigation arising upon the subject of what was decided and what was meant. Upon that ground I think it most desirable to alter the declaration in such a way as to make it perfectly clear in future what are the limits of the powers of the Provost and Town-Council of St Andrews, in respect of these Links, and also to make it clear that the right of the inhabitants to object to their control is limited to the right to object to their doing something which would interfere with or injure the primary purposes for which the lands are held, namely, the enjoyment of the inhabitants.

Now, the only other question which arises is the question of costs. The general rule of your Lordships' House is that if the appeal be dismissed it should be dismissed with costs, but when it appears from the result of the appeal upon some subordinate, or, it may be, substantial part of the case that the appellants were justified in coming to this House, then it is generally said that although the costs go to the victor, in that case as in this, there would be no thorough victory to either side; and therefore the question would be, as regards the costs, how far that would apply to the present case. It is never very easy to be quite clear about such a point as this, but I think the interlocutor being varied as proposed, there is a sufficiently important object attained by the appellants in coming here to make it proper to say that the appellants should not pay the costs of the appeal, though it is not quite clear whether they should be entirely absolved. In every other respect I agree with the motion which has been made by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

LORD WATSON.—The only questions which have been argued at your Lordships' bar relate to the powers of the Magistrates and Town-Council of St Andrews as proprietors and administrators of that part of the common good of the burgh which consists of the eastern portion of the Links. Prima facie the common good of a burgh, vested in the magistrates, generally under very ancient titles, is property which they can dispose of as freely, so long as they keep the interests of the burgh in view, as a private proprietor can deal with his own land. But in this case the part of the common good in question is subject to a special trust for behoof of the community, or, in other words, the inhabitants and burgesses of the burgh of St Andrews. That right in the burgesses does not require to be constituted by writing—it can be constituted, and generally is constituted, by immemorial usage,—that is to say, by a course of enjoyment for a prescriptive period of at least forty years. In the present case there are abundant indications that the inhabitants did possess that right at a somewhat distant period; but your Lordships are saved from making any inquiry into that question, which is one of fact merely, by the judicial admission given by the magistrates to the effect that they do hold that part of their property under trust to preserve it for the game of golf and the recreation of the inhabitants.

July 27, 1881.
Paterson, &c.
v. Magistrates
of St Andrews,

Now, my Lords, although they hold it subject to these rights on the part of the inhabitants, the magistrates and council remain undivested to any further extent of their proprietary rights, and are therefore entitled either to make or to sanction any other uses to which the property is convertible so long as those uses are not inconsistent with the due enjoyment by the burgesses of the rights vested in them by law. What uses they may so sanction will depend to a very great extent upon the amount of population and the amount of the golf played or recreation taken. Uses which would be perfectly legitimate and proper in a thinly populated burgh may become very illegitimate and very improper, and may constitute invasions of the burgesses' rights, when practised where there is a large population.

My Lords, what the magistrates and town-council were proposing to do at the time when the action was raised appears to me to have been this, they were acting upon the assumption that it was within their competency to confer upon the public at large a right of way over a portion of the ground which it was their duty to preserve for purposes consistent with the rights of the inhabitants; and they justified their position upon the ground that, as matters stood at that date, no right of the inhabitants would be invaded thereby. I think that was a mistaken view of the law and of the extent of their power, because they would thereby have vested in others a right which might become inconsistent with the rights of the inhabitants at some future time.

The appellants brought this action no doubt with a view to stop the threatened proceedings, but they did not limit the conclusions of their summons to the actual proceedings which the council were threatening to take, but made them so wide that, if given effect to, they would establish this proposition, that wherever a right of golfing or of recreation exists the magistrates cannot give a comfortable or convenient right of passage over the ground reserved for that purpose, although the so giving it may not interfere to the smallest extent with the rights of the burgesses. On the other hand, the defence set up in this case appears to me to amount, on the part of the magistrates and council, to a justification of that which they proposed to do as falling within their discretion; and beyond that a separate defence was set up by the feuars to which I shall not refer, because it has not been insisted upon at your Lordships' bar.

My Lords, I am of opinion, with your Lordships, that the Court of Session were quite right in holding that the appellants have failed to shew that the present use of a metalled road along the line proposed will have the slightest effect in interfering with the privileges of the golfing community. The evidence upon that point appears to me to be all one way. There is undoubtedly a proper golf course outside of which this line of road is, and that must not be interfered with; but no one proposes to interfere with it. Then it is said that you must leave untouched everything outside of that course which can be shewn to be a part of the Links to which a ball may be driven in playing the game of

No. 13. golf. I entirely demur to that proposition. The contention to which I am prepared to give effect really comes to this, that whatever is outside of the proper golfing course may be turned to various purposes so long as these are not inconsistent with the game of golf; and really the speculation as to whether it is better to have a road with ruts in it, or a metalled road, or a piece of rough grass with hollows and heaps, is, after all, rather a matter of fancy than a question having any substance in it.

July 27, 1881.
Paterson, &c.
v. Magistrates
of St Andrews,
&c.

That being so, my Lords, the case is narrowed to the question of regulation. I do not think much is made of that question on the record, and still less is made of it in the evidence. I see nothing which can suggest to me that the present use of that road by vehicles as well as by pedestrians will in the least degree encroach upon the privileges which the community are entitled to exercise. It may very well be that upon special occasions it will be necessary for the magistrates to exercise some right of regulation over the traffic. There are kinds of traffic which are mentioned in the evidence, such as carting coals, and so on, which do not seem very consistent with recreation; but it is obvious that these might be regulated so as not to interfere with the use of the ground by the inhabitants at those times of the day when, ordinarily, people are in the habit of taking their recreation. And then it is a possible thing that some day or other, as has been suggested by my noble and learned friend opposite, such a change may come over St Andrews that it may become necessary in the due exercise of their administrative powers for the town-council to take away this right of road. One cannot anticipate that such a thing will immediately occur, but it may, and those who have the right to take recreation, and to play golf upon the Links, are quite entitled to have a judgment which will prevent the magistrates from making such an alienation at the present moment as may come at any future period into collision with their rights over this piece of land, which undoubtedly are of primary importance.

I therefore entirely approve of the declaration which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, because it appears to me to settle as definitely as a Court can do by anticipation the limits within which the discretion of the magistrates must be exercised, and it lays upon them the imperative duty which they were at the time this action was raised about to neglect,—the duty not only of abstaining from doing any act or deed by which a right would be created in others, but of taking steps to prevent others from acquiring such right. Upon the matter of costs, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack.

JUDGMENT:—"Ordered and adjudged that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the Second Division, of the 9th of December 1879, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby varied, by omitting from the declaration therein contained the words, 'but are bound to retain the same in their own hands for behoof of the community of the burgh,' and substituting the words, 'but are bound to retain the portion of the Links in question in their own hands for behoof of the community of the burgh, so that any road which may be formed thereon shall remain in all time coming a portion of the said Links, held in the same way, subject to the same uses, and for the same purposes, as any other portion of the said Links; and that the said Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council are bound to take such steps as may be requisite to prevent either the Police Commissioners of St Andrews, or any other person, from acquiring any title thereto, or any right to interfere therewith, so that it may always be in the power of the said Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council to take away or alter such road, and in the meantime to restrict and regulate the traffic thereon ;' and it is further ordered and adjudged, that in other respects the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be, and the same are hereby affirmed : And it is further ordered that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this variation and judgment."

Fraser's Trustee.

Trust—Liability of trustees—Discretion as to investment—Bank stock—Severing of interests of beneficiaries—Whether trustees' relief thereby restricted.—A testatrix directed her trustees, by the second purpose of her trust-deed, to pay to her daughter A "the interest or annual-rent of £2000" during her life, and on her death to pay the fee of that sum to her children. By the third purpose of her trust-deed she made a similar provision for her daughter B in life and her children in fee ; and she directed her trustees, after making provision for the payment of these legacies, to divide the residue of her estate. Power was conferred on the trustees "to continue to hold any or all of such shares or stocks in public or other companies as may pertain and belong to me at the time of my decease, should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so," without any personal responsibility for loss, if any, thereby sustained ; and power also "to lend or place out on such security or securities, heritable or moveable, as they shall consider advantageous, the foresaid legacies of £2000 and £2000 respectively, the said security or securities to be conceived in favour of my trustees, and that for the purposes of this trust, and not otherwise."

The trustees allocated various stocks belonging to the testatrix and sums of money to meet the legacies of £2000 to A and B respectively, and though the various investments stood without distinction in the names of the trustees, separate accounts were kept and regularly rendered to A and B respectively of the profits arising from the investments allocated to her, and of the expenses connected therewith. The residue was then divided. Among the stocks belonging to the testatrix was certain stock of the City of Glasgow Bank. A portion of this was realised, but the rest was on the request of A retained by the trustees as an investment of part of the legacy to her and her family. The City of Glasgow Bank afterwards suspended payment, and, being an unlimited company, the trustees were subjected to heavy calls. They claimed relief out of the trust-estate generally, which then consisted only of funds held for behoof of A and B and their respective families.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that while the trustees were under the trust-deed empowered to retain the City of Glasgow Bank stock, being stock held by the truster, not only till the residue was realised and divided, but also as an investment of the special legacies bequeathed to A and B and their families, yet having appropriated certain investments for behoof of B and her family, they must be regarded as holding the same in trust for their behoof exclusively, and were not entitled to relief therefrom of liability arising from investments held for A and her family.

Observed that the liability incurred by the trustees in respect of the calls on the City of Glasgow Bank stock was in no sense a debt of the truster.

There are kinds of traffic which are mentioned in the evidence, such as carting coals, and so on, which do not seem very consistent with recreation; but it is obvious that these might be regulated so as not to interfere with the use of the ground by the inhabitants at those times of the day when, ordinarily, people are in the habit of taking their recreation. And then it is a possible thing that some day or other, as has been suggested by my noble and learned friend opposite, such a change may come over St Andrews that it may become necessary in the due exercise of their administrative powers for the town-council to take away this right of road. One cannot anticipate that such a thing will immediately occur, but it may, and those who have the right to take recreation, and to play golf upon the Links, are quite entitled to have a judgment which will prevent the magistrates from making such an alienation at the present moment as may come at any future period into collision with their rights over this piece of land, which undoubtedly are of primary importance.

I therefore entirely approve of the declaration which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, because it appears to me to settle as definitely as a Court can do by anticipation the limits within which the discretion of the magistrates must be exercised, and it lays upon them the imperative duty which they were at the time this action was raised about to neglect,—the duty not only of abstaining from doing any act or deed by which a right would be created in others, but of taking steps to prevent others from acquiring such right. Upon the matter of costs, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack.

JUDGMENT:—"Ordered and adjudged that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the Second Division, of the 9th of December 1879, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby varied, by omitting from the declaration therein contained the words, 'but are bound to retain the same in their own hands for behoof of the community of the burgh,' and substituting the words, 'but are bound to retain the portion of the Links in question in their own hands for behoof of the community of the burgh, so that any road which may be formed thereon shall remain in all time coming a portion of the said Links, held in the same way, subject to the same uses, and for the same purposes, as any other portion of the said Links; and that the said Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council are bound to take such steps as may be requisite to prevent either the Police Commissioners of St Andrews, or any other person, from acquiring any title thereto, or any right to interfere therewith, so that it may always be in the power of the said Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council to take away or alter such road, and in the meantime to restrict and regulate the traffic thereon; and it is further ordered and adjudged, that in other respects the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be, and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this variation and judgment."

Robinson v.
Fraser's Trustees.

Trust—Liability of trustees—Discretion as to investment—Bank stock—Severing of interests of beneficiaries—Whether trustees' relief thereby restricted.—A testatrix directed her trustees, by the second purpose of her trust-deed, to pay to her daughter A "the interest or annual-rent of £2000" during her life, and on her death to pay the fee of that sum to her children. By the third purpose of her trust-deed she made a similar provision for her daughter B in liferent and her children in fee; and she directed her trustees, after making provision for the payment of these legacies, to divide the residue of her estate. Power was conferred on the trustees "to continue to hold any or all of such shares or stocks in public or other companies as may pertain and belong to me at the time of my decease, should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so," without any personal responsibility for loss, if any, thereby sustained; and power also "to lend or place out on such security or securities, heritable or moveable, as they shall consider advantageous, the foresaid legacies of £2000 and £2000 respectively, the said security or securities to be conceived in favour of my trustees, and that for the purposes of this trust, and not otherwise."

The trustees allocated various stocks belonging to the testatrix and sums of money to meet the legacies of £2000 to A and B respectively, and though the various investments stood without distinction in the names of the trustees, separate accounts were kept and regularly rendered to A and B respectively of the profits arising from the investments allocated to her, and of the expenses connected therewith. The residue was then divided. Among the stocks belonging to the testatrix was certain stock of the City of Glasgow Bank. A portion of this was realised, but the rest was on the request of A retained by the trustees as an investment of part of the legacy to her and her family. The City of Glasgow Bank afterwards suspended payment, and, being an unlimited company, the trustees were subjected to heavy calls. They claimed relief out of the trust-estate generally, which then consisted only of funds held for behoof of A and B and their respective families.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that while the trustees were under the trust-deed empowered to retain the City of Glasgow Bank stock, being stock held by the truster, not only till the residue was realised and divided, but also as an investment of the special legacies bequeathed to A and B and their families, yet having appropriated certain investments for behoof of B and her family, they must be regarded as holding the same in trust for their behoof exclusively, and were not entitled to relief therefrom of liability arising from investments held for A and her family.

Observed that the liability incurred by the trustees in respect of the calls on the City of Glasgow Bank stock was in no sense a debt of the truster.

tee.

Ld. Chancellor
(Selborne).
Lord Blackburn.
Lord Watson.

(IN the Court of Session March 10, 1880, ante, vol. vii. p. 694.)

The complainer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the two first questions to be determined in this case are, whether the authority given by the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Fraser to her trustees to continue to hold any of her shares in public or other companies enabled them to set apart and appropriate, for the second and third purposes respectively of that settlement, the bank shares and other securities, which they did, in fact, retain for those purposes; and whether, if they had that authority, it was duly exercised?

Upon the first point it was argued that, because the power for the trustees "to continue to hold" the shares, &c., "should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so," is followed, in the settlement, by a power also "to lend or place out" the two legacies of £2000 each "on such security or securities, heritable or moveable, as they shall consider advantageous," the former power could not properly be used for the investments contemplated by the latter, but must be construed as merely authorising some delay, which might not otherwise have been proper, in the conversion of the truster's shares, &c., in public companies before the distribution of her residuary estate. I think that this is not a necessary, and that it would not be a reasonable, construction of the settlement. A power to "continue to hold" particular investments, made by the truster herself (without more) must, I think, be taken, prima facie, to refer to those trusts which were to continue; and the only continuing trusts in this case were those expressed in the second and third purposes of the settlement.

Upon the second point I cannot concur in the view which seems to have been taken by some of the learned Judges in the Court of Session, that, because the trustees, on the 20th of November 1876, stated it to be their view that bank stock was not a suitable class of stock for trustees to hold, their subsequent decision to hold £200 City of Glasgow Bank stock for the investment of part of the legacy of £2000 given to Mrs Sinclair and her children ought to be regarded as an abdication of their duty of judgment, and for that reason a breach of trust. When the truster had expressly authorised the retention, for the purposes of the trust which she created, of these investments made by herself, of which some were to her knowledge of a character not free from risk, and were, at the same time, productive of a variable amount of income, those facts alone could not make it a breach of trust for the trustees to act upon that authority, although their own preference might have been for securities unattended with any risk. The truster did not, indeed, direct them to take into consideration the wishes or the opinions of the liferenters, but I think it was proper and reasonable for them to do so, so long as they did not unduly favour the liferenters at the expense of their children, or either set of legatees at the expense of the other. In this case I find no indication of any improper purpose. It is true that some risk was necessarily incident to every such investment in bank stock, but there was no special reason for believing (and it is plain to me that neither the trustees nor Mrs Sinclair did believe) that this particular investment in stock of the City of Glasgow Bank was attended with any extraordinary risk which might not equally attach to shares or stock in any other well established bank in Scotland. This stock, at the time of the appropriation, bore, and was valued at a price sufficient to prove the credit in which the City of Glasgow Bank then stood, and to make the gain to the liferentrix in point of income very inconsiderable. I am satisfied that the trustees acted in good faith, and that their decision to retain this stock was an honest exercise of the discretion given to them by the will. It would be extremely dangerous to hold that trustees, having such a discretion to exercise, might not freely discuss with the beneficiaries the reasons for and against a particular decision, without running the risk of being held to act against their own judgment, if they should disregard, in the end, objections to which they had thought it right, in the first instance, to direct attention.

Fraser's Trustees.

These investments, therefore, having been bona fide retained under sufficient authority, the next question is, whether the appropriations, as they were actually made, had the effect of severing the funds and securities set apart and appropriated for the second purpose of the will from those set apart and appropriated for the third purpose, so that the latter would not thenceforth be liable to make good any subsequent loss or deterioration of value sustained by the former, as between the two sets of beneficiaries? If such a severance was possible, it appears to me to be clear that the intent and the effect of the discharge of the 23d of March and 31st of May 1877 was to make it. And not only was such a severance legally possible, but it also appears to me to have been the most proper (if not the only proper) mode of fulfilling the directions of the will. Before the residue of the trustor's estate could be distributed, provision was to be made, by some authorised investment or appropriation, for these two legacies, given to different families under separate purposes of the will, and necessarily payable at different periods of time. If different sets of trustees had been nominated for them it would have been impossible to contend that, after the fund appropriated to each had been transferred to its proper trustees, there could be any subsequent community of loss or gain between them as to either income or capital, or that either fund was to be in any way responsible for the other. It cannot, in my opinion, make any difference, that the same persons were trustees for both, and were also trustees for the general purposes of the will. The English authorities, collected in the first volume of Mr White's (4th) edition of Roper on Legacies, p. 942, rest upon principles equally applicable on both sides of the Tweed.

From this conclusion it seems to me to be a necessary consequence that neither the beneficiaries under the third purpose of this will, nor the trustees, could have any right to be indemnified against a loss sustained on the City of Glasgow Bank stock, at the expense of the appellant, or of the funds and securities set apart for the appellant's legacy. So far as the trustees were concerned, the retention of this bank stock, as an investment of part of the legacy given to the Sinclair family under the second purpose of the will (together with the personal liability incident to it), was their own voluntary act. That liability was not undertaken for the general purposes of the will, which necessarily ceased when the residue was divided; but only for the purposes of this particular Sinclair trust. The retention of such stock necessarily involved risks of trade, and entitled the trustees to be indemnified from those risks out of the trust-funds of the legatees for whom it was held. But to employ other funds set apart for other legatees in the same or any other trade there was no authority. To do so would have been, in my opinion, a breach of trust. Here, again, the principles of well-known English authorities—ex parte Garland;¹ ex parte Richard-

No. 14. son;¹ Cutbush v. Cutbush;² *M'Neillie v. Acton*³—are in point, and they appear to me to be as much applicable in Scotland as in England.

Robinson v.
Fraser's Trust-
tee.

The result, therefore, is, that I am unable to concur in the interlocutors of the Court of Session now under appeal; and that I think those interlocutors ought to be reversed, and decree of suspension and interdict granted as prayed by the appellant, with expenses below, and with the costs of this appeal; and I so move your Lordships.

LORD BLACKBURN (having stated the purposes of the trust-deed, and, inter alia, the fact that Mrs Fraser died possessed of £850 stock of the City of Glasgow Bank, then valued at £1955, continued)—I do not think that it can be doubted that, in the absence of something in the trust-deed to the contrary, the duty of the trustees would have been to dispose of this stock, involving, as it did, a possible liability, which most people at that time thought would never come into operation, but which in fact did, within three years, come into operation in a very disastrous way. But Mrs Fraser had expressly provided that her trustees might continue to hold such stock or shares as might belong to her at the time of her death, should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so.

The Lord Ordinary came to the conclusion of fact that the trustees retained the £200, which they did retain, not because they deemed it advisable or expedient so to do, but because they surrendered their own judgment to that of Mrs Sinclair.

I do not differ from the propositions of law involved, though not expressed, in this opinion. I think that trustees who incur a liability which, having reference to the trust which they have accepted, they ought not to incur, cannot claim to be indemnified for so doing out of the trust-funds; on the contrary, they in general are liable personally to make good any loss which the trust-funds have sustained in consequence of their so acting contrary to their duty. And I further agree that trustees are to exercise their own discretion. But I think they may inquire as to what are the wishes and opinions of others, and especially of those who are interested, before they finally determine what, in the exercise of their own discretion, they think expedient, and I think that in this case there is no evidence that the trustees did more than they properly might. The Lord Ordinary seems to ground his opinion principally on a letter of the 28th of November 1876. Mr Murdoch was a member of a firm of writers, Murdoch & Macpherson, at Huntly, and that firm acted for the trust. In that letter, which, whether it was composed by Mr Murdoch or his partner Mr Macpherson, binds Mr Murdoch as a member of the firm, it is said that their brokers recommended that this stock should be realised, "and our own" (that is, the firm's) "view is that bank stock is not a suitable class of stock for trustees to hold." This was not, however, the view which Mrs Fraser, the framer of the trust, had entertained; and, though I suppose every one connected with the matter now regrets that this view of the firm was not acted upon, I can see nothing to justify the conclusion that the trustees did not, in the exercise of their own discretion, bona fide, though, as it turns out, unfortunately, come to the conclusion that it was expedient to continue to hold this £200. I therefore differ from the Lord Ordinary on the inference of fact to be drawn from the letters.

her death, held various stocks in railways and other companies, and, in particular, she held £850 of the consolidated stock of the City of Glasgow Bank. It was in reference to this condition of her estate, as I think, that she inserted in her trust-deed the following clause :—‘ With power also to my trustees to continue to hold any or all of such shares or stocks in public or other companies as may pertain and belong to me at the time of my decease, should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so, without any personal responsibility on my trustees for loss, if any, thereby sustained.’ The question is, what is the true construction and what is the true effect of this clause? Now, it is contended that this is a general clause perfectly unlimited, which entitled the trustees not only to defer the winding up of the trust and the paying of the general residue for some indefinite but reasonable time, and until they found it expedient to sell or realise any shares in joint stock companies which might be temporarily depressed, but it is said it was a general power entitling the trustees to select and continue as the permanent investment of the two special legacies of £2000 each, all or any of the bank stocks or other stocks of which the testatrix might die possessed. After full and repeated consideration I am really unable to come to this conclusion. I think it contrary to the very explicit powers and directions which the testatrix had given in reference to the two legacies of £2000 each, and contrary to the very conception of these legacies themselves. The truster knew, or she had been told, and quite rightly and properly told, that it would be the duty of her trustees immediately after her death to sell out and realise all her shares in trading, joint stock, and other companies, and she knew, or she had been told, that this was their duty, even if at the time of realisation it should happen that the market was depressed or unfavourable for the realisation of high prices for such descriptions of property. I think she intended to provide for this contingency, and no other. She gave her trustees a certain latitude or discretion that they might abstain from selling for such reasonable time as they might consider expedient, and she exempted them from personal responsibility if they should deem it expedient to delay realisation. But all this had reference to her general trust. This discretionary power was granted to the trustees in order to save the estate from loss from forced realisation at an unfavourable time, to the disadvantage of the residuary legatees. It was for the benefit of the residuary legatees, who were interested only in the residue, that the realisation should not be hurriedly made, and made at a loss. The possible risk of loss from unfavourable realisation had really little or nothing to do with two specific legacies of £2000 each, which were quite fixed in amount, and the beneficiaries in which, as such, had no concern with how the residue might turn out, or whether the stocks in public companies were sold at a time of depression or not. So long as there was a residue at all—and the residue here was £1200—it did not matter to the special legatees, who, as such, had only fixed pecuniary legacies, what loss might occur in the realisation of the general estate, so long as the realisation was not so low as to destroy the residue altogether. That was the concern of the residuary legatees, and these were the whole three children of the testatrix. The continuing to hold stocks which formed part of the trust-estate, and the abstaining from selling or realising them, was, I think, all to be before the division of the general residue, and before the payment or the lending out of the pecuniary legacies. The clause, I think, was not intended to govern, and had no reference to the permanent management and investment of the special legacies of £2000 each—a management which might endure for many a long year, and for which the trustee makes separate and ample provision. This is the conclusion to which I have been forced to come, though not (as I have said, and especially after hearing your Lordships' opinions) without difficulty and hesitation. It leads to the result that it was ultra vires of the trustees to take £200 of the stock of the City of Glasgow Bank as part of the investment of the legacy of £2000 which Mrs Sinclair and her children are interested in."

If this was the true construction of the deed, I think that the trustees could not maintain any claim to be reimbursed from the trust-estate for a liability which they ought not to have incurred, whatever might be their claim against the personal interest of those at whose instance and for whose benefit they incurred the liability. But I cannot agree in this construction. I think that if Mrs Fraser had meant to give her trustees a discretion to continue to hold the stocks only until the residue was realised, and no longer, she would have said so in plain terms, which she certainly has not done. I need not inquire what would have been the case if the trustees had invested some of the money in the purchase of more City of Glasgow Bank stock; that is not what they did. But Mrs Fraser thought that she had invested her property well, and therefore allowed her trustees to continue to hold any of those stocks, though she did not direct them so to do. On this part of the case I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Ormisdale, and need not repeat their reasons.

But this does not dispose of the case. The complainer's pleas in law below contain these,—“(2) Two separate and distinct trust-estates having been created as applicable to the complainer and Mrs Sinclair respectively, the respondents are not entitled to burden the complainer's estate with losses sustained through the investments made for Mrs Sinclair's trust-estate and behoof. (3) In any view, the trustees having made separate and distinct investments, the one set applicable to Mrs Sinclair, and the other to the complainer, there was thereby, and by the correspondence which preceded and the actings of parties which followed, an arrangement constituted whereby the risk of the investments made on behalf of Mrs Sinclair was left with her, and her share of the trust-funds in the trustees' hands, and in no respect with the complainer or her investments. (4) The respondents are barred, by the arrangements entered into with Mrs Sinclair condescended on, from claiming relief against the complainer or the investments made for her behoof.”

The pleas in law for William Murdoch are, amongst others,—“(2) The trustees having acted within their powers in continuing to hold the bank stock, are entitled to be indemnified out of the trust-estate in their hands for any loss incurred or to be incurred by them in consequence of holding the said stock. (3) The investments of the trust-funds having all along stood in the names of the trustees as such, and the trust being one and indivisible, the trustees' lien or right of indemnity subsists and extends over the whole trust-estate. (4) The trustees not having by their actings, or by acceptance of the discharge founded on, or in any other way, renounced or restricted their said right of indemnity as against the complainer, the interim interdict should be recalled, and the reasons of suspension repelled, with expenses.”

Which is right depends, in my opinion, mainly upon the true construction of the trust-instrument, which regulates what the trustees could do; but partly on the inference to be drawn by the Court from the documents as to what they did do.

This is, in my opinion, the most difficult part of the case ; and I am here obliged to differ from the majority of the Court below, both as to the fact and as to the law, for I think the second and third pleas in law for the complainer below are well founded, and that it is not made out that the case is such that the three pleas of the respondent Murdoch apply to it. I do not think it necessary to form any opinion as to the fourth plea of the complainer.

No. 14.

Aug. 3, 1881.
Robinson v.
Fraser's Trustees.

The trustees are by the trust-deed required, before paying over the residue, to make provision for payment of the legacies, and they are empowered "to lend or place on such securities, heritable or moveable, as they shall consider advantageous, the aforesaid legacies of £2000 and £2000 respectively, the said securities to be conceived in favour of my trustees, and that for the purposes of this trust, and not otherwise," and to vary the securities from time to time. I have already given my reasons for thinking that they might continue to hold any of the stocks belonging to Mrs Fraser at the time of her decease, though not such as trustees would generally be justified in holding, and were not bound to sell them, and invest the £2000 and £2000 in other securities. And, I think, therein agreeing with Lord Gifford, and differing from the Lord Justice-Clerk, and perhaps from Lord Ormidale, though of that I am not quite sure, that the true construction of the trust-deed is such that the trustees, if not required to sever the securities for the two sums of £2000 and £2000, and set aside certain securities for the one legacy and certain securities for the other, were at least empowered to do so ; and I think that they have done so, the two being from the time they so did two distinct branches of the trust for two distinct parties. It certainly, where the trusts remaining to be fulfilled are for the benefit of different parties, and quite independent of each other, would be the ordinary and convenient course to do so ; and I cannot resist the conclusion from the words of the trust-deed that Mrs Fraser, or rather those who drew up the deed for her, meant that ordinary and convenient course to be followed. It was argued at your Lordships' bar that if such was the intention it ought to have been provided that there should be, or at least might be, separate trustees for the Sinclair family and the Robinson family, and that in the trust-deed now under consideration not only are the same trustees originally appointed, but the power to assume fresh trustees is so worded as to shew that they must always be the same.

I quite agree that the intention, if it be what I think it is, could have been more clearly expressed. If it had been provided that the securities for the Sinclair £2000 should be invested in the names of the original trustees, and such persons as they might from time to time appoint as trustees for the Sinclair £2000, and a similar provision made as to the Robinson £2000, no one could have doubted that the trusts were intended to be severed. It is because this is not so clearly expressed that the question is one of difficulty. The Lord Justice-Clerk seems to have thought it not a question of any difficulty. He takes the opposite view from that which I do, but he hardly explains his reasons for that opinion. Lord Gifford gives his reasons for taking the view which I take. Lord Ormidale says,—“The separation and allotment of the trust-estate referred to consisted in nothing more than book entries and accounts made, so far as I can discover, for no other purpose than convenience in dealing with the interest of two separate individuals, Mrs Sinclair and Mrs Robinson. There was certainly no transference or investment, in any form, of the bank stock in the name of Mrs Sinclair. It was held at the last and throughout, as it was at the commencement of the trust, in the names of the trustees for the purpose of the trust. Supposing, however, that such a separation and allotment as that alleged by the suspender did take place, the bank stock still continued part of the trust-estate, as it had previously been. Nor can I find anything in the deed of discharge which was executed by the parties interested, after the trustees had laid aside what they at the time considered sufficient to meet the two legacies of £2000 each. On the contrary, I find that in the trust-deed it is expressly declared that the securities for these legacies 'shall be conceived in favour of my trustees, and that for the purposes of this trust and no otherwise.' Keeping this in view, and that Mrs Sinclair and Mrs Robinson were respectively only entitled to the annual rent or interest arising out of the two legacies of £2000, the capital sum ultimately going on their deaths to others, it cannot admit of doubt, I think, that there were no new and separate trusts in reference to these legacies contemplated by the truster, or could have been created under the deed of settlement."

The inference I draw from the documents, more particularly the deed of discharge, and Messrs Murdoch and Macpherson's mode of stating it in their books, is that the trustees did (if they had power to do so) sever the investments, for the behoof of the Sinclairs from those for behoof of the Robinsons, and declare that the £2000, less legacy-duty, held for behoof of Mrs Robinson and her children, was invested in the stocks, which are now the subject of the interdict. I think this was done for convenience in dealing with the interest of two separate families, and it is principally because I think this so obviously convenient and usual in such cases that I put the construction on the words of the trust-deed that the intention was to authorise, if not require, this to be done, though I think that this intention might have been more clearly expressed.

If this is right, I think that the second plea of the complainer correctly states the law, and that the right which the trustees have to come upon the fund for indemnity is limited to the trust-funds, on account of which the £200 bank stock was retained, and so the liability was incurred.

The Lord Justice-Clerk says, that the amount of the calls which the trustees paid was "a direct debt of the maker of the trust, for which the whole of her trust-funds in the hands of the trustees must be liable." I think, if it was a direct debt of Mrs Fraser, the whole of her funds, whether included in the trust or not, would be liable; but I cannot agree that it ever was a debt of hers at all. It did not accrue till more than two years after her death, and the liability is incurred not because the shares had been hers at the time of her death, but because her trustees chose (justifiably, as I think, though most unfortunately) to continue to hold them till after the bank stopped, and that, according to the view I take, they did for the benefit of the Sinclair family, and not for the benefit of the maker of the trust or the trust generally.

It was argued that the maker of a trust is personally bound to indemnify the trustees for all costs and liabilities properly incurred in the execution of the trust, but I do not think this is the law. No doubt any one who requests another to incur a liability which would otherwise have fallen on himself is, in general, bound, at law as well as in equity, to indemnify him. This principle applies to many cases, and where a trust is for the benefit of the maker of the trust it may apply to a trustee. *Balesh v. Hyam*¹ is a good example of a case where it did apply, and there are many others. In *Jervis v. Wolferstan*² the Master of the Rolls goes so far as to say,—“I take it to be a general rule that where persons accept, at the request of another, and that other is a cestuique trust, he is personally liable to indemnify the trustees for any loss accruing in the due execution of the trust.” Perhaps this rule is too broadly stated, as something must depend on the nature of the trust, and of the interest of the cestuique trust, but it is not necessary now to say more than that this rule has no application to a case where the maker of the trust is not a cestuique trust. When he is not, I think he cannot merely as maker of a trust be so liable. The trustee voluntarily accepts the trust, and can only incur liability in consequence of his own act in so accepting; unless there be an express or implied bargain for indemnity from the maker of the trust, he must be taken to accept the trust, relying on the trust-funds. He has, no doubt, a right to charge the trust-funds with all just allowances.

Lord Cottenham, in Attorney-General v. Mayor of Norwich,¹ states the rule thus,—“I apprehend it to be quite clear, according to the rule which applies to all cases of trust, that if necessary expenses are incurred in the execution of a trust, or in the performance of the duties thrown on any parties, and arising out of the situation in which they are placed, such parties are entitled, without any express provision for that purpose, to make the payments required to meet those expenses out of the funds in their hands belonging to the trust.” But this, I think, does not extend so far as to enable them to apply all funds, part of the property which they took in trust, and of which they are not divested, in relief of expenses incurred on behalf of a separate branch of the trust, and not at all on behalf of the funds from which it is sought to obtain relief. In Attorney-General v. Laues,² Wigram, V.-C., states it to be “a well settled rule that, where a legacy has been severed from the bulk of an estate, and become the subject of litigation, that particular fund, and not the general estate, is to bear the costs.” If this was merely a rule of practice as to costs, however well settled it might be in England, it could have no effect in a Scotch case; but it seems to me to be an application of a general principle, which, I should think, must be the same in every system of jurisprudence in which trusts exist. That principle is, I think, involved in the decision of Lord Eldon in ex parte Garland.³ There a miller made his will, dated the 17th of February 1798. He left all his personal property to three trustees, one of whom was his wife, Margaret Ballman. He also appointed them his executors, but that I think not material. By the will the testator directed that his trade of a miller, and the farming business then carried on by him, should be carried on by Margaret Ballman until his trustees should think proper to establish his sons, or either of them, therein; and he directed his trustees, upon so settling his sons, or either of them, in the business, to permit them to take the stock, crop, and other effects in the said business, at a fair valuation, and to take a bond or note from them for the amount. He also directed that, as long as the businesses should be carried on by his wife, the profits thereof should be applied for her own use, and for the maintenance and education of his children, and that an inventory and valuation of his stock, crop, and effects in his said businesses should be taken within six weeks after his decease, and that any sums not exceeding £300, which, by a codicil, he increased to £600, should be paid by his trustees to Margaret Ballman out of his personal estate, for the purpose of enabling her to carry on the businesses, and

Fraser's Trustee.

It is not stated when the testator died, probably it was not long after the date of his will. After his death Margaret Ballman carried on the trades till December 1801, when she became bankrupt. She had given notes of hand to the trustees for the sum of £1351, 5s., the amount of the valuation, and £600 which they had advanced to her in pursuance of the directions in the will. She also had received £768, 12s. 4d. of the testator's assets. The surviving trustee proved under the commission. The assignees presented a petition praying that the proof might be expunged, and that it might be declared that the whole of the personal estate of the testator was liable to all the debts contracted by the bankrupt in carrying on the trades under the directions of the will. The Lord Chancellor expressed a clear opinion that the surviving trustee, as a creditor on the notes, must be postponed to the creditors of the bankrupt, but directed a further argument as to the other point.

The counsel for the assignees argued that if a trustee is directed to carry on a trade, and does so, he makes himself personally liable to the whole of the debts contracted in that trade, which, hard as it may be, is clearly law. He then argued that it followed that he must have the right of resorting for his indemnity to the whole personal estate given to him with a direction to carry on the trade; and that it followed that the creditors must have it, at least by circuity, to the same extent.

Lord Eldon, however, said that the case of the executor was no doubt very hard, as he might be proceeded against as a bankrupt, though he was but a trustee, "but he places himself in that situation by his own choice, judging for himself whether it is fit and safe to enter into that situation, and contract that sort of responsibility." He says that the creditors "have something very like a lien upon the estate embarked in the trade, they have not a lien upon anything else." No more is said as to the argument that the trustee had a personal right to indemnity, and that, consequently, her assignees had a similar right at least by circuity.

The extent of the right which trustees have to be indemnified, and the manner in which creditors can by circuity work it for their own benefit, were discussed by the Master of the Rolls in in re Johnson.¹ The Master of the Rolls there says what ex parte Garland decides is, "that the claim of the creditors is limited to the assets devoted to trade."

On the question whether the whole assets of the testator were directly liable to the debts incurred in the trade which the testator directed to be carried on, Lord Eldon proceeds very much on the general inconvenience that would be produced if the estate could not be wound up effectually so long as the trade was carried on, perhaps for a century. In the case before him the trade had not been carried on for more than two years, and at most a few months more, but in laying down the law he had to consider what might have happened. I think it clearly must have been the Lord Chancellor's opinion that the trustee who, of his own choice, placed himself in the situation of incurring liability for a trade which the framer of the trust directed to be carried on with a particular part of his assets, had no right to come for indemnity upon the rest of the assets. And this is, I think, the guiding principle to be applied in this case, as soon as it is determined that the two branches of the trust, that for the Sinclair family and that for the Robinson family, were severed. On that subject I have already said what is my view. I think, therefore, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was right, though not for the reason given in his note; and that the appeal should be allowed, with costs, and that interlocutor restored.

Fraser's Trustees.

LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion that the interlocutors under appeal ought to be reversed, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which was approved by Lord Gifford, one of the three Judges of the Second Division, ought to be restored. It is necessary to explain the grounds upon which I have come to that conclusion, because I concur in part only of the opinion of Lord Gifford, and am unable to assent to the reasons assigned by the Lord Ordinary for his judgment.

The trusts of the late Mrs Fraser's settlement are not complicated. After providing, in common form, for payment of her debts, deathbed and funeral expenses, the testatrix appoints her trustees to make payment of the interest or annualrent of £2000 to her daughter Mrs Sinclair during her lifetime, and of the capital to her children after her decease, and to make payment in like manner of the interest or annualrent and of the capital of another sum of £2000 to her daughter Mrs Robinson and her children. The testatrix then bequeaths £5 to each of her trustees, and directs them, after payment of debts, and after "making provision for payment of the legacies above-mentioned," to divide the free residue of the trust-estate equally between her son, James Robb, and her two daughters, Mrs Sinclair and Mrs Robinson.

The estate falling under the trust, amounting in value to £5000 or thereby, consisted chiefly of railway stocks, and of £850 consolidated stock of the City of Glasgow Bank, which was duly transferred to the respondent William Murdoch, and his co-trustee, James Fraser Robb. The trustees, in the course of their administration, sold bank stock to the extent of £650; and after paying debts, expenses, and minor bequests, they proceeded to make provision for payment of the two legacies of £2000 to the daughters of the testatrix and their issue, by appropriating to them severally the remaining stocks which had belonged to the testatrix, at their current value in the market. In this division the unsold balance of £200 City Bank stock was, with the knowledge and consent of Mrs Sinclair, appropriated to her and her children, as representing part of their £2000. The funds remaining in the hands of the trustees, after such appropriation, were equally divided among the three residuary legatees. These arrangements are narrated in detail in a deed of discharge executed by the residuary legatees in March and May 1877. It proceeds upon the recital that the trustees "have invested" each of the two legacies of £2000 upon the respective stocks therein specified; and in respect that they had been paid or received credit for their several shares of the remainder the residuary legatees thereby exoner the trustees of their whole actings and management, and discharge all claims of residue competent to them under the provisions of the deed of trust. The books and accounts of the trust shew that, from the time the two legacies were thus severed, each of the daughters of the testatrix received the income of the stocks which had been assigned to herself and her family, under deduction of expenses applicable to her own stocks.

It appears to me that all these acts of administration were authorised by the terms of the trust-deed, and were, therefore, intra vires of the trustees.

Fraser's Trustees.

Lord Gifford was of opinion that, in assigning these stocks to the beneficiaries, the trustees acted in excess of their powers; and it would certainly have been their plain duty to realise, had not the testator given them express power "to continue to hold all or any of such shares or stocks, in public or other companies, as may pertain and belong to me at the time of my decease, should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so, without any personal responsibility on my trustees for loss, if any, thereby sustained." His Lordship held that this was not a continuing power applicable to all the purposes of the trust, but merely a power to delay realisation, and consequently to postpone the distribution of the residue. I am unable to adopt that view. A general power to retain stocks in which the testatrix has already invested does not differ, in its scope, from a general power to invest in these stocks. What the trustees can do in the one case by making a new, they can effect in the other case by retaining an old investment; and in the present instance the terms of the power are wide enough to cover all purposes of the trust requiring investment. I therefore think that the trustees were entitled in their discretion to retain these stocks, as an investment of the £2000 legacies, instead of realising the stocks, and then investing £4000 upon moveable or heritable securities.

The Lord Ordinary decided against the respondent in this appeal, on the ground that, in retaining the £200 City Bank stock as part of Mrs Sinclair's legacy, the trustees did not act within the power entrusted to them by the testatrix, that they surrendered their independent judgment, and acted in accordance with the wishes of Mrs Sinclair, and against their own convictions. There does not appear to me to be any evidence sufficient to bring such a serious charge home to the trustees. No doubt they did consult the beneficiary most interested in the matter, and what they did had her approval; but I do not think there is ground for the inference that the trustees did not regard the retention of the bank stock as a proper act of administration, or that they thought it would be attended with any appreciable risk either to the beneficiaries or to themselves.

I am further of opinion that the trustees had power to sever these £2000 legacies, and to place them in separate investments for behoof of the respective beneficiaries. The trust-deed authorises them to lend out upon certain securities "the foresaid legacies of £2000 and £2000 respectively," and these words appear to me to confer upon the trustees, by plain implication, a right to make the severance if they choose. It may be doubted whether, in the due administration of the trust, the trustees could have declined to sever these legacies, but in the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to decide that point.

If, instead of severing the two legacies, the trustees had been entitled and had thought fit to make provision for their payment by retaining in their hands an undivided fund of £4000, the present question could hardly have arisen, assuming always that the trustees had power to retain the £200 City Bank stock as a trust investment, after distribution of the residue. In that case the two families of Sinclair and Robinson would have been equally interested in the investment, they would have shared in any increment of the value of the stock, and would have borne alike any loss arising from its depreciation. I did not understand it to be disputed, and I think it clear that, had matters stood in that position, the trustees would have been entitled to recoup calls paid by them to the liquidators of the City Bank out of the remaining funds or stocks held by them for the purpose of paying the two legacies.

The real question in this case, according to my apprehension of it, comes to be—What was the effect of the severance of the two legacies upon the right of indemnity competent to these trustees so long as they held, and were justified in holding, the trust-estate as an undivided whole? I cannot agree with the opinion expressed by the late Lord Ormildale, one of the two Judges composing the majority of the Second Division, to the effect that the appropriation of the stocks held by the trustees consisted of mere book entries made for convenience in dealing with the interest of the liferenters, Mrs Sinclair and Mrs Robinson. The appropriation of these stocks, if authorised, as I hold it to have been, by the terms of the trust-deed, was an act of administration which the trustees of themselves had no power to undo. The immediate effect of that act was to alter the pecuniary interests of the two sets of beneficiaries concerned, and the relations subsisting between them and the trustees. The beneficial interests of Mrs Sinclair and her issue on the one hand, and of Mrs Robinson and her children on the other, were thenceforth limited to the stocks severally assigned to them, and the trustees ceased to be under any liability to account to either liferentrix and her children for the stocks appropriated to the others. Two trusts were created instead of one, with separate funds, and different beneficiaries having no community of interest. Such being the legal result of the appropriation, it is, in my opinion, immaterial whether the authority to constitute these two trusts was derived from one and the same deed, or whether each was constituted by virtue of a separate deed under the hand of the testatrix.

In that state of circumstances I am at a loss to conceive upon what principle of law or equity the respondent can claim to be indemnified for loss arising upon the £200 City Bank stock appropriated to Mrs Sinclair out of the funds assigned to the appellant and her children. There is no positive rule of law upon which such a claim can be supported, and I do not know of any equitable claim to indemnity, recognised by the law of Scotland, which does not rest upon the maxim of the civil law, "Cujus est commodum ejus quoque debet esse incommodum." Those authorities in the law of England to which your Lordships have referred lead to precisely the same result. It may be a hard thing that the respondent has personally to bear loss arising upon a trust investment in which he had no personal interest; but he voluntarily undertook the risk when he consented to hold City of Glasgow Bank stock as trustee for behoof of Mrs Sinclair and her children. In my opinion it would be a still harder thing to inflict that loss upon the appellant, who had as little personal interest in the matter as the respondent, but, unlike the respondent, had no power either to prevent such an investment of Mrs Sinclair's legacy, or to protect herself from its consequences.

In the Court below, the Lord Justice-Clerk decided in favour of the respondent, solely on the ground that the calls made by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank constituted a debt of the truster, Mrs Fraser, and, if that assumption had been well founded, it appears to me that the judgment of the Second Division would have been right. But it seems clear that these calls were never, in any sense, a debt due by the truster or by her estate. The claim of the liquidators was a claim against the trustees personally, arising out of that course of administration by which they became and continued to be partners of the bank. But if any doubt could be raised on this point it is completely disposed of by the judgment of Lord Eldon in ex parte Garland.¹

I therefore concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

THE MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF EDINBURGH, Appellants.—

Magistrates of
Edinburgh v.
M'Laren, &c.

MARJORY M'LAREN AND THE LORD ADVOCATE, Respondents.—
Lord-Adv. Watson—Badenach Nicolson.

Trust—Separation of funds jointly administered.—Prior to 1695 the magistrates of a burgh held a fund as trustees for a hospital for poor and sick. In that year a person of the name of Alexander conveyed to the hospital two heritable bonds for sums amounting to £2270, stating that the revenue thereof was to be applied in supporting a certain number of pensioners in the hospital, and directing that any surplus revenue should be applied to increase the capital. He further directed that the patrons of the mortification (who were to be the magistrates and the ministers of the burgh) should prefer as beneficiaries (1) his own kindred, (2) those of the name of Alexander, and, failing these, should select beneficiaries. In 1696 the magistrates, as trustees of the hospital, obtained possession of the Alexander bonds, and subsequently, disregarding the special directions as to the application of the revenue, administered it along with the general revenue of the hospital, keeping no separate accounts of the two funds.

In 1734 the magistrates expended £4634 of the hospital funds in the purchase of lands. In 1744 and 1753 the two Alexander bonds were paid up and the funds mixed with the hospital funds. The whole funds not invested in land were subsequently lent by the magistrates to the burgh, which became bankrupt, and its debts were, by statute, converted into three per cent annuities.

In a question raised in 1873 as to the amount of the Alexander fund held (aff. judgment of First Division) that since the year 1700 the said fund had been immixed and dealt with as part of the funds of the hospital, and must be held to have participated proportionally with the hospital funds in the increase of value of the aggregate funds and property between the year 1700 and 1873; and that the purchase of lands in 1734 was to be regarded as a purchase on account of the joint funds, although the original Alexander bonds were not paid until a subsequent date.

Trust—Ex officio trustees.—Held that the fact of the ministers of the burgh taking no part in the management of the trust for upwards of a century was no bar to their successors exercising their rights.

In this action, raised by Clephane and others, beneficiaries of Trinity Hospital, against the Magistrates of Edinburgh, the House of Lords, besides deciding the point raised by the action and defences, directed the Court of Session, inter alia, to inquire and ascertain of what the property of the hospital consisted.

Under this remit various questions were subsequently raised and disposed of by the Court of Session. No. 15.

On 20th July 1875 an interlocutor was pronounced containing, inter alia, the following findings:—"Find that the funds mortified by Master James Alexander in the year 1695 have been hitherto held, administered, and applied by the petitioners in the same way as the funds belonging to the Trinity Hospital, and have been immixed with and dealt with as part of the funds of the said hospital: Find that in terms of the said James Alexander's mortification the funds mortified by him fall to be held and administered by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the city of Edinburgh, and the ministers of the said city, present and to come, and to be applied, in the first place, in relief of poor persons of the founder's kindred; in the second place, in relief of poor persons of the name of Alexander; and, lastly, in relief of other poor persons, all as directed by his deed of mortification, dated 23d October 1695: Find that for this purpose it is necessary to ascertain the present amount of the capital of the said funds mortified by the said James Alexander, and to set apart the same to be administered and applied as aforesaid: Find that in the year 1700 the said funds amounted in all to £2270, and that the said funds to that amount have been immixed as aforesaid with the funds and property of the Trinity Hospital from an early period down to the present time, and must be held to have participated proportionally with the said funds and property in the increase of value of the aggregate funds and property between the year 1700 and the year 1873: Remit of new to Professor Macpherson to ascertain the value of the whole funds and property of the said hospital, as in the year 1700, drawing back to the said date the value of all additional gifts and legacies received by the hospital after the year 1700, on such terms as may seem reasonable; also to ascertain and fix the amount or value of the whole aggregate funds and property as in the year 1873, and to report what is the present amount of the said Alexander's funds, taken in the same proportion to the present value of the whole aggregate funds as the sum of £2270 bears to the value of the whole hospital funds and property in 1700, ascertained as aforesaid."

Edinburgh v.
M'Laren, &c.

On 30th November 1875 the Court appointed intimation to be made to the Lord Advocate in terms of section 16 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867.

A note for the Lord Advocate was thereafter lodged, stating that his Lordship had considered the process, and appears and intervenes for the interests of the charity, or any object of the trust or the public interest.

On 19th March 1878 the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that in ascertaining the value of the whole funds and property administered by the defenders, as governors of the hospital in 1700, no account is to be taken of the Trinity College Church or of the Trinity Hospital buildings, or of any lands held and possessed by the governors for the hospital in the year 1700, and thereafter retained by them in forma speciæ; and, on the other hand, find that, in ascertaining the value of said whole funds and property in the year 1873, no account is to be taken of the prices received by the defenders for the said church and for the said hospital buildings (including the price of a servitude in favour of the said hospital buildings mentioned in the said report), inasmuch as such prices are of known amount, and either have been kept separate, or are readily separable from the aggregate funds and property which comprehend the funds and property belonging to the Alexander mortification: Find that the price or prices of parts of the lands held and possessed by the defenders in 1700, but since sold, must be included in the account of the value of the said whole funds and property in the year 1873, inasmuch as the said price or prices have been immixed with the aggregate funds and property which comprehend the funds and property of the Alexander mortification; and, on the other hand, that in ascertaining the value of the said whole funds and property in the year 1700, the said price or prices must be drawn back to the said date on the same terms on which additional gifts and legacies received since 1700 are to be drawn back as hereinafter directed: Find that lands acquired by the defenders, as governors, since the year 1700, by purchase, and not by donation or mortification, must be taken into account in ascertaining the value of the said aggregate funds and property in the year 1873, and are to be valued at the price at which the same might reasonably be expected to sell, if publicly exposed for sale, in the year 1873: Approve of the valuation ascertained and reported by Professor Macpherson, and appoint the value of the said lands to be taken at £640 per acre in the year 1873: Find that the sum of £5730, 9s. 2d., which the defenders are appointed, by interlocutor of this date, to restore to the Trinity Hospital, but without interest, is to be reckoned as part of the said aggregate funds and property as existing in the year 1873: Find that the mode adopted by the accountant, and reported by Professor Macpherson,* of drawing back to the year 1700 the value of all additional gifts and legacies received by the governors of the hospital since 1700, and immixed with the said aggregate funds and property, is a reasonable and equitable mode, and approve thereof accordingly, as applicable not only to the said additional gifts and legacies, but also to the price or prices obtained for portions of the lands held and possessed by the governors in 1700, and subsequently sold."

Subsequently a report was lodged by Professor Macpherson shewing that, giving effect to the principles fixed by the foregoing interlocutor, the amount of the Alexander fund as at 1700 was £2270, 8s., and as at 1873 £30,537, 19s.

The Magistrates appealed, for the following reasons:—“(1) Because the finding that the Alexander fund, amounting to £2270 or thereby, has been immixed with the funds and property of the Trinity Hospital from an early period down to the present time, and must be held to have participated proportionally with the said funds and property in the increase of value of the aggregate funds and property between the year 1700 and the year 1873, is without foundation in fact. (2) Because the lands of Dean and Blinkbonny were purchased and paid for prior to 1739 out of moneys of Trinity Hospital, and not out of moneys of the Alexander fund, which was at that date wholly invested in the original bonds over the Annandale and Westerhall estates, and consequently the Alexander fund is not entitled to any share in the increase in the value of the lands of Dean and Blinkbonny. (3) Because the moneys belonging to the Alexander fund were not at any time invested in the purchase of land, but, on the contrary, were, after they were paid up by the original debtors, invested, along with certain other funds of the Trinity Hospital, in securities or investments which can be traced, and therefore the Alexander fund is not entitled to any increase in value of any of the lands now held by the hospital, and purchased out of the hospital funds, but is entitled only to a proportionate share of the investments actually made with the moneys of the Alexander fund. (4) Because the ministers of Edinburgh are not now entitled, after the long contrary usage, to claim a right to be joined as trustees in the administration of the Alexander fund; and it is not expedient that they should be so found.”

* See Appendix, p. 152.

The facts sufficiently appear from the opinions of Lord Blackburn and Lord Hatherley. No. 15.

Aug. 3, 1881.
Magistrates of
Edinburgh v.
M'Laren, &c.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, the Town-Council of Edinburgh were the administrators of Trinity Hospital, and as such held considerable funds before the year 1696. In that year Mr James Alexander died, having previously made a mortification to the Lord Provost and Town-Council of Edinburgh and their successors in office, and the ministers of the said burgh present and to come. The ministers at that time did not take any steps to assert their right to join in administering this mortification. The council got possession of the funds, and from the time they did so down to the making of the interlocutor appealed against administered those funds as if they had been mortified to them as administrators of the funds of Trinity Hospital.

In a suit for the proper administration of the funds of Trinity Hospital the Court of Session had to decide a great many questions. Two, and two only, of their decisions are now by this appeal brought before this House—1st, The Court of Session decided that the funds of the Alexander mortification ought to have been from the beginning administered by the council and the ministers, and not by the council alone, and that notwithstanding the length of time during which a contrary practice had prevailed they could not sanction it in future; and that the funds of that mortification must be in future administered, in terms of the mortifier's trust, by the council and the ministers.

This was the first decision appealed against. I think none of your Lordships who heard the argument doubted that the Court of Session could not have decided otherwise, and the counsel for the appellants were not able to urge anything substantial against this decision.

But then, having determined that the Alexander fund was to be administered separately in future, there arose a question, what was the fund which was to be so administered? I do not think that I can state the point more briefly than is done by the Lord President. He says—"The funds left by Mr Alexander were invested in particular securities, and those securities were not called up or changed until about the middle of the last century, and we have distinct evidence of what the amount of the fund was at that time. Now, if we proceeded upon the principle of a strict accounting against the Magistrates here as trustees, of course the way of bringing out the balance would be to charge them with this capital as at the date when we find it in their hands, and then charge them with the income as it accrued, and let them discharge themselves the best way they could. But it rather appears to me that in a case of this kind, and looking to the nature of the trust and the way in which it was necessarily administered, that would be too strict a principle of accounting; and while I think it is our undoubted duty to separate this Alexander fund, and secure that it shall be administered as a separate trust in all time coming, we may deal with bygones in a way more favourable for the administrators of Trinity Hospital. The income of the fund has apparently been spent, and it has not been spent, so far as we can see, upon purposes alien to the intentions and wishes of the founder. His wishes and intentions have only been to a certain extent disregarded—that is to say, the fund has not been in the right hands for administration, and there has not been in the selection of the objects of the bounty that order of preference which he desired. But still the fair result of the evidence appears to be that, at all events for a very long period, the income of the Alexander fund was be-

No. 15.

Magistrates of
Edinburgh v.

stowed upon poor and indigent persons of the kind generally here contemplated. It was employed along with the income of the other funds of the hospital generally for such purposes, and therefore I cannot see that there can be, especially against a shifting body of trustees like the Magistrates and Town-Council of Edinburgh, any responsibility for the expenditure of that income. It is not alleged that they appropriated this fund to their own purposes as individuals, or that they appropriated it to the uses of the corporation of the city of Edinburgh. If that had been so, it would have raised a question of a very different kind. But that does not appear to have been so, and therefore I incline to the opinion that in so far as regards the past income of this fund there is no room for any accounting at all.

"But then the next question comes to be—How are we to ascertain what sum now in the hands of those trustees will adequately and fairly represent the capital of the Alexander fund? Now, that is a question of some difficulty, but at the same time I think it admits of a solution. We know that the Alexander fund was invested upon two bonds, as it was originally settled by the donor himself—the one upon the Annandale estates for £1725, 17s. 8½d., and the other upon the Westerhall estates for £544, 13s. of sterling money, for I am speaking now of the amount as converted into sterling money and actually paid up in the course of last century. These two sums amount together to £2270. Now, the mortification was in the year 1695, and it may certainly be assumed, without any great stretch, that that money came into the hands of the hospital trustees by the beginning of the last century, say in the year 1700. Therefore they were possessed in 1700 of this capital sum as representing the Alexander mortification. They were at the same time possessed of a very considerable estate belonging to the hospital, and it is not at all difficult to ascertain what the amount of that estate was. In that way we discover what was the relative or comparative value of those two estates in the year 1700. But it is very apparent upon the face of the report before us, and the abundant information which we have on the subject, that this joint mixed estate, consisting to a large extent of the funds and estate of the hospital proper, but also to a more limited extent of Alexander's fund, has largely increased in amount and value between the year 1700 and the present day. Now, it seems to me that this estate so jointly administered having greatly increased in value between these two dates, the Alexander fund must be entitled to participate in that prosperity. Thus, supposing that in 1700 the estate of the hospital proper amounted to £10,000 in value, and the Alexander fund to £2000 in value, making together £12,000, but that at the present day the joint estate as it appears in the hands of the administrators amounts to £50,000 in value, then that £50,000 must be apportioned between the same funds in the same proportion that they bore to each other in the year 1700—that is, as two to ten. I am taking the figures I have mentioned as entirely suppositious, not supposing they represent the entire value by any means. On the contrary, the value, as we see, is very much greater. Now, there may be some little difficulty in adjusting the precise way in which this result is to be brought about." He then proceeds to give various directions as to what was to be done in ascertaining the amount, which I need not further notice.

No other way was suggested at the bar in which the fund, if the two were inextricably mixed up, could be apportioned except that of taking the proportion which the two funds bore to each other, and dividing the mixed fund in that proportion, and I cannot myself see any other way. But it was argued that the two funds were not inextricably mixed up, and the point which the appellants' counsel made was fairly raised by the facts as to the purchase of the Dean estate. It appears that the town-council in 1734-39 purchased this estate for £3675. In course of time that estate has become part of the town of Edinburgh, and is now worth a very large sum of money, and this has been a profitable investment. At dates subsequent to 1734 they invested funds in city bonds, and the city having become insolvent, and compounded with its creditors, this has been a losing investment.

No. 15.

Magistrates of
Edinburgh v.
M'Laren, &c.

The decision of the Court of Session is that the investments are to be taken as made for the mixed funds, and that on the figures supposed by the Lord President the Alexander fund is entitled to two-twelfths of the profit made by the profitable investment in the Dean estate, and is to bear two-twelfths of the loss on the unprofitable investments in city bonds. And the result of that will be that in administering the Alexander fund the administrators will have the management of a very considerably larger sum than what the testator Alexander had and mortified in 1695. The contention of the appellants is that the investment in the Dean estate is to be considered as made exclusively for the benefit of Trinity Hospital, and that the Alexander fund will have no share in the profitable investment, but will have to bear a share of the loss in the subsequent investments, so that the fund now to be administered as the Alexander fund will be less than what the mortifier left in 1696. This is a result which does not at the first view seem so fair and just as that produced by the decision of the Court of Session.

In order to understand the grounds on which their argument is based it is necessary to examine what the facts were. The testator Alexander left in 1696 the funds available for his mortification invested in two bonds. The administrators of Trinity Hospital by usurpation became possessed of the control of both those bonds before 1734, and they in fact received the interest on those bonds and mixed the interest thus received with the revenue which they received from the property of Trinity Hospital, and from that mixed revenue defrayed the expenses which they incurred for the whole charity without making any distinction whatever as to whether those expenses were incurred for objects under the terms of the Alexander mortification or for purposes proper under the Trinity Hospital charity only. This is clearly proved by the account for the year 1722, which was in process though not printed, and which was produced at the bar during the argument. No doubt this was wrong, but, as pointed out by the Lord President in the passage I have read, these purposes were not alien to each other, and though wrong, this was not a wrong like what it would have been if they had appropriated the funds to their own purposes. But though they treated the funds as one, the two bonds remained in specie just as Alexander left them, not called up.

When the council bought the Dean estate in 1739, they gave directions to their treasurer to pay for it, and for that purpose to uplift some securities, including the bond over Westerhall for £544, 13s., which was one of the bonds left by Alexander. Nothing could more clearly prove that in making the investment the council were (as far as intention went) intending to make an investment for the behoof of the whole mixed fund which they, improperly it is true, treated as one fund. But the treasurer did not follow their instructions. In his account, after shewing what the whole disbursements in paying for the

No. 15. Dean estate and improvements on it had been, and that there remained a balance of £465, 18s. 5d. unpaid, he adds this—"Tho' the accomptant was authorised by the council to uplift £544, 13s. st. contd. in Sir James Johnston's hereble. bond to the hospital to replace the above charge, which, as it was well secured and the interest duly paid, he judged it more for the interest of the hospital to uplift only the sum due by Mr John and Mr Charles Cockburn, their bond being £200 st., and the meantime to advance the rest himself—£200. Balance due to him on acct. of the enclosing, £265, 18s. 5d." Consequently the two bonds remained in specie not called up for some years later.

Aug. 8, 1881.
Magistrates of
Edinburgh v.
M'Laren, &c.

The argument founded on this was, that as the bonds remained in specie, and earmarked as it were, and as it appeared that the estate of Dean was in fact paid for out of funds originally belonging to Trinity Hospital, and uplifted for that purpose, it followed as a matter of law that, whatever the council intended, the funds must be followed, and that the Dean estate belonged exclusively to Trinity Hospital. According to this reasoning, if the treasurer had obeyed his instructions the Alexander fund would have been entitled to share in the Dean estate in the proportion which £544, 13s. bore to the whole cost. As he did not, they are to have no share in it.

This makes the question depend entirely on an accident, and is not a satisfactory result; still if the law was settled that it was so we must follow it. But I do not think there is any case, either in England or Scotland, in which such a question has been raised. No doubt when the question has been whether those who represented the trust could claim property on the ground that it was procured by trust-funds which they had a right to follow, the identity of the fund is all important. But such a case as the present as to an investment has never that I can find been raised.

In Pennell v. Duffell (4 De Jex, Macnaghton, and Gordon, 372) it might have been raised, but those entitled to the different estates which then were proved to be jointly entitled to the fund very sensibly settled the proportions in which they were entitled without going to law about it.

Being, therefore, as I think it is, a new question, it must be settled on principles of justice. Speaking for myself alone, I should have had great difficulty in deciding this case if it had come before me as sitting in the Court of Session. I doubt whether I should have had acuteness enough to discover the mode in which the Court of Session have solved the difficulty. But they have solved it in a way perfectly consistent with justice and good sense, and not inconsistent with any technical rule of law, and no other solution has been suggested which would be so satisfactory. I certainly, therefore, am not prepared to advise your Lordships to reverse the judgment below, especially seeing that I am not prepared to advise your Lordships to adopt any other rule.

I move, therefore, that the interlocutors below should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I have had the advantage of seeing in print the opinion of the noble and learned Lord who has just addressed your Lordships, and I have nothing to add to the statement of facts therein contained.

It appears that the first unfortunate step which was taken in this matter, erroneously, although no doubt in perfect good faith, was the exclusion of the ministers who were particularly pointed out in Alexander's mortification to be joint trustees with the corporation of Edinburgh of the fund that he left for the purposes, under certain limitations, of Trinity Hospital. The ministers being shut out from it, the fund was administered entirely by the Provost and Council of Edinburgh. This circumstance no doubt led to the confusion which afterwards took place in the accounts. The Provost and Council of Edinburgh were properly trustees of Trinity Hospital, and they had several other mortifications also which were made over to them for Trinity Hospital, and this Alexander mortification appears in a sense to have been one also for the benefit of Trinity Hospital, or rather for the benefit of the persons who were to be received therein, that being a charity. It was limited, however, in its operation by certain rules with reference to the kindred of the founder. He was particularly anxious that those kindred should be admitted to it, and that until they failed the fund should be used for that purpose. However, the Provost and Council of Edinburgh placed all those funds which they held in any way for the benefit of Trinity Hospital in one common stock, as it were, and kept one common book of accounts with relation to them.

M'Laren, &c.

I asked once or twice during the argument whether there was any separate account kept anywhere of the Alexander mortification, and was answered that the report of Mr Macpherson was in this respect perfectly correct—that the funds of the Alexander mortification had been “immixed” with the other funds held by the corporation in trust for the hospital. The consequence of that was that all the funds, including the Alexander mortification, have been dealt with as one common fund to be administered as the Provost and Council might think proper for the benefit of the hospital. This is not a case, as was remarked in the Court below, and as has been remarked again just now by my noble and learned friend, in which any improper motives have actuated the corporation—that is to say, the Provost and Council of Edinburgh—as trustees. They no doubt thought that they were performing their duty in doing that which they did; but at the same time the consequence has been unfortunate, because it has become necessary to separate these funds which are held on separate and distinct trusts; and it being necessary to separate them, the question is, how is that to be done now, when, according to the report of the referee, Mr Macpherson, the funds have become inextricably immixed?

My Lords, a very hard struggle was made, by Mr Kay I think, upon that part of the case, namely, with reference to the funds being capable of being still pointed out as separate and distinct. Now up to a certain time there was truth in this. The corporation became masters of the fund, as it is stated, somewhere about the year 1700. As far as appears from the report or the evidence, they were at that time masters of the fund, which consisted of two heritable debts due from the Annandale estates and another estate connected with them, the separate sums amounting together to the sum which was mentioned in my noble and learned friend's statement. Those debts were not gathered in until certainly after the year 1734 or 1735, in fact not until after 1740, and the purchase of the Dean estate was made at a period anterior to their being so called in, but the interest on those bonds was received and was credited to the common fund before that time. We have had an opportunity of seeing the accounts for one year, and it appears that the payments were made entirely in a mixed and un-separated form, indifferently from the interest of one fund or the other, or from the interest of one or of all the funds which were held by the Provost and Council of Edinburgh. My Lords, that being the case, it became impossible from that time to separate the interest, as Mr Macpherson tells us, and of course we looked to the counsel for the appellants to make out if they could that Mr Macpherson was wrong in that respect, and that the interests could in fact be separated. No attempt, however, has really been made, or if it has been made it has not been successful, to show that the interests of these funds was at any time kept separate and distinct. In due time afterwards the capital was gathered in, and what became of it? It may partly be traced to the debts which pressed upon the corporation, I apprehend, and it may partly be traced for a certain time to certain other payments, but after a time the funds became so inextricably immixed that there is no mode of separating them.

The appellants say, at all events, the corporation did not take the funds of the Alexander mortification for the purchase of the Dean estate, which is a source of profit to the corporation—they did not use them for re-investment in this Dean estate, which has turned out well for those who engaged in it, and we must keep these funds entirely separate from that advantageous purchase, inasmuch as we can show you that the identical funds which might be followed out as being what you were entitled to could not possibly have been laid out in the purchase of the Dean estate. In the events which have happened it would certainly be very much worse for them if they were taken to be left in the general body of the fund and so lost. What the Court seems to have regarded the corporation as having done may be described thus—if I may use an expression which bears more analogy to this than any other expression one could use—A sort of partnership was formed by these trustees between the various trust-funds which they held. They considered that they were justified in acting in the manner they did for the benefit of the hospital. They said, we will carry all these into one joint stock concern for better and for worse; and accordingly although there have been some alternations, the investment which was made by these trustees, improperly constituted in a sense, but still trustees of this particular fund, has turned out to be a beneficial investment.

Now, my Lords, I apprehend that what the Court below has done is only that which is commonly done in this country with reference to partnerships. The question came more frequently before our Courts at one time than it does now, because the principle is better understood. At one time, a long time ago, if a partner died leaving assets in the partnership, and the other members remaining in the partnership after his death carried on the business with his assets, there was felt to be a difficulty in coming to any arrangement as to what would be the correct mode of dealing with that fund. It was a recognised rule at all times that a cestuique trust whose property has been improperly dealt with has the choice of accepting the dealings with his property or repudiating it, that is, either of taking all the profit (he would not choose it if there had been loss) resulting from the dealing with his property, or requiring the payment back of his money with such interest as the Court thought right under the circumstances. There was found to be a difficulty about applying that to partnerships for some little time, but the principles of partnerships were discussed in the cases of Brown v. De Tastet, Jacob's Reps. 284, and in a case of which I do not just now remember the name, reported in the second volume of Mylne and Craig (Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 1836, 2 Keen's Reps. 722, affirmed 4 Mylne and Craig, 41). When the principles were discussed in those cases it was said that the difficulty having arisen in this way, inasmuch as something must be allowed for labour and attention and activity in the business—such remuneration, for instance, as the managing partner or a person somewhat in that position might be entitled to—the Court did not see its way to direct a simple account of the profits without more. However, in those cases it came to be settled at last that the proper course is to allow an account of all profit made since the death of the partner, and to give his estate a share of that profit according to the capital on the one side, and to debit his estate on the other side with “just allowances,” which of course includes everything which the Court might think just and proper. The principle was that the trust-money having been used in the partnership concern, and profits having resulted from that use of trust-money, no attempt should be made to separate all the different funds out of which money might have been paid, but the share of profits upon the trust-money so used was to be ascertained according to the capital employed.

Edinburgh v.
M'Laren, &c.

That, my Lords, is exactly what has been done here. It is a kind of partnership concern which has been carried on by the Provost and Council with their various trust-funds. The whole of the trust has made a profit; that profit the Court below has held ought to accrue for the benefit of that charity, the fund of which came into the hands of these trustees about the year 1700 as far as can be made out upon the evidence, as well as of the other trust-funds held by the same trustees. That is the principle upon which the Court has directed that the apportionment should be made.

Now, my Lords, in the case of a partnership, supposing it were necessary to lay out any money for the purpose of increasing the business during the time when the business was carried on with the aid of the deceased partner's assets in conjunction with other assets of the partnership—supposing it were necessary for the erection of a new building (take a brewery for example), or the like, to make payments—and profits were so earned, the Court would not be very strict to inquire out of which particular fund the money which was laid out arose, because when funds are employed jointly in this way you can hardly say that payments are made out of one fund rather than out of another fund. Here curiously enough there is a strong illustration of that in the entry which has been read by my noble and learned friend near me, from which it appears that it was actually intended at one time to apply these very funds to the particular purchase which was made of the Dean estate. But really that does not in substance make a difference if the whole concern has been carried on in a joint and mixed manner, and if the whole funds have been invested for the purposes of the whole concern if I may so term it. Believing as the corporation did that the whole was one concern, it was upon the faith and confidence of their having certain assets in hand, of which the heritable bonds in question formed part, that they made the purchase which otherwise they would not have ventured to make for the benefit of the trust, any more than if it had been an actual partnership the partners would have ventured to make such a purchase for the benefit of the partnership unless they had funds in hand.

Now, my Lords, from about the year 1700 the Provost and Council have had these funds amounting to £2000 odd of the Alexander mortification, and the interest upon them was at first very punctually paid, as the entry which has been read shows, although afterwards the state of things was different. The question arises after a long series of years in which this mistake has been made—for a mistake it has been held by the Court below to be, and that can hardly be disputed. The result of this long mistake is that happily, as things have turned out, the whole concern of this trust administered as one concern has been fortunate; the Alexander mortification partook in a speculation for which

No. 15. the funds of the concern were used, and it has been held by the Court below to be entitled to an equitable share of the profits so realised—that is what it comes to. I have taken the Dean estate as the principal instance, because that appears to be the principal instance of profit; but that is not the only instance, or the only instance of profit—it is a salient instance. A cestuique trust has a right, when his fund has been dealt with in an illegitimate manner as regards the true legal construction of the bequest, to say at his option whether he will have a decree for the restoration of the fund with or without interest in the meantime, or whether he will take the result of the employment of that fund, when it has been employed together with other funds in a payment resulting in an acquisition of profits, by taking a share of those profits. The remedy is given to him in either case, on account of the impossibility when funds have been mixed of attributing to each a particular property and earmarking it as belonging to the one rather than the other. And although you may say at such and such a time the Dean estate in particular could not have been bought with this particular fund because these bonds were not then gathered in and collected, still the interest had been gathered in and the interest had been applied as in case of the other funds. It was one common fund, and the cestuique trust does not now ask to have his part of that fund followed and pursued, and to have his trust-moneys divided from the rest, but he asks what common justice seems to require, namely, that he should have a right to participate in that which has followed from the use of his money—together with the other moneys—taking his share out of that joint and common stock. I think the cestuique trust has a right to do that.

My Lords, I will only add to what my noble and learned friend has said, that in this decision I think we are in no way departing from—on the contrary, it approves itself to my mind as a way of carrying into full effect—the rule which is common in cases of this kind, namely, that a cestuique trust whose funds have been dealt with without his consent has a right to take the result of that dealing in the manner most favourable to himself. I think, therefore, my Lords, that the order suggested by my noble and learned friend is the correct order for us to make.

LORD GORDON.—My Lords, in regard to the first question raised under this appeal, viz., Whether the ministers of Edinburgh are entitled to participate in the administration of the Alexander mortification, I entertain no doubt at all. The terms of the deed of mortification are quite distinct and unambiguous. It nominates and appoints the “Right Honourable the Lord Provost and Bailies and Council of Edinburgh, and their successors in office, for the community thereof, and ministers of the said burgh, present and to come,” to be the sole and undoubted patrons of the mortification. The ministers of the burgh “present and to come” are appointed equally with the Lord Provost, Bailies, and Council, and their successors in office, patrons of the mortification, and I entertain no doubt that the ministers were entitled from the institution of the mortification to participate in its administration.

But it is said, that as the ministers have not taken part in the administration of the mortification from its institution in or prior to the year 1700 they have now lost their right to participate in the management. I think this is a mistake. I agree with the Lord President that “the circumstance that the ministers of Edinburgh have never claimed to be conjoined in this administration is of no consequence. No persons of an official character can give away the rights of their successors in office under a trust of this kind, and therefore the trust must be constituted and administered now as provided by the truster in his deed of mortification."

I think that the cases of Baird and Others v. The Magistrates of Dundee and Leslie v. Black, which were relied on by the appellants, are inapplicable to the circumstances of the present case. In Baird v. The Magistrates of Dundee, March 3, 1863, 1 Macph. (H. L.) 6, the mortification was in favour of the Provost and Bailies of Dundee, but from the institution of the trust in 1645 the affairs of the mortification were managed not by the Provost and Bailies alone, but by the Provost, Bailies, and Town-Council. And it was decided by this House in 1863 (2 Paterson's Appeals, 1156), when the question was raised, "that having regard to the length of time during which the Provost, Bailies, and Town-Council of Dundee per se administered the charity, they ought to be considered as the lawful trustees of the interest represented by Johnstone's legacy." The case of Leslie v. Black, 6th June 1814, F. C., did not come to your Lordships' House. But the point decided by that case was that where a minister and members of a kirk-session, who were appointed along with others as patrons of a mortification, had for more than a century voted collectively as one person in the administration of the trust affairs, they were not entitled to vote per capita, but must continue to vote as they had formerly done. In both of these cases the question was in regard to the intention of the testator, and the usage was only important as shewing the contemporaneous interpretation put on the terms of the deed of mortification accepted and acted on for long periods of time. But there is nothing in these cases to indicate that in a case such as the present, where there is a clear and distinct nomination of certain official persons to act as patrons, the failure for a length of time of these officials to perform their functions would deprive their successors of the right so distinctly conferred upon them.

The remaining part of the case in regard to the mixing of the funds of the Alexander mortification with those of the Trinity Hospital, and the proper mode of the separation of these funds, is attended with more difficulty. But on a careful consideration of the whole matter I have come to be of opinion that the result arrived at by the Court of Session is right. I have had an opportunity of perusing and considering the judgment which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Blackburn, and as his Lordship has gone fully into that part of the case, and as I concur in the views which he has expressed, I shall not detain the House by entering on details.

I am of opinion on the whole matter that the judgments of the Court below are right, and that they should be affirmed.

on such terms as may seem reasonable.' The increase in value of the aggregate estate, at least up to 1845, was not due to any accumulation of interest, but to rental increased, whether owing to improvement of the subjects, or to change in the value of money, or both. After that date it is to a large extent accounted for by non-expenditure of the increase of revenue arising from the price of the hospital, and of the land sold to the railway company, both at Blinkbonny and Quarryholes.

"But much more important than the increase from accumulation of income since 1845 is the increase depending upon feuing value, which has been enormously augmented of late years.

"After repeated consideration of the whole circumstances, the accountant states,—'He came to the conclusion that no arbitrary rate of five or four per cent, or any other rate of interest, can with propriety be adopted as the measure of the rate of discount or accumulation to be applied to any part of the fund.' The accountant, however, after making numerous tentative calculations, ascertained that if the funds and estate at 1700, and the various donations subsequently made to the hospital from the dates when these sums were respectively received, are brought down to 1873, and compounded annually at certain small percentages, the sums so found are equivalent to the amounts of the fund and estate at that date, and that therefore these small percentages are the true rates at which the fund and estate have increased on an average of the whole period. It is no doubt true that the rate of increase in value may have varied during the period, but the accountant believes that no data are in existence by which any certain judgment could be given on the point, and he believes that the approximations made are as close an approach to the truth as can be arrived at, the calculation at compound rates causing the increment to accumulate to a larger extent during the later period. He has therefore drawn the gifts and donations back to 1700 at the rates so found, and adding the sum thereof to the estate at that date, he has calculated that as the amount thereof then was to the Alexander fund, so is the estate in 1873 to the amount of the Alexander fund in 1873.'"

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

1880-81.

DAVID JACK, Appellant.—Mackintosh.
 THOMAS CAMPBELL, Respondent.—J. Reid.

No. 1.

 Jack v. Campbell.

Statute 13 and 14 Vict., c. 92, sec. 1, Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850—Wanton cruelty—Shooting at a dog trespassing and disturbing game in a field.—A dog trespassing in a field chased a rabbit therein. A coachman in the employment of the proprietor of the field followed the dog, and, when within five yards, shot at and hit it, the gun being loaded with No. 4 or 5 shot. The dog ultimately recovered, but suffered much pain for a considerable time. The coachman was convicted on a charge of "wanton cruelty," under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850.*

On appeal, the Court quashed the conviction.

DAVID JACK, coachman, Chapelhouse, Barrhead, was charged before the Justice of Peace Court, Paisley, at the instance of Thomas Campbell, procurator-fiscal of that Court, with an offence against the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 13 and 14 Vict. c. 92, sec. 1, "in so far as on or about the 14th of July 1880, in a field at Chapelhouse, he did cruelly ill-treat, abuse, or torture . . . a dog, by discharging at it from a gun a quantity of small shot, which took effect in its hind quarters, causing it severe pain and suffering."

After evidence was heard in support of the charge, the complaint was found proven, and the accused was sentenced to pay a fine of 10s. 6d., with the sum of £4, 4s. 6d. of expenses.

Jack appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

The facts as stated in the case were:—On 14th July certain persons were bathing in a burn bounded on one side by the grounds of Chapelhouse. A valuable collie dog belonging to one of them followed him into the burn, and after running about for some time jumped out on the said

* Section 1 provides—"Whereas it is expedient to prevent wanton cruelty in the treatment of horses, cattle, and other domestic animals in Scotland, be it therefore enacted that any person who shall, from and after the passing of this Act, cruelly beat, ill-treat, over-drive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, ill-treated, over-driven, abused, or tortured, any animal, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

Chapelhouse lands, and ran about shaking and drying itself. A rabbit started, and the dog gave chase. The rabbit got into a hole, and the dog stood and scraped at the mouth of the hole. The dog's master repeatedly called it back, but it did not come. In a short time the appellant Jack, who was coachman at Chapelhouse, came down the field towards the dog with a gun, and when about five yards from the dog he took aim and fired at it. The dog then went to the burn and crossed it with evident pain. It then lay down near the burn, and the witnesses took it home with difficulty, and it tried to lie down repeatedly on the way.

Further, it was stated that the dog was still in great pain when the case came on for trial—a considerable time after it was shot; that the shot used was ordinary No. 4 or 5 shot; and that at the place where the dog was shot there were brambles and other covert for game.

The question of law for the Court was,—“In the circumstances proved, was the defender liable to conviction under the Act founded on?”

Argued for appellant;—The accused evidently wished to kill outright the dog, which was trespassing, and to do so with as little pain as possible. The case of Cornelius v. Grant, ante, vol. vii., June 8, 1880, settled that cruelty, to come under this Act, must be cruelty without cause, and for the purpose of making the animal suffer.

Argued for the respondent;—The shooting of the dog was wanton and unnecessary. The same end would have been effected by frightening the dog with stones.

LORD ADAM.—This is an appeal against a conviction under the Cruelty to Animals Act. I am far from saying that what the accused did was justifiable or proper in the circumstances. If he had wished to scare the dog away he might have done so by throwing stones at it, or in a like way. But, instead, he fired at it, and, contrary to what we would expect from its proximity when he fired, the result was not the death, but the serious wounding of the dog. The question is if this was wanton cruelty in the sense of the Act. I do not think it was. The Act refers, I think, to the mode in which the thing was done. Now, to say that an act caused pain to an animal does not necessarily mean that it was an act of wanton cruelty. Here there is nothing cruel in the way the thing was done. The only probable result was the immediate death of the dog. That only illustrates the nature of the act. If the dog had been killed it would have been difficult to see the wanton cruelty. I am for quashing the conviction.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

M'Arthur.

A. C. LAWRIE AND OTHERS, Appellants.—Mackintosh.
CHARLES M'ARTHUR, Respondent.—A. J. Young.

Trespass—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1—Farm servant—Killing hare taken from snare—Permission to snare rabbits.—A tenant had power under his lease to snare rabbits, and employed A, one of his farm-servants, to set and attend to his snares. A entered a field on the farm, and took a hare, apparently dead, out of a rabbit-snare. The hare recovered, and ran away. A set his dog after it, and killed it when the dog had retrieved it. A was charged with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act by entering or being in a hay field in search of or in pursuit of game. The Sheriff assoltized the accused. On appeal, the Court (diss. Lord Adam) affirmed the Sheriff's judgment.

CHARLES M'ARTHUR, farm-servant on the farm of Carston, in the parish of Killearn, and county of Stirling, was charged, on 23d July 1880, before the Sheriff-substitute of Stirling, at the instance of A. C. Lawrie and others, proprietors of the estate on which the farm of Carston is situated, with having contravened the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68, and particularly the first section, "in so far as on the 11th day of July 1880 (Sunday) he did in the day-time . . . commit a trespass by entering or being in a hay field, known by the name of Harry's Moss, on the farm of Carston aforesaid, belonging to the complainer, . . . in search or pursuit of game or conies."

After hearing evidence the Sheriff (Buntine) assoltized the accused.

The complainer appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

The facts, as stated in the case, were:—On the day libelled the accused, who was a farm-servant on the said farm, was in the said field. He had a young child in his arms. He had a dog with him. He went to a snare set in the field and took a hare out of it, and the hare being apparently dead, he laid it on the ground near the snare. He then went about fifteen yards from the snare, and repaired another snare in the same field, and then returned and lifted up the hare from the ground. It jumped out of his arms and ran into a wood adjoining the field in question. The respondent set his dog after the hare, and it was caught by the dog in the wood, and the respondent then killed the hare, which was thereafter taken from him by a police constable, who had up to this time been lying concealed, watching the accused.

The respondent had right to be in the field in question for purposes connected with the farm. It was further proved that the tenant, Mr Buchanan, was in use to set snares regularly in the field in question, and that the respondent was in use to examine them and remove any rabbits which they might contain. The tenant had a right to snare rabbits, but the landlord had reserved the right to kill hares, and the accused was employed by the tenant for the purpose of snaring rabbits.

The question of law for the decision of the High Court was, Whether or not, on the facts proved, the accused was guilty of trespass in pursuit of game in the hay field libelled?

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This is a case under section 1 of the Day Trespass Act, and the question is, whether, as matter of law, the respondent should have been found guilty of a contravention of that section. I think that there was no legal obligation on the Sheriff to find him guilty in respect of what had been proved. He had the facts before him, and some were favourable, some adverse to a conviction, and this being so, I cannot think that the decision of the Sheriff acquitting the respondent ought to be disturbed. I think it a pity that this appeal was presented, especially as, even though we had been dissatisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff, the respondent could not have been found guilty by us, or subjected to a second trial before the Sheriff.

LORD ADAM.—The question of law is, whether, on the facts found proved by the Sheriff, the respondent was guilty of an offence under the Day Trespass Act. On the facts, as stated, it is no defence that the respondent was entitled to be in the field in question. It has been decided that it is no answer for a farm-servant, if he pursues game, to plead that he was entitled to be on the land for certain purposes. That, therefore, is no speciality. Now, I can only interpret the Sheriff's language in one way. He says the respondent "set his dog after the hare." He encouraged it to pursue the hare, and he killed the hare after the dog had caught it. It appears to me that from the time he so set on the dog he was as much in pursuit of the hare as he could possibly be. The case is the same as if he had had a gun and had shot the hare. He was then on the land in pursuit of game without leave of the proprietor. We can only decide on these facts, and on these facts, when I am asked if in law there was a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, I cannot do anything but answer in the affirmative. I think this judgment ought not to stand.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with Lord Craighill, and I go even further. I am of opinion not only that on the facts stated the Sheriff had liberty to acquit without any violation of law, but also that he acted rightly in doing so, and would not have acted rightly in my view of the law if he had convicted. This statute is entitled "An Act for the more effectual prevention of trespass in pursuit of game." The charge is—(His Lordship read the charge). So far as the pursuit of conies or rabbits goes he was entitled to be there and see that the traps were in order. On the facts stated I think there is no evidence that he was on the lands for the purpose of pursuing or taking game, and though it has been decided that a farm-servant who is on lands where he is entitled to go for a lawful purpose, may yet be on these lands with another and unlawful purpose, it has not been decided, and it is contrary to my opinion, that a servant, who did not enter the lands with an unlawful purpose, committed any trespass by picking up or setting a dog at a wounded hare. The statute was not directed against such a case as that. This man was not a trespasser at all; he was not on the lands for an unlawful purpose.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, with expenses.

WILLIAM KIRTTON, Appellant.—Strachan.

GEORGE CADENHEAD, Respondent.—J. P. B. Robertson.

Public-house—Public-house Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35)—Breach of certificate—"Notoriously bad fame"—Assembling and meeting.—Circumstances which held not sufficient to support a charge against a public-house keeper of "allowing women of notoriously bad fame to assemble or meet together in his house."

Opinion (per Lord Young) that to support a charge of allowing men or women of notoriously bad fame to assemble or meet in a public-house it is necessary to prove that the assembling or meeting had reference to the bad character referred to.

Opinions contra (per Lord Craighill and Lord Adam).

WILLIAM KIRTTON, spirit-dealer, The Green, Aberdeen, was charged before the magistrates of the burgh of Aberdeen, on a complaint at the instance of George Cadenhead, advocate in Aberdeen, procurator-fiscal in the Burgh Police Court, with having been guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, "in so far as upon the 21st day of September 1880, and on the 24th day of that month, or on one or other of those days, he did permit or suffer several women to assemble or meet in his licensed public-house in the Green aforesaid, they being women of notoriously bad fame." The appellant held a certificate in the form of schedule A, No. 2, of "The Public Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862."* No. 3.

After evidence had been led in support of the complaint the magistrate found the accused guilty "of the offence charged," and sentenced him to pay a fine of £1, 5s., or in default of payment to be imprisoned for eight days. Oct. 30, 1880.
Kirtion v.
Cadenhead.

Kirtion appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

The facts as stated in the case were:—About half-past ten o'clock on the night of the 21st September Inspector Ewan, with a constable and two detectives, visited the appellant's public-house. They found in one compartment of the shop two women sitting in the company of two men, in another compartment two women and one man, and in a back room two women and three men. The three groups of men and women came into the public-house shortly before the police entered the premises. Each group entered separately, and was, to all appearance, a separate party. The compartments in the shop have no doors, but are draped with curtains. The back room communicates with the shop by means of a door, which was shut when the police visited the premises. Any person going through the shop towards the back room could see the occupants of the compartments, as the curtains were not drawn close. The police had no suspicion that the women went there with any immoral purpose. The whole of the six women who were found by the police were known to them as women of notoriously bad character. Their notoriety was proved by various police-officers, by whom it was also proved, on cross-examination, that they did not know that such notoriety extended beyond the police force. There was nothing in the dress or appearance of the women to indicate their character. When the inspector on that occasion charged the appellant with the offence the latter replied that he was entitled to serve any one at the open bar. On the night of 24th September the two detectives again visited the premises, and saw three of the same women go in and come out of the public-house. The women remained on the premises only a few minutes. One of the detectives spoke to the appellant's wife about continuing to admit women of bad character, when she told him she had been advised that she was entitled to sell drink to them at the bar.

The question of law stated was, "Whether the facts found proved are sufficient in law to warrant a conviction under the charge libelled?"

Argued for the appellant;—The notoriety was not sufficiently proved. It was not sufficient to prove that the bad characters of the women were known to a class of persons such as the police. The notoriety must be notoriety in the place or district where the public-house is situated.¹ The assembling proved here was not such assembling as was struck at in the licence. To bring the case under the prohibition it must be proved that thieves or prostitutes assembled there to carry on, or for the purposes of, their trade. It had been so held in England in interpreting words almost precisely similar.²

Argued for respondent;—The knowledge of the character of these women by the police, the appellant and his wife, was sufficient notoriety. The publican's personal knowledge is not required under his license. The object of the statute was simply to prevent public-houses being resorted to by bad characters, and the magistrate was justified in coming to the conclusion to which he did, looking at the number of women of bad fame found there on the 21st September.

LORD YOUNG.—I think this a bad conviction. I am of opinion—and I think that I am not now expressing it for the first time—that the mere bad character of the men and women going to a public-house for the purpose of refreshment is not enough to justify the conviction of the person who keeps that public-house of contravention of the clause of his certificate which forbids him to permit or suffer men or women of notoriously bad fame to assemble or meet in his house. The clause is substantially and almost literally in the same words as are used in the English statutes referred to in the English cases quoted to us, and the opinion which I held before, and which I adhere to now, is in accordance with the opinions of the Judges in these cases. It is that the assembling of such persons to the number of two or more together in a public-house for the mere purpose of refreshment is not sufficient. The assembling must appear to have reference to the bad character referred to. The evidence which justifies the magistrates in holding the people to be of bad character may be of various kinds, but to warrant a conviction of the publican the magistrate must be satisfied in fact that the assembling had reference to the bad character. The provision is one intended to prevent licensed public-houses being converted into places for prostitution, or places in which thieves may plan their designs. I think that on the evidence there was here nothing of that kind. It is quite possible to suspect that the women were persons of known bad character, but the evidence of it is confined to that of the police. They knew them, but it appears that the magistrate was not satisfied that the publican did. What he tells us is entirely against that supposition, for he says that the women were respectably dressed, conducted themselves properly while in the house, and were all the time under the eye of the publican and his assistants. All this the magistrate certifies, and also that all the publican did was to provide them with refreshments, as he was entitled to do, in my opinion, for the only alternative would be that a publican is bound to refuse refreshment to people of bad character. When the publican said, therefore, “I am advised that I am entitled to allow these people to refresh themselves at the bar,” that is the opinion he would have got from all the English Judges, and it is my opinion. Mr Robertson candidly admitted that they were entitled to refreshments, if that was all they went for. I think there is nothing in the case to shew that they went for anything more. I therefore am of opinion that the conviction is erroneous, and should be quashed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur with Lord Young in thinking that the conviction of the appellant cannot be sustained, but I differ from him as to the grounds of judgment. My view of the matter is that the magistrate, upon the facts set forth in the special case, was right in holding that the first charge had been proved, but that he was not right in holding that the second charge also had been established. From the facts found it appears (1) that on the first occasion libelled eight women, who were common prostitutes, were in the public-house of the appellant; (2) that there were men in the company of several of these women; (3) that on the second occasion there were three women, also common prostitutes, who were seen to enter, and soon after to leave, the appellant's premises ; (4) that these eight and these three women were known to the police as of notoriously bad fame ; (5) that the police were not aware that this notoriety extended beyond the police force ; (6) that, when challenged for admitting such women into his house, the appellant on the first occasion, and his wife on the second occasion, justified themselves, not upon the ground that the women were not women of bad fame, but upon the ground that even such women might be furnished with refreshments at the bar.

Two questions have been presented for our decision. The first question is, whether the facts found relative to notoriety were such as legally warranted the magistrate in coming to the conclusion that the women who were in the appellant's house on both occasions were women of notoriously bad fame? My opinion is that it did. There is no definition in the statute of the notoriety which is required, and women who are notorious to the police as women of bad fame appear to me to be women to whom that appellation may be applied. There is, however, more evidence on the subject than the evidence of the police, because the appellant and his wife must, I think, be held to have by implication admitted that the women were women of bad fame, which is of importance not merely with reference to the point of notoriety, but also with reference to the point of the appellant's knowledge of the character of the women whom he had permitted to assemble in his house.

The second question is whether, supposing the women to be women of notoriously bad fame, the appellant in permitting them to meet in his house contravened the conditions of his license? It is said, and I think truly said, that on neither occasion was there any immorality committed ; but it appears to me that this test is not decisive, for were it to be otherwise held there could be no contravention of the condition unless the publican allowed his house to be converted into a brothel. Something less than this appears to me to be all that is required.

Now, on the first occasion there were men with the women permitted to assemble, and it appears to me that, having the character of the women in view, the magistrate was entitled to consider whether he was not justified in holding that in going into the public-house the women accompanied by men were not in truth in the prosecution of their vocation. The public-house might be used by women as a means for the furtherance of the ultimate purpose which was in their contemplation.

These things being so, I am of opinion that the conviction upon the first charge was right, but I think that on the second charge there was no warrant for a conviction. The three women were unaccompanied by men, and as it was admitted in the argument for the respondents that a publican might furnish refreshment even to women of bad character without a contravention of the conditions of his license, there is, I think, nothing in the facts found upon which this conviction can be sustained.

Thinking that the judgment of the magistrate is in part erroneous, I concur in the view that it must be suspended. The conviction was a general conviction, and the fine was imposed in respect of the two alleged contraventions. We have no power to limit the conviction or to apportion the fine, and hence both must be suspended.

LORD ADAM.—This is a difficult case, and I confess that my opinion has more than once wavered during the argument, but it has ultimately come back to what it was at first. I think it is of the last importance that it should be clearly proved that the parties who assembled in the public-house were of notoriously bad character, not only known as such to a class of the community, but also to this extent, that the law will presume that the publican must have known that their character was such. I do not find anything in the case to shew that they were in this sense notoriously of bad character. All that is said is that the six women who were in the house on the 21st September were known to the police to be of notoriously bad character, and there was nothing in their appearance or conduct on the occasions libelled to lead to that inference. I am not satisfied, therefore, that it is proved that these women were so notoriously bad as to come under the description in the statute. On that ground I am of opinion that this conviction should be quashed.

Further, on the words "assemble and meet," I am of opinion that the mere fact of such persons being assembled in a public-house for refreshment is no ground for a conviction, but I concur with Lord Craighill that something less may be sufficient than that their meeting there should be proved to be for improper purposes. If it were the character of a public-house that women of bad fame resorted there as a rule, I think that might be enough to justify a conviction. I think that the mischief aimed at by the Legislature, and which they desired to prevent, was the making the house a house of call by such persons, and their meeting and assembling in it without any legitimate reason.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction, with expenses.

Suspension—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict., cap. 273), sections 131, 132—Relevancy—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., cap. 112), sec. 12—Libel.—The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 12, enacts that "where any person is convicted of an assault on any constable when in the execution of his duty such person shall be guilty of an offence under this Act."

In the Police Court of Glasgow the relevancy of a complaint charging an offence under section 12 was objected to, on the ground that it did not set forth knowledge on the part of the accused that the persons assaulted were constables in discharge of their duty. The magistrate repelled the objection, and the accused was convicted and sentenced.

In a suspension brought on the ground that no offence under the statute had been relevantly charged, and that the conviction and sentence being outwith the statute might be set aside by the High Court, held (1) that the complaint set forth a good charge in substance, and that the magistrate had jurisdiction to decide on the question of relevancy; and therefore (2) that the jurisdiction of the High Court was excluded by sections 131 and 132 of the Glasgow Police Act.

Opinions, that the objection to the relevancy of the complaint had been rightly repelled.

O'Brien v.
M'Phoa.

The case was tried before the magistrate officiating under the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, in the Northern Police Court of Glasgow, a Court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864.

When the case came on for hearing the agent for the accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, on the ground that it was not set forth therein that the accused knew at the time that the assault was alleged to have taken place that the persons assaulted were constables in the execution of their duty.

On 20th August the magistrate repelled the objection, "leaving it to be brought out in the course of the proof whether the accused must have known from the assaulted person's dress, and other circumstances, that he was an officer of police. The trial then proceeded, and O'Brien was convicted, the evidence shewing that the persons assaulted were police constables in plain clothes. A sentence of sixty days' imprisonment was pronounced.

By sec. 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, under which, along with the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the proceedings were taken, it is provided that appeals against the decisions of magistrates shall be taken within fourteen days from the date of the sentence, and shall be heard at the next Circuit Court to be held at Glasgow.*

The sentence was pronounced in this case on Friday, August 20th, and the next Circuit Court was opened on the following Monday, August 23d. As appeals are not heard at the Glasgow Christmas Circuit, the first Circuit Court available was that held in spring, more than seven months after the date of the offence. In these circumstances O'Brien and a number of other persons who had been tried in another Police Court and sentenced to six months' imprisonment presented notes of suspension and liberation to the High Court of Justiciary.

On 2d October, warrant for interim liberation, on caution being found, a penalty not exceeding £20, and in default of payment, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding six, or in case such person has been convicted of a similar assault within two years, nine months, with or without hard labour."

* Sec. 131 provides,—“No charge or complaint and no proceeding or trial before the magistrate, and no order or sentence of the magistrate thereon, or the extract thereof, shall be quashed or vacated for any misnomer or informality, or be subject to suspension, reduction, advocacy, or appeal, or to any other form of review or stay of execution, unless in manner and on some one or other of the grounds hereinafter mentioned.

Section 132 provides,—“Any person who feels aggrieved by any order or sentence of the magistrate may, within fourteen days after its date, appeal to the Court of Justiciary at the next Circuit Court to be held at Glasgow, in the manner and under the rules, limitations, and conditions contained in ‘The Heritable Jurisdiction Act (20 Geo. II. cap. 43),’ on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the magistrate, wilful deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments, incompetency or defect of jurisdiction, but on no other ground.”

was granted. On 29th October this note of suspension, along with the other similar, came on for hearing, the case of O'Brien being taken as a test case.

Argued for the suspender;—(1) On the competency of the note of suspension: The convenience of bringing these cases before the High Court was obvious, in view of the circumstance that the next Circuit Court would not be held till spring. There was nothing to prevent the High Court quashing this conviction, though the case should properly have gone before the Circuit Court, as it was a conviction of what was not really a crime at all.¹ The fact that a person assaulting a constable should know that he was a constable in the execution of his duty was of the essence of the crime, and, that knowledge not having been libelled, the accused had been convicted of a statutory offence which was not relevantly charged. If the prosecutor had charged an assault at common law the objection would not have held good, but he charged a statutory offence, and had not done so relevantly. This distinguished the case from that of Mackenzie v. Lang.² In this case the magistrate had done what was absolutely null and void, though he had jurisdiction to try the case if it had been relevantly stated. (2) On the relevancy of the libel: Knowledge that the assaulted were constables in the execution of their duty was of the essence of the crime, and must therefore be averred in the libel. Where assault, with the aggravation of being against a police constable in the execution of his duty, was charged at common law, it had been held that knowledge of that fact on the part of the panel must be alleged in the minor proposition.³ In the English Courts, in convictions under various statutes, such as continuing in charge of a vessel in a certain estuary after a licensed pilot had offered his services, the principle here contended for had been laid down.⁴ This case was not one to be libelled under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, as all the sections of that Act, other than sec. 12, were directed against the criminal classes, and that section, evidently, was not meant to provide for ordinary street disturbances. There was, further, no specification of the duty that was being performed by the person assaulted.

Argued for respondent;—(1) On the competency: The case was ruled by that of Mackenzie v. Lang (supra). The magistrate had jurisdiction to try this offence, and the terms of the Glasgow Police Act clearly excluded review in the High Court. (2) On the relevancy: The objection as to specification of the duty in which the assaulted persons were employed was not stated in the inferior Court. If it had been, an adjournment would have been granted under the Summary Procedure Act, and the want remedied. As to the objection that knowledge on the part of the accused was not libelled, the case quoted by the appellant, Lord Advocate v. Alexander, was one in which the Court was equally divided, and its authority had been doubted. The Court had since refused to apply the principle here contended for. In libelling a statutory offence the prosecutor was not bound to put in words which were not in the statute, and here the statute said nothing about knowledge on the part of the accused.

The judgment of the Court was pronounced by because although they have been liberated in the meantime, they are now at the bar of the Court, and substantially in custody—is at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Police Court of Glasgow, and charges them with assaulting certain constables while in the discharge of their duty. An objection was taken in this particular case, which we have heard as presenting the matter in the most favourable light for all parties to the charge, on the ground that while it accused the prisoner of assaulting the police constables in the discharge of their duty, it did not aver that he was aware that they were in discharge of their duty, and did not specify the particular duty in which they were engaged. That objection the magistrate who tried the case disallowed, and the trial proceeded. The accused party was convicted and sentenced to be imprisoned for sixty days, while the other accused parties were sentenced to imprisonment for six months. The judgment of the magistrates convicting the accused and sentencing them individually is brought here by suspension and liberation, and the accused—the suspenders—have obtained liberation in the meantime; and we are now to say whether the grounds of objection to the conviction and sentence under which the parties are suffering were or were not well founded. I have noticed in the course of the argument that the trial proceeded in the Police Court of Glasgow, which has jurisdiction by the 29th and 30th Vict. c. 273, and that by the provisions of the statute no sentence of the magistrate officiating in that Court can be quashed for any misnomer or informality, or be subject to suspension and reduction, or to any other form of review or stay of execution, except in the mode or manner and upon one or more of the grounds mentioned. The mode and manner are by appeal to the next Circuit Court of Justiciary in Glasgow, and the grounds upon which any such plea may be taken are corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the magistrate, wilful deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments, incompetency, or defect of jurisdiction, but on no other ground can the decision be reviewed. The result, therefore, is, that so far as this was a conviction and sentence of a magistrate sitting in the Police Court of Glasgow, it is not subject to any form of review whatsoever, unless by appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary in Glasgow, and it can only be upon the grounds of corruption, malice, or oppression, incompetency, or want of jurisdiction on the part of the magistrate. But it was said, that although that be so prima facie, nevertheless it appeared, looking at the complaint on which the conviction and sentence proceeded, and the conviction and sentence themselves, conviction and sentence or punishment proceeded upon what was really no offence at all, or at least there was no conviction of anything but an assault, punishable at the utmost with sixty days' imprisonment—the feature that the assault was upon officers of law in the execution of their duty not being so stated as to amount to an offence of the nature for which punishment had been awarded; that, therefore, so far as the sentence of six months' imprisonment was pronounced, it was apparently, upon the face of the proceedings, for an offence not charged—that is to say, not well charged—and there was and could be no good conviction; and that that being the true legal view of the case, there is no protection to be derived from the finality clauses in the Police Act to which I have referred, but that the sentence might be quashed as in truth a lawless proceeding on the part of the magistrate, and quashed in this Court, as what is truly a lawless proceeding before any magistrate or tribunal undoubtedly could be.

It is the opinion of the Court that there was here a good charge in substance.

O'Brien v.
M'Phee.

I say so without reference to any criticism upon the language of the complaint in which the charge was set out. There was a good charge in substance at the instance of a prosecutor having a title to prosecute—that is to say, a good charge in substance with a good instance, brought regularly before a Court competent to convict, and that Court the Police Court of Glasgow; and the magistrate in the Police Court, when the case was brought before him, having jurisdiction to deal with the charge, was entitled and bound to deal with it according to his judgment. An objection was taken to the relevancy, and, in my opinion, and, I think, in the opinion of the Court, that objection was not well founded. The magistrate had jurisdiction to decide upon the objection so taken; and if the magistrate committed an error—which I am inclined to think the magistrate did not—the remedy was, not by appeal to this Court, or by suspension in this Court, but by appeal to the Circuit Court in Glasgow. That appeal was not taken; and the time may now have gone by, which, if there was any substantial grievance to complain of, would be a misfortune we should all regret.

But although our opinion is that this Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the suspension in respect of the judgment which we are asked to review, it was a judgment of the Police Court having jurisdiction in the subject-matter of the complaint submitted to it, and is protected against review by this Court—we think it right to indicate, as indeed I have already indicated, that if we had jurisdiction we should have concurred in the view of the magistrate that there was no substantial objection to this complaint. That decision is without any prejudice to the necessity of the prosecutor establishing—the accused party being at liberty, on the other hand to establish—what was the true state of the fact, or the reasonable inference to be drawn as to the knowledge of the party who committed the assault of the condition and the proceedings at the time of the persons whom he assaulted. Prima facie the prosecutor could prove no more than that the constables were engaged in the discharge of their duty. Their duty might be of various kinds, looking to this case as it is presented to us by the suspenders. The duty apparently was in repressing what was regarded by the magistrates as a proceeding—a demonstration by a large number of people—which was dangerous to the public peace. The prosecutor could prove no more, prima facie, than that the police constables were there, and were there not as volunteers, but really according to their duty, and were engaged according to their duty, and that the accused parties assaulted them. It was open for the accused to shew by positive evidence, or that the probability from the whole facts and circumstances disclosed was, that although the persons to whom they offered and used violence were in truth police constables in the execution of their duty, they had no suspicion of that, and that therefore they ought not to be visited by punishment as if they had known. All this, we think, was entirely open to the accused parties, but we think that this Police Court complaint was a good and unobjectionable charge—that they assaulted these constables at the time and place specified when they were engaged in the execution of their duty. We indicate this as our opinion, not as assuming jurisdiction which, on the grounds I have indicated, the statute does not give, but as it may be satisfactory to the parties to know that they have not lost, by the accident of referring the matter to the wrong tribunal, any advantage or benefit they would have been likely to obtain at the proper tribunal. I do not think it necessary for us to enter either upon the case of Mackenzie v. Lang or on the case of Marr v. M'Arthur. They were stated to be in contrast. I do not think so. The case of Marr v. M'Arthur was a case in which, rightly or wrongly—and I assume rightly, for it is not hujus loci to inquire,—the Court were of opinion that the thing charged was no offence at all. It had not the aspect of an offence. It was as if a man had been taken up and tried and sentenced to imprisonment for whistling in the street, or walking at the rate of five miles an hour on the street, or doing anything that appeared to be perfectly innocent. The Court thought there was no offence set out, and that upon ground altogether distinct from criticism of a libel for murder or robbery or assault. Criticisms upon the style of a charge, or the omission of particulars which ought to have been given, are totally different from a case where there was no charge at all. Again, rightly or wrongly—for into that we have no occasion to inquire here,—the Court in the case of Marr v. M'Arthur were of opinion that there was no charge presented to the magistrates at all. It was not a case of objection to the relevancy of the indictment. They said there was no offence at all, and the Court determined that it had jurisdiction to set aside a sentence for what, in their judgment, was no offence by common or statute law at all. Here the most that could be made of the case was a criticism upon the mode of libelling a substantial charge—that of assaulting constables in the execution of their duty. The libel may be more or less subject to criticism, but that there is a substantial charge—a charge of a crime more or less serious—nobody doubts; it was criticism upon the libel and the mode of libelling. Therefore the case of Marr does not interfere with the present case, and the conclusion at which we have arrived makes no reflection on the case of Marr v. M'Arthur. That conclusion is that we have under the statute regulating this matter no jurisdiction to entertain this suspension; but feeling it proper for the satisfaction of parties to indicate the opinions which we entertain, we are of opinion that if we had had jurisdiction we should not have been favourable to the objection which had been stated against this conviction and sentence. It was a sharp sentence, in this sense, that it went to the extreme penalty that was allowed, but we have no reason to form or express any opinion—and certainly formed and expressed none—that the sentence was at all severe; but, at all events, we have no jurisdiction to interfere with that. The result is that this suspension—and all the others, we were told, must follow this one—must be dismissed.

THE COURT refused the note of suspension.

Indictment—Competency of striking out words from an indictment.—Held that the Court has power at a pleading diet to allow words to be struck out of an indictment if the alteration does not vary the crime with which the panel is charged.

Relevancy—Bad treatment of child—Leaving child in charge of young girl.—A panel was charged with "culpable and wilful neglect and bad treatment of a child of tender age, by a person who has the custody and keeping of it, whereby such child is injured in its health." The minor proposition set forth that the panel "did culpably and wilfully neglect to supply the said child with wholesome and sufficient food and clothing, and did feed her with improper and dele-

HIGH COURT.

BARBARA GRAY or M'INTOSH was, on 31st January 1881, charged in the High Court of Justiciary with "culpable homicide; as also the culpable and wilful neglect and bad treatment of a child of tender age, by a person who has the custody or keeping of it, whereby such child is injured in its health," in so far as (1) a woman named and designated, having, on or about the 8th day of August 1876, been delivered of an illegitimate female child, in the Royal Maternity Hospital, Edinburgh, "you, the said Barbara Gray or M'Intosh having, on or about the 10th day of August 1876, or within a few days thereafter, at the said Royal Maternity Hospital, agreed to nurse and upbring the said child, in consideration of the sum of £22 sterling or thereby, which was then and there paid to you, to enable you to do so in a proper and sufficient manner, and having, time and place last above libelled, received the said child, and thus become her custodier and guardian, and it being your duty accordingly to maintain, upbringing, and keep the said child in a proper, sufficient, and careful manner, and the said child being in a sound state of health when so received by you; you, the said Barbara Gray or M'Intosh, did, in breach of your duty as custodier and guardian aforesaid, in or near the house or premises at or near Firth, in the parish of Lasswade, and county of Mid-Lothian, in which you then resided, or at some other place or places to the prosecutor unknown, during the whole of the period from on or about the 10th day of August 1876 to the 29th day of November 1876, or part thereof, culpably and wilfully neglect to supply the said child with wholesome and sufficient food and clothing, and did feed her with improper and deleterious food, and keep, or allow her to be kept, in a dirty and damp condition, and expose her, or allow her to be exposed, to cold, and otherwise fail to give her such care and attention as were necessary to preserve the health of a child of such tender age; by all which, or part thereof, the said child was seriously injured in her health, and her constitution and vital powers were gradually destroyed; and in consequence thereof the said child, while being taken by you, on or about the 29th day of November 1876, from Firth, aforesaid, to Edinburgh, died in the train or other conveyance by which you made the journey, or elsewhere to the prosecutor unknown, from exhaustion, or other cause or causes, produced by your culpable and wilful neglect and bad treatment aforesaid, and was thus culpably killed by you, the said Barbara Gray or M'Intosh."

Then followed (2) and (3) charges relating to the death of two other children, and (4) a charge relating to the culpable neglect of a male illegitimate child, "whereby the said child was injured in his health, and his constitution and vital powers were gradually impaired." This charge then proceeded:—"Further, on or about the 30th day of July 1880, you, the said Barbara Gray or M'Intosh, being conscious of the condition to which the said child last above libelled had been reduced by your said culpable and wilful neglect and bad treatment, and anxious to avert suspicion from yourself, or otherwise being desirous to free yourself of the custody of the said child, did, culpably and wilfully, and in breach of your duty aforesaid, take the said child to the house or premises in or near Nottingham Place, Edinburgh, then, and now or lately, occupied by John Spears, labourer, residing there, and deliver it to and leave it with Mary Kerr Spears, . . . a girl of fifteen years, or thereby, of age, who from her age and means was not qualified or able, and who did not undertake, to keep it, on the false pretence that her mother, the said Isabella Ross or Spears or Mitchelhill, had agreed to nurse the said child for you, and did culpably and wilfully neglect to furnish the said Mary Kerr Spears with money wherewith to support the said child, and with proper and necessary clothing for him; and in order to prevent the said Mary Kerr Spears from bringing the child back to you, did conceal from her, or fail to give her, your name and address, through which culpable and wilful neglect on your part last libelled the said child, although he received as much attention and care as the said Mary Kerr Spears was able to give him, was, during the time it remained with her in the said house or premises in Nottingham Place, viz, from on or about the 30th day of July to the 4th day of August 1880, both days inclusive, further injured in his health from want of proper and necessary treatment, food, and clothing; and the said child having been removed to the poorhouse of the parish of South Leith, on or about the 4th day of August 1880, died there, on or about the 6th day of August 1880, from general debility or other cause or causes induced by your culpable and wilful neglect and bad treatment of him, all as set forth in the present charge, and was thus culpably killed by you, the said Barbara Gray or M'Intosh."

Her Majesty's
M'Intosh.

At a pleading diet, counsel for the panel took the following objections to the relevancy of the libel:—(1) The words "bad treatment" in the major proposition were ambiguous, and did not constitute a relevant charge. In all previous cases in which such a crime had been libelled such words as "cruel, barbarous, and unnatural," had been used.¹ The word "bad" might mean merely injudicious. (2) The words "culpably and wilfully neglect to supply the child with wholesome and sufficient food and clothing, and did feed her with improper and deleterious food," in the minor proposition of the first three charges were not sufficient to support the major. The words were ambiguous, and the charge of administering "improper" food could be read in a sense other than a relevant one. It was necessary that it should be stated what the improper food administered was, in order that the panel might meet the case. Further, it was not stated that the cold to which the child was exposed was excessive, or that such exposure was habitual.² (3) The minor of the fourth charge was similar to a charge of exposure, but it was not said that the child was left in a deserted place. There was some one to whose care the child was given, and to make the charge relevant the child must have been left alone. It could not be said that the desertion put the child in danger of its life.³

The Court required the counsel for the Crown to speak to the second objection.

Argued for the Crown;—It had never been required of the Crown to state in an indictment of this nature what was the improper food alleged to have been administered.⁴ To do so would be to overload the indictment. The words "and did feed the said child with improper and deleterious food" were superfluous, being merely the complement of the preceding words. The prosecutor was willing to strike them out, and the charge would not be varied by their deletion.

Answered for the panel;—The words could only be struck out at this stage with consent of the accused.⁵

Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
M'Intosh.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have considered the objections, which were ably stated, to this indictment. I think that only one is of serious moment. The others I think go more to the mere phraseology of the indictment than to its substance. The question whether the words "wholesome and sufficient food and clothing" are altogether accurate is merely a matter of phraseology. The meaning is clear, and that is, did the prisoner wilfully neglect to provide wholesome food and sufficient clothing? And though a syntactical objection may be made to that expression it is not an objection of any substance. An objection was also taken to the rest of that paragraph, or rather sentence, to the effect that while the charge made is neglect to supply a child with wholesome and sufficient food and clothing, what is really alleged is that the food supplied (for some food was supplied) was improper and deleterious, and it was said that these words contained a specific charge of administering some unwholesome and deleterious substances as food, and that the panel was entitled to know what those substances were. My impression is, that as the indictment stands it is relevant, though there is a good deal of force and substance in the objection. The meaning of the words as they stand is not that what was given was improper and deleterious in itself, but the words are merely the complement of the gravamen of the charge—the neglect to supply wholesome and sufficient food and clothing. The child had some food given to it, and what the prosecutor intends to charge is not the giving of anything deleterious in itself, but that that which was given was not proper and wholesome in the circumstances. I should hesitate to say that this necessarily means a specific charge of administering anything improper. At the same time I must fairly own that I should have much preferred that the words should not have been in the indictment. They add nothing to the strength or substance of the charge. The Advocate-Depute proposed to strike out the words objected to; and I am disposed, if he makes that motion, to allow them to be struck out, and that having been done, to sustain the relevancy. As to the matter of practice raised by the counsel for the prisoner, I have looked into the authorities, and I think it clear that the Court has power to allow words to be struck out of an indictment if the alteration does not vary the crime with which the panel is charged. There was a difficulty, no doubt, in former days, when the alteration took place at the same diet at which the trial was to proceed, and it might be said to be hardly fair to expect a prisoner who was to be tried at the same diet at which the alteration was made to make up his mind on the alteration. But it is quite different in the present altered circumstances, and that view certainly does not apply where, as in the present case, the proposal to make the alteration is made in a pleading diet. I think I may fairly say, looking to the authorities, that the law on this matter is well fixed, and although there are obiter dicta to the contrary effect, I am of opinion that the Court has power to allow the words to be struck out.

The Advocate-Depute moved the Court to strike out from each of the three first charges the words "and did feed the child with improper and deleterious food."

THE COURT thereupon allowed the words to be struck out, and found the indictment relevant.

Riddell v.

Stevenson, &c.

Error in date of minute recording sentence and in warrant of imprisonment.

—In a suspension the suspender averred that he was tried before a Sheriff and sentenced to imprisonment on 24th November 1880; that the minute of the Court in which the sentence was recorded was by mistake dated 23d November 1880, and was only corrected after the suspender had been removed from the bar. It was also alleged by the suspender, and not denied by the respondent, that the extract of conviction which formed the warrant of imprisonment bore the erroneous date 23d November 1880. The Court (diss. Lord Young) suspended the sentence.

ON 24th November 1880 sentence of six months' imprisonment was pronounced by the Sheriff of Roxburgh (Pattison), under a criminal libel for perjury at the instance of the respondents, James and James Charles Stevenson, procurators-fiscal for Roxburghshire, against Robert Riddell.

HIGH COURT.

Lord Justice-

Clerk.

Lord Young.

Ld. Craighill.

Justiciary

Clerk.

Riddell brought a note of suspension of this sentence and liberation before the High Court of Justiciary on, inter alia, the grounds (1) that the extract of conviction was null and void, being dated the day before — the trial was held; (2) that a corresponding error in the record of the proceedings had been corrected ex intervallo subsequent to the removal of the panel from the bar.

From the statements in the note of suspension and from admissions at the bar it appeared that the facts were as follows:—At the first diet, held at Jedburgh on Monday 15th November, the libel was found relevant. The second diet was held on Wednesday, November 24th, when the trial proceeded before the Sheriff and a jury. After evidence was heard the jury returned a unanimous verdict of “guilty of the crime of perjury.”

The verdict having been recorded, the Sheriff pronounced sentence of imprisonment for six months.

The suspender averred,—“In virtue of the said sentence the complainer was forthwith imprisoned in the prison of Jedburgh, and was thereafter transferred to the General Prison at Perth, where he still remains. The record of the proceedings and the extract of conviction both bear date November 23d 1880 as the date when the said sentence was pronounced.”

Counsel for the suspender stated that the record of the sentence had been altered by changing the date from the 23d to the 24th, and that the alteration had been made after the prisoner was removed from the bar. Counsel for the respondents stated that they were not aware when the alteration was made.

Argued for the suspender;—The fact that the record and the extract of conviction bore a wrong date vitiated the said sentence.¹

Argued for respondents;—It was not proved that the alteration was made subsequent to the removal of the prisoner. The prisoner had not suffered any injury by the mistake, and could not do so.²

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The appellant was tried in the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh at Jedburgh on the 24th November 1880, and convicted by a jury of the crime of perjury. The sentence passed upon him subjected him, amongst other things, to six months' imprisonment. The regularity and legality of this sentence have been submitted for the decision of the High Court by the present bill of suspension and liberation. There are four grounds upon which the com-plainer submits that the sentence should be quashed ; but with reference to the three first, as the argument has not been exhausted, I do not feel called upon to express any opinion. Moreover, as I am of opinion that the fourth ground of suspension must be sustained, it is not necessary that the others should be dealt with. The ground of suspension last mentioned is to the effect that the record of the proceedings and the extract of the conviction both bear date 23d November 1880, whereas the true date was the 24th of that month. The facts have not been exactly ascertained, but they are, I think, in such a situation as not only entitles us, but calls upon us, to give judgment. The suspender alleges that the extract of the sentence, which is now in the hands of the keeper of the prison at Perth, bears date the 23d November. This is not denied, nor is it admitted, by the prosecutor. He must, however, know the reality, and at any rate, as he does not ask that judgment should be delayed till a proof be led upon the subject I think we must proceed upon the assumption that the fact is as the appellant has averred. This being so, can the warrant upon which the appellant was incarcerated, and is now kept in prison, be sustained as a good warrant? The difference betwixt the erroneous date set forth in the warrant and the true date of the sentence is only a day, but it might have been a week or a month, and the question would have been the same in the one case as in the other. The date of a sentence or a warrant is an essential particular, because it affects the measure of the punishment. In the present case the appellant, in consequence of the error in the date, would have suffered one day's imprisonment less than if the warrant had been truly dated ; but the error might have been in the other direction, and, had it been so, the length of his imprisonment would have been increased. Even if the warrant had been granted in a merely civil proceeding I think the course of diligence upon it might have been suspended. Poidings have again and again been found to be illegal in consequence of such an error as that by which the warrant in question is vitiated. Upon this ground alone I am of opinion that the sentence complained of ought to be suspended.

The second part of this ground of suspension is that the record of the proceedings before the Sheriff was erroneous at the beginning, and had been altered and vitiated by changing the date from 23d to 24th November 1880 since the date of the appellant's trial. Here, again, the facts have not been satisfactorily ascertained, but, as before, the prosecutor does not deny, though he does not admit, that the date on the record has been changed since the proceedings terminated. The importance of this objection on the present occasion is comparatively small, because the error in the warrant upon which the appellant was imprisoned and is kept in prison is of itself sufficient, in my opinion, to obtain his liberation. I may say, however, that even if the warrant delivered to the keeper of the jail had been accurate in point of date, yet I would have been disposed to hold that the original error and the unauthorised change upon the record would have invalidated the sentence. The record is the only authentic evidence of what was done, and if it be erroneous, or if it has been altered unauthorisedly after proceedings have terminated, there is nothing trustworthy upon which the warrant can be supported. I think it of the utmost importance that we should discountenance irregularity in the records of a criminal, or indeed of any, Court ; and I think we should not do so were we in the circumstances of this case to repel this ground of suspension, and to sustain the sentence upon which the appellant has been imprisoned.

LORD YOUNG.—I confine my observations to the objection on which Lord Craighill proposes, I understand with your Lordship's concurrence, to rest the judgment. That objection is, that whereas the trial and conviction in fact took place on 24th November the sentence bears date 23d November. It is not doubtful, being admitted and indeed averred by both parties, that the suspender was tried, convicted, and sentenced on 24th November, and the objection rests on this, that an inspection of the minutes of procedure shews that in noting the date of the sederunt of the Court the clerk had erroneously written twenty-third, and corrected the error by striking out the confessedly wrong word "third," and substituting for it the confessedly right one "fourth." Neither party could inform us when the correction was made, and there is no averment on the subject in the note of suspension. The suspender's counsel, however, said that he desired an opportunity of proving, if he could, that it was made after the trial, and outwith the prisoner's presence, and also, although the state of the fact was unknown to him, that the extract or certificate of the conviction sent to the jailor bears date 23d November.

In Roxburghshire the minutes of procedure in each case seem to be written separately and appended to the criminal letters. In this Court, and in Sheriff Courts where there is a considerable amount of business, so that several cases are tried on the same day, the minutes are written in a book—each day's sederunt being entered and dated, and then, without any further dating, the cases tried being minuted consecutively in the order of trial. The first proposition we have to consider is that a corrected error in the date of the sederunt—the error and the correction of it being manifest on the face of the writing—will vitiate the whole procedure of the day, and entitle all the prisoners who have on that day and in the course of that sederunt been convicted and sentenced in open Court to be set at liberty. I cannot assent to that proposition, and even go the length of saying that I think it extravagant. The second proposition is, that there ought in the case of such apparent correction (although of an admitted error) to be an inquiry as to when the correction was made, and those prisoners set at liberty whose trials happened to be over before that, the fate of each depending on the result of the inquiry—whether it shewed that the correction was made before or after his removal from the dock. I must reject this proposition also as, in my opinion, quite untenable.

The minutes of procedure of a Court of criminal justice may be, and frequently are, corrected by striking out words and sentences, and writing in others, and being a record written by a public officer of proceedings in an open Court there is no presumption or room for suspicion of impropriety. No impropriety in this department has, so far as I remember, occurred in my time, although I do not doubt that if it ever should occur a remedy would be afforded to anyone thereby prejudiced. The minute-books of the Circuit Courts are full of large and important corrections, quite patent on the face of them. Nor is there, as in the case of probative deeds, any record of the corrections made. Now, what, I should like to know, would a Judge on Circuit or in this High Court say to the Clerk of Court who told him that he had omitted to write in the date of the sederunt of that day or of the day before, or had written 23d by mistake for 24th? I can only say that I should tell him to write it if omitted, or correct it if erroneous, and should be much surprised by a suggestion that the prisoners had all been improperly convicted, and were legally entitled to be set at liberty if the truth were known or should be discovered. If I held such an opinion I

Riddell v.
Stevenson, &c.

No. 6. should not of course sanction the correction, but humbly advise the proper authority to liberate the prisoners according to their legal right.

Feb. 8, 1881.

Riddell v. Stevenson, &c. I am of opinion that the correction here was properly made, on the instant if instantly detected, or otherwise so soon as it was discovered, and affords no ground whatever for setting the prisoner at liberty. I should indeed authorise the correction even had it not been already made—as merely bringing the minute of the fact into conformity with the fact as admitted by both parties, and that without prejudice to any interest whatever.

But reliance was placed on the suggestion—for it is no more—that the certificate of the conviction in the jailor's hands may bear that it took place on 23d November. The proposition here is that a lawful conviction and sentence will be invalidated by an error in the date of the clerk's certificate of it sent to the jailor with the prisoner. I should have thought that on an error being discovered in such certificate (whether in the date or anything else) the proper course was to correct the error, or make out a new certificate, and the notion that the conviction and sentence were thereby vitiated would not have occurred to me. The conviction takes place in open Court, and the sentence is there publicly pronounced; and it seems strange that this solemn public procedure should be destroyed, beyond remedy, by an error—it may be, as here, a mere clerical error in the clerk's certificate of it to the jailor. Would this consequence follow an omission to send any certificate at all? or might the omission be remedied on being discovered by making out and sending one? I can attach no importance whatever to the suggested possible error in the certificate. It is in the jailor's hands, and if the error alleged shall be found to exist in it it will be the jailor's duty to take or send it to the clerk for correction, just as it would have been had it erroneously borne a longer or shorter period of imprisonment than was imposed by the actual sentence. The clerk's certificate is not the conviction or the sentence, and it is, to my mind, a very startling proposition indeed that an error in it is incurable and a ground for quashing the conviction. The most serious case is of course that of a capital conviction and sentence, the certificate of which is in fact the warrant given out for the execution of the sentence. If made out erroneously in any particular, it may, I should think, of course, be corrected, or a new one substituted, and the idea that an error in it would annul the conviction is, I am clearly of opinion, altogether groundless. The same considerations are, I apprehend, applicable to civil procedure. An error in the extract or certificate of decree will not affect the decree as pronounced by the Court, and may be corrected, or a new and proper extract or certificate given out.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have only a vote in this Court where there is an equal division of opinion on the bench, and having heard the very different and conflicting views advanced by your Lordships I have some difficulty in coming to a decision on this point.

The question is one of some consequence, nicety, and difficulty. The first matter to decide is, on what state of facts are we asked for our opinion and judgment, and in that matter we are somewhat in the dark. This man was undoubtedly tried on 24th November for the serious crime of perjury, and it is allowed that the only record of the sentence which was passed on him does not bear that date. It is admitted on the part of the prosecutor that the minute did not bear that date when it was first written out, and further that the warrant for imprisonment bore date the 23d, not the 24th. I understand that these facts are admitted by the prosecutor, and that it is not denied that the alteration of the date on the record was made ex intervallo. I assume that; but if it is disputed I shall not give any judgment until every inquiry has been made. If that is the fact, I cannot think that the alteration is a matter of indifference. I think that more injustice would be done by giving any encouragement to laxity in criminal proceedings, as the prosecutor asks us to do here, than by granting this suspension. It may be that, as Mr Rutherford argued, the prisoner in this case suffered no injustice by the error, but we are here dealing with criminal proceedings and a criminal sentence, where accuracy is absolutely essential. Lord Young has said that the record bears to be dated on the 24th, but on looking at it we find that it has been altered since the original manuscript was made, and it is admitted that that alteration was not made till after the prisoner left the bar. I am of opinion that the sentence is thereby vitiated; and I am prepared to give effect to that opinion by sustaining the suspension. It may happen here that the carelessness of an official has frustrated the object of justice; but I think that more good will be done by giving effect to the objection, and not allowing slovenly proceedings in Criminal Courts, than by repelling it.

Crime—Perjury—Competency of trying two or more panels on the same indictment—Relevancy—Separation of trials—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Administration of justice.—In a suspension of a conviction for perjury before a Sheriff and jury, held (1) that it was competent to charge two or more panels on the same indictment with perjury, where the alleged perjury related to the same matter, and was committed to compass the same defeat of justice; (2) that a motion for separation of trials must be supported by special grounds other than that the charge was one of perjury; (3) that where an indictment charged, in the major proposition, conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice by means of perjury, as also perjury, it was not necessary, where the facts inferring perjury were sufficiently set forth in connection with the conspiracy, that the minor should set forth a separate species facti applicable to the charge of perjury apart from conspiracy; (4) that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to try a charge of perjury though he could not pronounce the declaration of infamy which is generally in use to be included in the sentence of the High Court by virtue of the Act 1555, c. 47; and (5) that a person acting as Sheriff-substitute ad interim was not bound to produce evidence of his authority.

Question, whether the declaration of infamy, generally included in the sentences for perjury, of the High Court, should not now be discontinued in the majority of cases.

JOHN MARR, James Begbie, and Patrick Hoare were charged, before the Sheriff of Midlothian and a jury at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court with the crimes of "conspiring to defeat or obstruct the administration of justice and to secure the acquittal of a person charged with a criminal offence by means of perjury; as also perjury."

William Bain, carter and contractor, Edinburgh, having been charged on a criminal complaint before the Sheriff of Midlothian for resetting certain cart harness stolen from William Paterson, builder, Edinburgh "and the said John Marr having been duly cited to appear at the said trial as a witness for the prosecution, the said John Marr, James Begbie, and Patrick Hoare all and each or one or more of them, did, in concert with the said William Bain, or by themselves, at some time or times between the 28th day of July and 5th day of August 1880, . . . and at some place or places in the city or county of Edinburgh to the complainer unknown, form a wicked and felonious conspiracy to defeat or obstruct the administration of justice at the trial of the said William Bain, and to secure his acquittal from the said charge of reset of theft, and did, in pursuance of said wicked and felonious conspiracy, arrange that the said James Begbie and Patrick Hoare should be adduced as witnesses in exculpation of the said William Bain at his trial, and that they, and the said John Marr, when examined as a witness for the prosecution at the trial of the said William Bain, should swear that the harness, consisting of a horse collar a pair of hames, a cart saddle, a bretchin, and a horse bridle, which the said William Bain was accused of resetting, knowing the same to have been stolen, or part thereof, was a set or part of a set of harness which had been purchased by the said John Marr at a sale by auction at the premises of Scott, Croall, & Sons, job and postmasters, at or near Castle Terrace, Edinburgh, on or about the 18th day of February 1880, and afterwards sold or handed over by the said John Marr to the said William Bain, the said John Marr, James Begbie, and Patrick Hoare, all and each, or one or more of them, well knowing that the said harness which the said William Bain was charged with resetting, or any part thereof, was not the set or any part of the set of harness purchased at Scott, Croall, & Sons' said sale by the said John Marr, and afterwards handed over or sold by him to the said William Bain."

There was further set forth how at the trial of the said William Bain, which took place on 4th August 1880 "before Francis Gebbie, Esquire, advocate, then acting Sheriff-substitute of Midlothian and Judge officiating in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh," the said John Marr having been adduced as a witness for the prosecution did, "in pursuance of the said wicked and felonious conspiracy, then and there, wickedly and feloniously, wilfully and falsely, swear and depone, contrary to the truth, and to what he well knew to be the truth, that the said horse collar, cart saddle, and bretchin, then produced in Court, and put in evidence as aforesaid, were parts of a set of harness which had been purchased by him, the said John Marr, at a sale at Scott, Croall, & Sons, about the month of February 1880 (meaning thereby the said sale by auction at the said Scott, Croall, & Sons' premises aforesaid on or about 18th February 1880) and afterwards sold by him, about the said month of February, to the said William Bain; whereas the truth is, and it will be proved, that the statements so sworn to by the said John Marr were false, and were known by him to be false at the time of his swearing and deponing thereto, inasmuch as the truth is, and the said John Marr well knew, that the said horse collar, cart saddle, and bretchin produced in Court, and put in evidence at the trial of the said William Bain as aforesaid, were not parts of the set of harness purchased by him, the said John Marr at the said sale at Scott, Croall, and Sons' premises before mentioned, and afterwards sold or handed over by him to the said William Bain."

There followed a similar detail of the evidence given by James Begbie and Patrick Hoare respectively when adduced as witnesses in exculpation at the said trial, and of the circumstances wherein it was alleged to be false.

There was no part of the minor premiss specially applicable to the separate charge of perjury unaccompanied by conspiracy contained in the major.

The jury found the panels "not guilty of conspiracy, but guilty of perjury as libelled." And in respect of this verdict the Sheriff sentenced Marr and Begbie to ten months' and Hoare to seven months' imprisonment.

The prisoners brought a suspension of this sentence on the following grounds—(1) That it was not competent to indict two or more panels for perjury in the same criminal libel, and that the charge of conspiracy had been groundlessly and oppressively introduced into the indictment to enable the procurator-fiscal to include all the panels in the same libel and merely to give himself a foundation for objecting to the separation of their trials, no evidence of conspiracy having been led.¹ (2) Oppression, in respect that a motion for separation of trials had been refused.² (3) That the Sheriff had no jurisdiction to try the complainers for the crime of perjury, and, in particular, could not competently pronounce the sentence which the law awarded for the crime of perjury.³ (4) That the libel was irrelevant except as a charge of conspiracy, there being no minor applicable to the major proposition of perjury, and that the verdict was either a verdict of acquittal, or void from uncertainty, or a null verdict in respect that it negatived the only charge of perjury made in the minor premiss of the indictment. (5) That the appointment of Francis Gebbie as Sheriff-substitute of Midlothian, before whom the alleged perjury had been committed, and who was a material witness for the prosecution, had not been competently proved, the Sheriff having accepted his own parole evidence and refused production of the books of Court; and (6) That the said Francis Gebbie did, in fact, hold no valid commission in terms of the statutes regulating the office of Sheriff-substitute, in respect he did not hold the requisite certificate in terms of 6 Geo. IV. c. 23, sec. 9, at the date of the said trial 4th August 1880, he not being a regular Sheriff-substitute, but merely a locum tenens appointed ad interim during the pleasure of the Sheriff of Midlothian.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Some of the points raised by the suspenders are fairly subject to controversy, but I am quite satisfied that the grounds on which the exceptions have been taken are none of them well founded.

The first question of importance is, whether three panels can competently be combined in an indictment such as we have here? That indictment contains two major propositions—the one a charge of conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice by means of perjury, the other a simple charge of perjury itself. (1)

The question therefore substantially is, whether it is competent to charge in the same indictment three persons on the same charge of conspiracy, and whether, if no conspiracy is brought home to them, it is competent to charge them in the same indictment with perjury? As to the first, there can be no difficulty. By its very nature conspiracy is a joint offence, and can only be committed by two or more persons in concert. And no averment that each is dependent on the evidence of the others will warrant the separation of their trials. Such a motion is never allowed, except in a very special case. (X.)

But then it is said that perjury by itself would not have entitled the procuratorfiscal to place these three men at the bar on the same charge. But it being our constant practice, when there are three persons who have committed one offence, though they may have had separate parts in the commission of that offence, to try them together on the same libel, I see no reason why the same course should not be followed in the present case, whether there was conspiracy or not—the perjury, if committed, was committed on one and the same trial, and necessarily for the purpose of defeating the ends of justice, and was all about one and the same matter. For aught we know the case to which we were referred in Strange's Reports—Rex v. Phillips, 2 Strange, 921—may have been a case of several panels committing perjury about separate matters, and not even directed to obtain the same defeat of justice. I am therefore of opinion that these three men were competently charged in the same indictment with the crime of perjury, the perjury though separately committed being about the same matter.

Nor can I see any oppression in refusing to separate their trials; there does not appear to me to have been any special ground for such motion, and without a very special ground it is never granted. I have no doubt, moreover, that the jury gave the accused the benefit of their own evidence, to this effect at least, that they assumed they would have repeated on oath the same statement which they formerly made, otherwise they would have assisted to convict themselves of perjury.

The second question is, whether the Sheriff had any jurisdiction to entertain this charge of perjury? So far as the history of the Sheriff Courts in this country can be traced the Sheriff appears always to have had jurisdiction in all cases except in the pleas of the Crown. Perjury is not one of the pleas of the Crown, and therefore I am of opinion that the Sheriff has jurisdiction in it. The institutional writers indicate no doubt on the matter, and it only remains to deal with the argument raised on the old Scotch statutes of 1551, c. 19 and c. 22, and more particularly 1555, c. 47. The latter enacts that persons guilty of perjury, or subornation of perjury, shall be punished “by piercing of their tongues and escheating of all their goods to our Sovereign Lady's use, and declared never to be able to bruike honour, office, or dignity from thenceforth, and further punishment to be made in their persons at the sight and discretion of the Lords, according to the quality of the fault.” Whether that means of the Lords of Session, or Lords of Justiciary, I cannot tell. But it in no way affects my mind. There is nothing in these statutes either to confer or take away jurisdiction. They confer merely a power of punishment. And it is impossible to read them without seeing that time and practice have relaxed, or even obliterated, these punishments. Sentence of infamy is certainly never nowadays pronounced in cases of bigamy, and I imagine it is a long time since the punishment of piercing the tongue was inflicted on a person condemned for perjury. I am not prepared to say that the last clause of the Act 1555, c. 47, does not leave the punishment for perjury entirely to the discretion of the Court, and makes it optional whether even the sentence of infamy should be pronounced. I look with great respect on the judgment of the five Judges who sat in Maxwell's case (5 Irv. 65), to which we were referred. But the question of the form of sentence was not raised or argued at the bar; the point was taken up by the court ex proprio motu, and they thought that the proper form of sentence included a declaration of infamy. I hardly think that conclusive as a judgment, and I certainly have not followed it in my own practice. I think it admits of question whether the declaration of infamy should not be discontinued, at least in the majority of cases. Though I have my own opinion on that question, and have acted upon it, in deference to my brethren I reserve that opinion till the matter is seriously contested. In the meantime I have no doubt that the Sheriff cannot competently pronounce such declaration of infamy, and he has not attempted to do so in the present case.

The third objection is that there is no species facti in the minor applicable to the major charge of perjury by itself, and that the verdict "not guilty of conspiracy but guilty of perjury as libelled" was not warranted by the terms of the indictment, inasmuch as the charges of conspiracy and perjury are treated as one, and supported by the same minor. When, however, the structure of this indictment is examined the objection vanishes. It is no more essential to the conviction for perjury that conspiracy should be proved than to a conviction for theft on an indictment for housebreaking as also theft that the housebreaking should be proved. I quite admit that if these parties could not have been tried on the same libel for the crime of perjury this would probably have been a good objection. But that not being so, it must be repelled.

As to the last point, that Mr Gebbie, who was sitting as Sheriff-substitute when the perjury was alleged to have been committed, had no valid commission, the statement is, I think, wholly irrelevant, for there is no intelligible ground stated for impugning Mr Gebbie's authority. Mr Gebbie was not bound to produce evidence of his appointment, nor was the procurator-fiscal. If Mr Gebbie was acting without authority he laid himself open to punishment for such usurpation of authority. But so far as Mr Gebbie was acting in the ostensible exercise of the functions of a Judge, his acts must be sustained as valid till such usurpation of authority is proved, and that even though there may turn out to be some flaw in his appointment.

On the whole, therefore, though the case is not without some interest, I am of opinion that all the objections urged are without substance, and that the sentence must stand.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

ROBERT WEMYSS, George Barnes, and James Farmer, were charged under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, at the instance of Roger Black, burgh procurator-fiscal of Kirkcaldy, before the magistrates of that burgh, with a contravention of the Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 251, in so far as on the 17th day of February 1881 they did, within the meaning of the said section of the statute, on the High Street of Kirkcaldy, "to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers, wilfully cause an obstruction in the public footpath of said street, by means of congregating." *

On 25th February 1881, the magistrate officiating in the Burgh Court on that day convicted the accused of the contravention charged in the complaint, and sentenced them to a fine of 2s. 6d. each, or, in default of payment, to imprisonment for three days.

Wemyss presented this bill of suspension of the said sentence to the High Court of Justiciary.

The respondent, Black, took objection to the competency of the suspension, on the ground that such suspension was excluded by sections 430 and 437 of the Police Act, 1862.†

Argued for respondent;—The statute expressly enacted that any person who, to the obstruction or annoyance of passengers, wilfully causes any obstruction in any public footpath, shall be guilty of an offence. It was for the magistrate to decide whether the complaint set forth the offence, and to decide whether it had been proved. If the magistrate had committed an error in judgment, a remedy was given by appeal to the Circuit Court, and the jurisdiction of this Court was excluded.

Argued for the appellant;—There was no offence libelled here. The first subsection quoted was the subsection relied on by the prosecutor, and that evidently did not apply to the case of obstruction by the person alone. The "jostling" subsection was not founded on in the Burgh Court, and it was nowhere stated that the appellant had jostled anybody. Under the circumstances, the Court had jurisdiction to consider the bill.

* Sec. 251 enacts—"Every person who, in any street or private street, to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents or passengers, commits any of the following offences, shall, on conviction," be liable to certain penalties—(that is to say), "every person who, by means of any cart, carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, or any animal or other means, wilfully interrupts any public crossing, or wilfully causes any obstruction in any public footpath or other public thoroughfare. . . . Every person who shall jostle or annoy any person passing thereon."

† Sec. 430 enacts—"No order, judgment, record of conviction, or other proceeding whatsoever, concerning any prosecution instituted before the magistrate in virtue of this Act, shall be quashed or vacated for any misnomer or informality; and all judgments and sentences pronounced by the magistrate shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to suspension or advocacy or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, unless on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the magistrate, or of such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court of review shall think took place wilfully, or of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the magistrate; and such suspension, or advocacy, or appeal, or review, or stay of execution, must be presented before the next Circuit Court of Justiciary," &c.

Sec. 437 enacts—"Wherever any act, decision, determination, declaration, or deliverance of any Sheriff or magistrate, . . . is by this act declared to be final, the same shall not be subject to be set aside or reviewed or affected by any Court or judicature upon any ground, or in any manner of way whatever."

LORD YOUNG.—The only difficulty I feel in this case is whether we should not send it to be tried at the Circuit Court, but, as it is here, it would only be putting the parties to obvious expense if we sent it elsewhere. That being so, I am disposed to consider it on the merits.

Mar. 19, 1881.
Wemyss v.
Black.

The suspension is brought on the ground that the conviction shews on its face no offence. It sets forth nothing at all but by reference to the complaint, and that being so we must go to it. It is, I have always thought, established law that the conviction must set forth an offence not only by its generic name, but with a statement of the facts on which it depends. We must look at what the party did, in order to see whether the magistrate has not erroneously imputed an offence to him. Now, what is charged in the complaint? The charge against these three men is that, being on a certain day in the High Street of Kirkcaldy, they did, "to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers, wilfully cause an obstruction in the public footpaths of said street by means of congregating." That is all. It would not have occurred to me that this was intended as a charge under the subsection relating to "jostling or annoying," but it is probably sufficient for the case that it did not occur to either party that such was the case, and it was not presented in that light. The leading idea of the offence is obstruction, and obstruction is provided for under another subsection altogether, which all the parties had in view. I refer to the section under which the offence is charged, to see whether the facts amount to an offence under it. It is in these terms—(reads). It is within these terms that the magistrate thinks the offence fell. Now, I do not think that what these men did was at all within the conception of that. It was simply a case of two or three people meeting and stopping in the street. You cannot go along any street which has a narrow footpath without meeting with an obstruction from people standing talking to one another. If they do it wilfully and pertinaciously, if there is anything exceptional in the circumstances which imports a different character into the act, then that should be set forth. But it is not set forth here, and I am not going to exercise my ingenuity to imagine how people set about creating an obstruction with their persons only. If such a thing does occur then set it forth clearly, but, annoying as it is when people will stand in the way when other passengers wish to pass, I do not think, unless anything specific is charged, that such conduct amounts to an offence. I say that I do not think such conduct is within the conception of the subsection alone relied on by the prosecutor. Even the words, "or other means," cannot, I think, be held to apply to three persons, or even nine, standing talking in the street. No doubt there are provisions against collecting a crowd, but that also is not within the case. I am of opinion, then, that the case as stated is not within the "jostling" clause, and that it is not within the "obstruction" clause, and on that ground I think the conviction ought to be quashed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The question here depends on whether what was done was an offence under the General Police Act of 1862. If the complaint was well brought, then the magistrate's decision is protected by the sections referred to. But if no charge is libelled then it can never be so protected. That leads us to a consideration of the merits of the case, and I am of opinion that we cannot read that which is set forth as constituting an offence, for if it were so, it would come to nothing more nor less than this, that three persons meeting by accident on the street, and stopping to talk to one another, are guilty of a contravention of the Act. On this point I adopt so fully the reasoning of Lord Young that I need say no more about it. I think the conviction should be quashed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I have often had occasion to remark, the Judge presiding in this Court has no voice but in cases where your Lordships are equally divided in opinion; but I am entitled to express my views, though not to vote. Now, until five minutes ago my opinion would have been that this was one of the clearest cases I ever saw. Your Lordships say that there is no offence charged here but I must say I think that there is. If the obstruction caused by the congregating of persons is innocent and accidental, then there could be no ground for a charge; but if the obstruction be wilful, then I think there undoubtedly is. It is nothing to us to say that friends may meet and stand talking to one another—that is as far from wilful obstruction as anything possibly can be; but here the offence charged is wilfully causing an obstruction by means of congregating. Is that no offence? I should be very sorry to say that it is not. What clause or subsection such an act falls under may be matter of question. My own impression is, that it does not fall under the special obstruction subsection; but obstruction being the special object of the clause, such an act as this is certainly within the section as a whole, and the jostling subsection seems to me to cover it. For, when a man so stands that he will not allow anyone else to pass him without jostling, he is, to my mind, clearly within the clause. I must enter my protest against the notion that persons may wilfully stand in the middle of the footpath and obstruct the passers-by without being liable to a penalty under the statute.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Hall.

Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Relevancy—Ordering goods without intending to pay therefor.—The minor proposition of an indictment, under which a panel was charged with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, set forth that the panel "having formed a fraudulent and felonious scheme for the purpose of obtaining the goods of others on false pretences, and applying the same" to his "own uses and purposes, without paying or intending to pay therefor," ordered goods by letters, in which he did "represent and pretend" to the owners of the goods, and induce them "to believe that" he "intended to become a bona fide purchaser" of "these goods," and would pay the price thereof weekly . . . or on delivery, or on demand of payment, or shortly thereafter, and that the said "goods" were fraudulently received and appropriated by him to his own uses and purposes, and that he had not paid and did not intend to pay therefor. Held that the facts set forth in the minor did not relevantly support the charge in the major, as the statement that the accused falsely represented that he intended to become a bona fide purchaser, and to pay the price, was not a relevant averment of false pretences, it being necessary to set forth a false statement relating to a past or present fact.

Question, whether a domiciled Englishman, resident in England, who addresses letters to persons in Scotland containing false and fraudulent statements, is subject to the jurisdiction of the criminal Courts in Scotland?

ON 25th March 1881 John Hall was charged at the Perth Circuit Court, before Lord Young, with the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition.

The minor proposition of the indictment was in the following terms:—

No. 9.

"In so far as, you having formed a fraudulent and felonious scheme for the purpose of obtaining the goods of others on false pretences, and appropriating and applying the same to your own uses and purposes, without paying or intending to pay therefor, you, the said John Hall, did, in pursuance of the said fraudulent and felonious scheme (1), on or about the 16th day of November 1880 (Tuesday), in or near Four Lane Ends, or in or near Gregson Lane, in or near Blackburn, Lancashire wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently, write and transmit, or cause or procure to be written and transmitted by post, a letter or memorandum, with a printed heading containing, inter alia, your description and address, and bearing the subscription 'John Hall,' or a similar subscription, addressed to 'the station-master, Largo, Fife,' all in the following or similar terms:—'Memorandum—16th Nov. 1880.—From John Hall, merchant and commission salesman. Office, Gregson Lane, Blackburn. Residence, 34 Four Lane Ends. Established 1847. To the station-master, Largo, Fife.—Sir, Will you have the kindness to favour me with the names and addresses of your principal potato merchants and growers, also game and rabbit dealers. I am largely engaged in this branch of business, and anxious to open a trade in your neighbourhood. Trusting to be favoured with your reply by return. Yours, truly, John Hall,'—which letter or memorandum above libelled was duly received in course of post, or shortly thereafter, by William Strang, then and now or lately station-master at the Largo station of the North British Railway, in the county of Fife; and the said William Strang having replied to the letter or memorandum above libelled, by a letter transmitted by post to you, in the following or similar terms:—'Largo Station, Nov. 19, 1880.—Mr Hall, Gregson Lane, Blackburn. Dear Sir,—I have yours of 16th inst. to hand, I will be very happy to do a little in the potatoe line myself hoping to hear from you early, Wm. No. 9. in course of post, or shortly thereafter, by you the said John Hall; and you the said John Hall did, by the style, terms, and tenor of said letters or memoranda, printed and written as aforesaid, transmitted or caused to be transmitted by you as above libelled to the said William Strang, wickedly and feloniously, falsely, fraudulently, and wilfully represent, and pretend to the said William Strang that you were a merchant and commission salesman, largely engaged in and carrying on bona fide business as a merchant and commission salesman in Blackburn, when in truth you were not engaged in or carrying on any such business, and did thereby impose on and deceive the said William Strang, and induce him to believe that you were a bona fide trader, carrying on large and bona fide business in Blackburn, and that you would make cash payments for the said potatoes, either weekly, or as the said William Strang should load them; and the said William Strang, on the faith of the said false and fraudulent representations, did, on or about the 25th day of November (Thursday) 1880, at or near the Largo station of the North British Railway Company, at or near Largo aforesaid, deliver, or cause to be delivered, to said company, for conveyance to you at your address above libelled, in or near Blackburn aforesaid, or a similar address, four tons and one hundredweight or thereby of potatoes, of the value of thirteen pounds three shillings and sixpence sterling or thereby, the property or in the lawful possession of the said William Strang; and the said potatoes were accordingly thereafter conveyed to you, and were delivered to you at the railway station of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company at or near Blackburn aforesaid, on or about the 27th day of November 1880, and the said potatoes were fraudulently received and appropriated by you to your own uses and purposes, and you have not paid and did not intend to pay for the said potatoes, and, in particular, did not intend to pay for the same by cash payments, either weekly or as they were loaded, and the said William Strang has thus been defrauded by you."

The indictment further set forth four other cases of a similar nature, in which the panel was charged with having imposed upon other persons resident in Scotland in a similar way.

Counsel for the panel objected that no relevant charge was set forth in the indictment, as the facts libelled in the minor disclosed nothing against the panel except that he had given certain orders for goods, without, as it was alleged, intending to pay for them. That was no crime by the law of Scotland, though it would be a dishonest course of trading.¹

Argued for the Crown;—The point was closed by precedents.² The alleged dishonest intent constituted the crime, and that, if proved, was sufficient. These cases had ruled the practice ever since. This point was also taken up and disposed of in the cases of Bradbury and Allan.³ In these two latter cases it was settled further that the Scotch Courts of law had jurisdiction to try a domiciled Englishman whose crime is initiated in England but completed in Scotland, without his ever having been personally in Scotland during the whole time in question.

LORD YOUNG.—The prisoner is charged with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, which is with us the nomen juris of the crime of obtaining goods or money—and, it may be, other things or advantages—by false pretences, with intent to defraud. To constitute the crime there must be, first, falsehood, which may be by word of mouth, by writing, or by conduct; second, fraud—that is, the falsehood must be with a fraudulent intent; and, third, wilful imposition—that is, the imposition designed by the fraudulent falsehood must be accomplished. The case of an unsuccessful attempt by fraudulent falsehood to cheat another into parting with property I am not now concerned to consider, and shall only say that I think it not doubtful that such an attempt is by our law a punishable offence. The immediate, and, indeed, the only question for my consideration here is, whether any falsehood such as the law requires to constitute the crime charged is alleged? Now, the allegation, stated simply and without a multitude of superfluous words, or which at least would be superfluous except in an indictment, is that the prisoner bought potatoes and took delivery from the sellers without intending to pay for them, and the question is, whether by so doing he committed the crime charged. The Advocate-Depute tried to represent the allegation as extending beyond this, by founding on, first, the introductory averment, in these words—"You having formed a fraudulent and felonious scheme for the purpose of obtaining the goods of others on false pretences, and appropriating and applying the same to your own uses and purposes without paying or intending to pay therefor;" and, second, the averment in each charge that the prisoner's letters ordering the potatoes falsely represented that he "intended to become a bona fide purchaser of potatoes." But the scheme imputed in the introductory averment is to obtain goods "on false pretences," meaning, of course, by means of false pretences, which, although unexceptional as a general prefatory statement, does not dispense with the necessity of averring that false pretences were in fact made, and specifying what they were. I accordingly inquired what they were, and received for answer that the prisoner falsely represented that he intended to become a bona fide purchaser, and to pay the price of the potatoes. This led to the second question which I put to the Advocate-Depute, In what respect is it meant to be alleged that the prisoner was not a bona fide purchaser? to which the answer was, that he was not, inasmuch as he did not intend to pay the price—which, of course, brought back the question, Whether a purchaser of goods who does not intend to pay the price is guilty of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, although practising no falsehood or false pretence to induce the seller to make the bargain or give delivery beyond expressing his intention to pay, or leaving it to be implied from the fact of the purchase? Now, although a man who buys goods which he knows he cannot pay for, and therefore in a very real and practical sense has no intention of paying for, and still more a man who, being able to pay, buys goods intending to leave them unpaid, is certainly dishonest, I am unable to extend the criminal law, as administered in this Court, to such dishonesty as that. The purchaser of goods certainly promises to pay for them, whether the promise is expressed or left to implication, and if he does not intend to keep it he is dishonest. But intention with respect to future conduct, whether expressed or implied, would be a very inconvenient and hazardous issue to send for trial in a criminal Court, and I am indisposed to countenance a legal proposition which might expose anyone to be criminally tried and convicted on such an issue, although the establishment of it might be useful in the comparatively rare cases in which credit is improvidently given to knaves who have practised no falsehood or false pretences beyond representing, expressly or impliedly, that they are honest men who will honourably pay their debts. I am of opinion that the falsehood which is essential to the crime here charged must relate to a present or past fact—that is, that something shall be asserted (falsely) as an existing or past fact. This, indeed, is the common legal notion of falsehood. A promise or profession of intention to pay money, or to do anything else in the future not intended to be kept, is immorality beyond the scope of the criminal law, which does not, in my opinion, protect people against the consequences of their credulity by punishing those who abuse it, beyond this, that swindlers who impose on them by false representations—spoken, written, or acted—regarding past events or existing facts, shall be punished. Professions, express or implied, respecting the honest intentions of the professor with regard to his future conduct, and depending on his own will—which may change—are not, in my opinion, fitting subjects of criminal charge in this Court. A purchaser without intention to pay may afterwards think better of it and pay, or his creditor may succeed in compelling payment. Again, a purchaser intending to pay may subsequently change his mind and dishonestly refuse. Shall the former—who in fact pays—be punished as a criminal, and the latter—who does not—go free. A crime committed cannot thereafter be uncommitted. The rule that in order to the commission of crime the falsehood—by word, writing, or conduct—shall regard an existing or past fact is simple and safe, and, in my opinion, reasonably sufficient. To extend it so as to include promises as to future conduct not at the time intended to be kept—although in the result they may be kept—would, in my opinion, be very hazardous, and such extension is not, I think, sufficiently recommended by the consideration that some dishonest people whose self professions of their own honest intentions have been relied on may otherwise go unpunished.

I put my judgment exclusively on this, that the only substantive averment against the prisoner is that he fraudulently ordered, received, and kept the goods without intending to pay for them. Had it been averred that the account which he gave of himself, by name, calling, place of business, and residence, in the printed heading of his letters, was false, I should have had another opinion of the case; for I do not doubt that if a man falsely represents himself as a “merchant and commission salesman” at a certain place, “established 1847,” this is a falsehood within the meaning of the rule as I have stated it, and so punishable if anyone has thereby been imposed on and deceived into parting with his goods. Nor, had such falsehood been averred, should I have thought that the averment was answered by evidence that the prisoner had an “office” at the place mentioned, and professed to be a merchant and commission salesman there, if in truth it was a swindler’s trap, and he “no trader, but a practised cheat,” to use the language of Mr Hume in noticing the case of Hall (1 Hume, 173).

Had such a case been alleged, and, even as it is, had I thought the libel as it stands relevant, there would have been a question of jurisdiction which I could not, as at present advised, have regarded lightly. For if the prisoner might, without leaving Blackburn in Lancashire, commit a crime in Scotland, and within the district of this Circuit, it is plain that he might in the same view, while never leaving home, commit a crime in any country of the world—for example, in Russia or America—and be subject to trial therefor in such country according to the criminal law thereof. The Advocate-Depute stated very emphatically that according to his information the prisoner did not transgress

the law of England, the purpose of the statement being to point out the difference and superiority of the law of Scotland in such matters, and repudiate all reference to English cases or text-writers as authority or legitimate illustration of principle with respect to such an offence as this libel is intended to present. I am not at present satisfied that we should be prepared to give up and send for trial in a foreign country and according to foreign law a Scotchman who had never quitted Scotland. If he has here transgressed our criminal law he shall be tried and punished according to that law, whether the sufferer by his transgression be a native or a foreigner—here or abroad. But the proposition is, that if a Scotchman residing, say, in Perth, by letter induces a foreigner to send him goods from abroad, he thereby 'subjects himself to the criminal law of the country to which his letter was addressed, and ought to be sent there for trial and punishment according to that law. If his conduct in the matter is criminal according to our law, he will, as I have said, be subject to trial and punishment here, notwithstanding that the victim of his crime is a foreigner resident abroad; but if not, I venture to ask how we should regard an application to send him abroad for trial, recommended by a representation of the foreign law as superior to ours, and that by it he would get his deserts, which by the law of his own country he would not. The general rule is that criminal law is strictly territorial, so that a man is subject only to the criminal law of the country where he is, and that his conduct there, whether acting, speaking, or writing, shall be judged of as criminal or not by that law and no other. The law of allegiance affords an exception in cases of treason, and there are also, I think, some other exceptions, as, for example, in the case of a British subject murdering another abroad; but the rule is as I have stated. The proposition that imposition by letter sent abroad is an exception, so that the questions of imposition or not, and whether it is of a criminal character or not, shall be determined by common law, and not by that of the writer's country, and in which he wrote it and despatched it, is to my mind so novel, and prima facie so questionable, that when it presents itself again, and under circumstances requiring a decision, I venture to think that it will deserve very careful consideration. I have no occasion now to decide it, being of opinion that according to the law of Scotland the libel before me is not relevant.

THE COURT found the indictment irrelevant.

The Advocate-Depute moved for leave to desert the diet pro loco et tempore.

THE COURT refused the motion, and dismissed the panel from the bar.

Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), sec. 3, sub-sec. 5—Appeal—Notice—Posting of notice on last day for giving notice.—Sub-section 5 of section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, provides that an appellant shall, "within three days" of receiving the appeal case from the inferior Judge, "give notice of appeal in writing to the respondent." An appellant posted the statutory notice on the third day, but the respondent did not receive it until the morning of the fourth. Held that this was sufficient compliance with the statute.

HECTOR CHARLESON, innkeeper, Forres, was charged in the Police Court at Forres under the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, at the instance of Arthur Duffes, procurator-fiscal in that Court, with an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, "in so far as he did keep open said hotel or house occupied by him for the sale of exciseable liquors after eleven o'clock on the night of Saturday, the 19th day of February 1881, or did permit or suffer George Cunningham, watchmaker, Forres, to be drinking therein after said hour, or did sell or give out exciseable liquors to the said George Cunningham after said hour, he not being a lodger or traveller, such offence being the first offence."

Evidence having been led, the magistrates convicted the accused "of the offence charged."

Charleson required the magistrates to state a case for the consideration of the High Court of Justiciary, in terms of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3.

When the case came on for hearing counsel for the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the appellant had not given due notice to the respondent of his appeal under sub-section 5 of the 3d section of the above Act.*

It appeared that the appellant's Edinburgh agent posted the notice in Edinburgh on the third day after receipt of the case, and that it was not received by the respondent in Forres until the morning of the fourth day.

Argued for the respondent;—The Legislature evidently meant that the notice should be received by the respondent on the third day. Where it was intended that the date of posting should be held as the date of notice it was always specially set forth, as in the Employers Liability Act, 1880. What he contended for was held in England to be the proper construction of such provisions in statutes.¹ On the merits, the convic-

Duffes.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that this preliminary objection ought not to be sustained. I am assuming in what I say that notice was not given within the three days so that it might be received within these three days, but it was so given that it was not received till the post of the day after the last of the three days. If it were necessary to inquire whether it might have been received by the post of the last of the three days we should have to allow a proof, resulting, of course, in a litigation as important as the merits of the case. I should be slow to permit that in a case of summary appeal. Assuming, then, that notice was given, as distinguished from received, within three days, I think it sufficient that it was posted within the three days, and it does not signify that it was not received till the next day, nor would it matter if, having been so posted, it was not received at all. In that case we should do what might be required in order to remedy any inconvenience arising from the respondent's not having due notice, but we would not deny the remedy of appeal because notice had not been received. This appeal was intimated within the statutory time, and it is not suggested that any inconvenience arose from the notice not having been received till the day after the three days expired.

On the merits, the conviction cannot stand. The complaint charges the appellant with doing not all three of the things mentioned in the complaint, but with doing one or other of them. If he did any one of them the statute was violated; and he is liable to a penalty. Now, it being charged that he did one or other, the magistrate, as I read the conviction, says that he did them all. There are no facts to support that result, but it is sufficient to say that the conviction does not bear which of three offences, one or other of which he is charged with, he committed. No conviction on such a complaint could be good which did not specify which of three alternative things charged the accused is held to have done.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. As to the sufficiency of the notice, my only hesitation has been out of deference to the English cases quoted. According to the ordinary use of language one who posts the notice on the last day for giving it gives the notice then. The appellant has done all that it was necessary for him to do. As to the merits of the appeal there is no doubt. The very question was decided in the case of Boyd v. M'Jannet.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. The argument both as to the competency of the appeal and as to the merits has been remarkably well stated for the respondent. As to the competency we could not sustain the objection without having a proof of the dates and hours, as we do not now know them. We do not know when the case was delivered to the agent for the appellant, nor the course of post, and it may be that the notice might have arrived on the day of

No. 11. posting. As far as we can see, the appellant did all he could, and that the letter was not received till the fourth day will not exclude his appeal.

Huffes.

As to the merits, I must, in the case of Boyd v. M'Jannet, have been satisfied that my Circuit judgment was erroneous. The alternatives are not alternatives in the sense that one is exclusive of the others. The proper way was to charge them cumulatively, and then say that the person charged was guilty of all or one or other, and then the Magistrate must have found either that all were proved, or that one or more, and, if so, which of them, was proved.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

It was proved that the purchaser had asked for a certain quantity of cream from a servant of the dealer, and was served with cream at 1d. per gill, which, on analysis, was found to be diluted with 34 per cent of skimmed milk. Further, that the dealer had also for sale a superior quality of cream, containing a smaller percentage of skimmed milk, which he was in use to sell at a higher price. The Sheriff found that the cream at 1d. per gill was not of the quality of cream. On appeal, the Court held that the sale of the inferior, though pure, quality of cream at a low price was not an offence within the meaning of the statute.

ON 22d March 1881 James Morton, Elderslie House, Renfrew, manager of and carrying on business as the "Public Dairy Supply," was charged, in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, under a complaint at the instance of Robert Green, sanitary inspector of the burgh of Paisley, of an offence within the meaning of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as amended by "the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879," particularly sec. 6 of said first mentioned Act,* "in so far as on the 15th day of February 1881 years, or about that time, in or near St Mirren Street, Paisley, he, by the hands of Alexander Naismith, his servant and agent, did, to the prejudice of the purchaser, sell to the said Robert Green 4d. worth, or thereby, of cream, being an article of food, which article of food, when sold as aforesaid, was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded from him by the said Robert Green, in respect it was diluted with 34 per cent, or thereby, of skim milk, whereby the said James Morton is liable in a penalty not exceeding £20." No. 12.

* Sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, provides—"No person shall sell, to the prejudice of the purchaser, any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding £20." Sec. 2 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act provides:—"In any prosecution under the provisions of the principal Act, for selling, to the prejudice of the purchaser, any article of food, or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, it shall be no defence to any such prosecution to allege that the purchaser having bought only for analysis was not prejudiced by such sale; nor shall it be any defence to prove that the article of food or drug in question, though defective in nature, or in substance, or in quality, was not defective in all three respects."

Proof in the cause having been led, the Sheriff (Cowan) convicted the said James Morton of the crime charged, and fined him in the sum of £5. June 10, 1881 Morton v. Green.

Morton required the Sheriff to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The facts as set forth in the case were as follows:—

"This is a case brought under the statute 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63, sec. 6, as amended by the statute 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30, sec. 2. The facts as proved on the trial were—

"That the respondent, on 15th February last, demanded from Alexander Naismith, servant of the defender, and then in charge of a cart and horse, selling milk and cream through Paisley, 4d. worth of cream. That the said Alexander Naismith, for whose actings the appellant at the trial admitted himself to be responsible, supplied to the respondent an article which, on being analysed, was found to be cream diluted with 34 per cent of skim milk.

"That no notice was given to the respondent that the article delivered was other than that which he demanded.

"That the article received was divided, sealed up, and appropriated in terms of the statute.

"That cream taken from milk which has stood twelve hours contains on an average 25 per cent of butter-fat, 8 per cent of solids not fat, and 67 per cent of water.

"That the article delivered to the respondent contained 10·50 per cent of butter-fat, 8·14 per cent of solids not fat, and 81·36 of water.

"That in arriving at the conclusion that the article in question was diluted with 34 per cent of milk the analyst made the calculation as if the proportion of butter-fat per cent to be expected in cream was not 25 per cent, but 16 per cent, assigning as his reason that in cream taken from milk which has stood only two hours he has found that low percentage of butter-fat.

"For the defence it was proved that there is, among the dairymen of Glasgow and neighbourhood (there being, however, no proof that the practice extends to Paisley, or is known to the public) a practice of selling two qualities of cream,—one of good cream at 2d. a Scotch gill, and another sold at 1d. the Scotch gill of cream taken from milk in the proportion of one pint of cream from four pints of milk, there being also an extra quality of cream which is supplied when specially ordered, and sold at nearly 4d. per Scotch gill. That the cream at 1d. a gill is largely sold to the working classes.

"That the appellant, while admitting that good undiluted cream, to use his own words when examined, is obtainable in the proportion of one pint of cream from eight pints of milk, instructs those in charge of his dairy, in conformity with the above practice, to cream the milk so as to obtain two pints of cream from eight pints of milk, and that the article supplied to the respondent was so creamed.

"I convicted the appellant, because, in my opinion, the article demanded being cream, and that supplied being such as, on analysis, it was found to be, it was not of the quality of cream.

"The question of law for the opinion of the Court is, Whether or not, upon the evidence above stated, the appellant was properly convicted under the statutes founded on?"

Argued for Morton;—The appellant had sold nothing that was not of the nature, substance, and quality of cream. The purchaser did not specify the quality required, but paid the proper price for what he got,

No. 12. and got full value for his money. There was no standard quality of cream; but different qualities were sold at different prices. There had not been any introduction of foreign substances, unwholesome or otherwise, into the cream. The case did not properly fall under the section of the statute.¹

June 10, 1881.
Lorton v.
Green.

Argued for the respondent;—This was not a question of law at all, but only of fact, therefore the Magistrate's judgment was final. There was a standard of cream, and the article supplied did not conform to it. It did not matter that the liquid added was not unwholesome in itself.² The purchaser asked for cream and he did not get it, but got an article adulterated by the introduction of skim milk.

LORD YOUNG.—The conviction here is under section 6 of the "Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," which provides that "no person shall sell, to the prejudice of the purchaser, any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser." And by an amendment, expressed in unfortunate language, which was passed in 1879, it is provided that "in any prosecution under the provisions of the principal Act for selling, to the prejudice of the purchaser, any article of food, or any drug, which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, it shall be no defence to any such prosecution to allege that the purchaser, having bought only for analysis, was not prejudiced by such sale. Neither shall it be a good defence to prove that the article of food or drug in question, though defective in nature, or in substance, or in quality, was not defective in all three respects." I really do not know what "defective in nature" means, and am unable to comprehend how a commodity can be defective in nature and substance but not in quality, or in nature and quality but not in substance. The charge here is that the appellant did, to the prejudice of the purchaser, sell 4d. worth or thereby of cream, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. Prejudice to the purchaser is alleged, and prejudice must be proved—that he, the seller, acted in a manner prejudicial to a purchaser, although not to the particular purchaser—where, as in the case before us, the purchaser happened to be a sanitary officer, laying a kind of trap in order to catch a person who was supposed to be in the habit of making prejudicial sales.

I inquire, therefore, whether the appellant made a sale which would have been prejudicial to the purchaser under the circumstances had he not been a sanitary officer purchasing for analysis, and trying to catch a man who, as he supposed, was acting in a manner prejudicial to the public. It is stated by the Sheriff that it was proved by the appellant, who is the manager of a large dairy establishment—and his evidence was corroborated by several milk-dealers in extensive business in the district—that there are at least two qualities of cream sold, one of which is sold at one penny a gill to the poorer classes of customers, who can only afford cream of that kind, the better quality—being just double that price, and, so far as we can judge, just double the richness—being twopence a gill, to those willing to pay that price. That is proved in respect to Glasgow and the surrounding neighbourhood, and though it is said that there was no proof that the practice extended to Paisley, there are no facts stated in the case about Paisley in regard to the matter. I am not surprised to learn that there are two qualities of cream sold. I would have been surprised if I had been told that all the cream sold was of one quality; that is so contrary to experience. It is proved in this case that there are at least two qualities of cream sold. Now, the seller was here asked for "sixpence worth of cream." He replied that he had only fourpence worth remaining, and he gave it, and fourpence was paid, being one penny per gill; and it is not suggested that the article was not of the quality of that sold at a penny per gill—and extensively sold, according to the evidence of the milk-dealers who were examined—and it is not proved that what the purchaser got was not fair value for the money—such as in fact satisfied the numerous real customers in that article. And yet the suggestion made to support this prosecution is that each of the numerous customers of the thousands of gills of this cream sold daily at one penny a-gill, is prejudiced, and that a prosecution would be competent in respect of each sale. I cannot hold that. I cannot hold that there are here facts found proved to justify the conclusion that was arrived at. The Sheriff has told us what the facts are which he has found proved, and the inference that he has made from these facts, viz., that but for the circumstance that the purchaser was here a sanitary officer he would have been prejudiced. I cannot hold that this inference which the Sheriff made upon the question of prejudice is a question of fact. I think it is a question that we are entitled to deal with, and to say whether on the facts which the Sheriff has stated there was such prejudice in the sale made as warranted a conviction. I am of opinion that these facts did not justify the inference of prejudice, or warrant the conviction.

I adhere to what I said in the case of Davidson v. M'Leod upon the meaning and interpretation of clause 6 of the statute of 1875 (see Couper, iii., 538, 539), and its application to the substance we are here dealing with.

I am of opinion that upon a right view of the law applicable to the facts, which are as I have stated, the conclusion that the purchaser—but for the circumstance that he happened to be a sanitary inspector—was prejudiced was not justified, and that therefore the conviction cannot be sustained.

I think that we are not called upon to say what quantity of fat is necessary to justify the use of the term "cream." I think the question of fact what degree of richness or percentage of fat must exist to justify the use of the word can never arise or be dealt with as an abstract question. I do not know that science has determined it, and the law has not determined it, but has left it for decision with reference to the circumstances of each individual case.

But upon the general evidence in the case, and upon the facts as stated, I am clearly of opinion that a delivery of that article, which was sold at a penny per gill satisfies a demand for "cream" on the streets of Paisley, there being no suggestion that the article was adulterated or unwholesome, or not worth the money that was paid for it. I desire also to point out here, as I did in the case of Davidson v. M'Leod, that the most important part of the statute of 1875 is that which is apart altogether from the clause which was here libelled, viz., the part which relates to adulteration by the admixture of unwholesome ingredients or fraudulent devices to disguise the quality, to make the quality appear better than it really is. Where such is the nature of the charge I would not disapprove of even tricks being resorted to in order to catch a delinquent, and have him punished, for the protection of the public. But where there is no suggestion of dishonesty, and no device practised, to disguise the article—where only to suit the public taste and purse, there is sold a wholesome undisguised although inferior article at an inferior price, and at the same time a superior article at a higher price—both being, for anything the Court in this case knows to the contrary, quite honestly constituted and sold at a reasonable price—I think that section 6 of the statute does not apply. There was nothing prejudicial in the sale, and nothing for which a penalty ought to be imposed. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be sustained, and the conviction set aside.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur entirely in the result of the opinions of your Lordships. In the former case of Davidson I pointed out that the former statutes, before that which was then in force, had referred only to the introduction into drugs and articles of food foreign substances injurious to health, and my impression was that the main, if not the only, object of the new provision in question was to extend that prohibition to the admixture with food or drugs of foreign substances not injurious to health. I have that impression—although I do not rest my opinion in this case on it—and I concur in the remarks of Lord Young on that subject. Here, however, we have to consider two questions relative to the construction of this clause of the statute, first, What is the true meaning of “quality demanded”? and second, What is the meaning of “to the prejudice of the buyer”? Now, on the matter of quality, I am of opinion that this term implies that the demand made was for an article different in quality from that furnished, and that the words used by the purchaser were intended by him and understood by the seller to mean an article of a different grade in quality, although identical in substance. Here the appellant was, as the proof shews, a professed vendor of cream of different qualities, some at fourpence, some at twopence, and some at a penny a-gill. For which did the purchaser ask? His demand was entirely indefinite, knowing, as I hold he must have known, that these qualities were notoriously and publicly sold by the appellant. If he had asked for “fourpence worth of your cream at a penny a-gill,” he would then have got precisely the quality demanded. The vendor, believing that this was what he wanted, gave it to him, and I see nothing to satisfy me that he expected the vendor to construe his demand in any other sense. I cannot approve of this proceeding. It is too like a catch. The “article demanded” must be held to be the article meant by an ordinary purchaser to be obtained—not in any scientific definition. And this illustrates the broad distinction between the introduction of foreign substances into food and drugs and the mere degree of quality in the same substance. Now, here the trader has different qualities of the same generic substance. They are marked by different prices, and their difference is well known, and perfectly discernible by any ordinary buyer. Again, if the purchaser gets precisely what he wanted at the price he stipulated for how can that be to his prejudice? I think, looking to the aspect of this case, that it seems a rather obtrusive interference with what, as far as I can see, is an honest trade.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and suspended the conviction.

Advocate v.

Jurisdiction—Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Locus delicti.—Held that a domiciled Englishman, resident in England, who had been lawfully apprehended in England and brought to Scotland for trial on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, by sending letters from England to traders in Scotland, containing false statements and representations, whereby he had fraudulently induced them to forward goods to him in England without paying and without intending to pay for the same, was subject to the jurisdiction of the criminal Courts in Scotland as the forum delicti.

Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Fraudulently ordering and obtaining goods on false pretences.—The minor proposition in an indictment under which J W was charged with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, set forth that the panel, in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme of obtaining, on false pretences, the property of other persons, and applying the same to his own uses and purposes without paying or intending to pay therefor, did wickedly and feloniously, and falsely and fraudulently, write a letter with the false and fraudulent printed heading, "J W, commission salesman, Blackburn," and "did enclose therein a bank cheque or order for the sum of £25," bearing to be signed by him, meaning "by the style, terms, and tenor of the said letter, and by the said cheque or order," to represent to A B that he intended to become a bona fide purchaser of goods, and that he was "a person of good credit that the said bank cheque or order was equivalent to a ready-money payment, and that the same would be honoured on its being presented for payment at the office in M of the said bank," and this he did, well knowing that he had "no adequate funds in the said bank to meet the said cheque, and that the same would not be honoured." That the said A B, being deceived by his said false and fraudulent representations, sent certain goods which the panel appropriated, and for which he had not paid, and did not intend to pay. Held that the facts set forth in the minor proposition were relevant to support the charge in the major.

JOHN THOMAS WITHERINGTON was charged at a pleading diet, held on High Court 13th June 1881, before a full bench of the High Court of Justiciary in Full Bench. Edinburgh, with the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. Justiciary Clerk.

In the indictment five separate offences were libelled.

The minor proposition applicable to the first offence was in the following terms:—"You having formed a fraudulent and felonious scheme of obtaining, on false pretences, goods, the property of another person or other persons, without paying and not intending to pay therefor, and appropriating the same to your own uses and purposes, did, in prosecution of your said scheme, on or about the 10th day of December 1879, at some place in or near Blackburn, in the county of Lancaster, in England, . . . wickedly and feloniously, and falsely and fraudulently, write, or cause to be written, a letter with the false and fraudulent printed heading 'Memorandum—From J. T. Witherington, commission salesman, Blackburn,' dated 'Dec. 10th 1879,' and addressed 'to Mr C. Muirhead,' or similarly headed, dated, and addressed, which letter is in the following or similar terms:—'Sir,—Enclosed cheque, value £25. Forward 100 couple rabbits, 100 brown hares, and small hamper of grouse. Yours, J. T. WITHERINGTON,' and enclose therein a bank cheque or order for the sum of £25, bearing to be signed by you, and purporting to be dated 'Manchester, Dec. 10th 1879,' to be drawn in favour of 'Mr C. Muirhead or bearer,' and to be addressed to 'the Manchester Joint Stock Bank, Limited,' or of some similar purport, and did, time above libelled, transmit, or cause to be transmitted, by post, from Blackburn aforesaid, . . . to the firm of Charles Muirhead & Company, poulterers, then and now or lately carrying on business in or near Queen Street, Edinburgh, or to James Muirhead, then and now or lately the sole partner of said firm, the said letter containing the said bank cheque or order; and the same having, in course of post or shortly thereafter been delivered to and received by the said James Muirhead, at the address of his said firm in or near Queen Street, Edinburgh, you did, by the style, terms, and tenor of the said letter, headed as aforesaid, and by the said cheque or order, wickedly and feloniously, falsely, fraudulently, and wilfully, represent and pretend to the said James Muirhead, and induce him to believe, that you intended to purchase from him rabbits, hares, and grouse, at the price or to the value of £25,—that you were a person of good credit, carrying on business as a commission salesman in Blackburn, and able to pay the said price or value,—that the said bank cheque or order was equivalent to a ready money payment,—and that the same would be honoured on its being presented for payment at the office in Manchester of the said bank; and this you did, well knowing, and the fact being, that you had no adequate funds in the said bank to meet the said cheque or order, and that the same would not be honoured, and intending to defraud the said James Muirhead, and to obtain from him rabbits, hares, and grouse, without payment therefor; and the said James Muirhead, being deceived and imposed upon by your said false and fraudulent representations and pretences, did, on the faith thereof, on or about the 11th day of December 1879, at or near the parcel office of the Caledonian Railway Company in or near Princes Street, Edinburgh, deliver, or cause to be delivered, to some person to the prosecutor unknown in the service of the said railway company, for conveyance to you, addressed to you at Blackburn aforesaid, three hampers, containing sixty or thereby hares, and forty or thereby brace of grouse, of the value of £25 sterling, the property, or in the lawful possession of the said James Muirhead, which three hampers, with the said hares and grouse therein, were thereafter conveyed to and delivered to you on or about the 12th day of December 1879 at or near the station of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company at or near Blackburn aforesaid, and were fraudulently received by you, and appropriated to your own uses and purposes, and you have not paid, and did not intend to pay to the said James Muirhead the price thereof; and the said bank cheque or order having been, on or about the 13th day of December 1879, presented for payment at the office in or near High Street, Manchester, of the said Manchester Joint Stock Bank, payment thereof was lawfully refused, and the said James Muirhead has thus been defrauded by you."

The minor proposition applicable to the third offence was in the following terms:—" (3) You, the said John Thomas Witherington did, in prosecution of your said fraudulent and felonious scheme, on or about the 9th day of December 1880, at or near Blackburn aforesaid, . . . wickedly and feloniously, and falsely and fraudulently, write, or cause to be written, a letter with the false and fraudulent printed heading, 'Memorandum—From J. T. T. Witherington, Blackburn, to Anderson & Williamson, Quality Street, Leith. Your letter of the 10th received, and your offer accepted, so push on with the order quick as you can,’ which telegram was duly received by the said firm of Andersons & Williamson, or by the said William Williamson; and you did, by the style, terms, and tenor of the letter last above libelled, and of the printed heading thereof, and of the said telegram, transmitted and despatched, or caused to be transmitted and despatched by you as aforesaid, wickedly, and feloniously, falsely, fraudulently, and wilfully represent and pretend to the said firm of Andersons & Williamson, and to the said William Williamson, or to one or other of them, and induce them, or one or other of them, to believe that you intended to become a bona fide purchaser of ten gross of herring-pads, and that you would pay the price thereof on delivery, or on demand of payment, or shortly thereafter; and the said firm of Andersons & Williamson, or the said William Williamson, on the faith that you were a bona fide purchaser, and would pay the price of the said herring-pads as aforesaid, did, on or about the 31st day of December 1880, at or near the Caledonian Railway Company’s station at or near North Leith, in the county of Midlothian, deliver, or cause to be delivered, to some person or persons to the prosecutor unknown, in the service of the said railway company, for conveyance to you, addressed to you at Blackburn aforesaid, 720 or thereby herring-pads, the property or in the lawful possession of the said firm of Andersons & Williamson, and the same were thereafter conveyed to and delivered to you at or near the Blackburn station of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, on or about the 4th day of January 1881; and the said firm of Andersons & Williamson, or the said William Williamson, on the faith that you were a bona fide purchaser, and would pay the price of the said herring-pads as aforesaid, did, in further execution of your said order, on or about the 17th day of January 1881, at or near the Caledonian Railway Company’s station at or near North Leith aforesaid, deliver, or cause to be delivered, to some person or persons to the prosecutor unknown in the service of the said railway company, for conveyance to you, addressed to you at Blackburn aforesaid, 720 or thereby herring-pads, the property or in the lawful possession of the said firm of Andersons & Williamson, and the same were thereafter conveyed to and delivered to you at or near the Blackburn station aforesaid, on or about the 20th day of January 1881; and the said herring-pads, conveyed and delivered to you as aforesaid, were fraudulently received by you, and appropriated to your own uses and purposes, and you have not paid, and you did not intend to pay, to the said firm of Andersons & Williamson the price thereof, and the said firm has thus been wilfully imposed upon and defrauded by you." The minor propositions applicable to the second, fourth, and fifth offences were similar, mutatis mutandis, to that first set forth.

Counsel for the panel objected (1) that the Court had no jurisdiction; (2) that the species facti in the minor of the indictment did not amount to the crime libelled in the major.

Argued for the panel;—On the question of jurisdiction: Scotland was not the forum delicti. The letters containing the alleged fraudulent misrepresentations were written and posted in England. The panel did nothing criminal or otherwise in Scotland; he never was there from the beginning of the time libelled to the end; and was apprehended in England. That being so, the criminal Courts of Scotland had no jurisdiction. Decisions adverse to this proposition had been pronounced in the cases of Bradbury and Allan,¹ but doubts had been expressed on the question by Lord Young in the case of Hall (ante, March 25, 1881, p. 28), at Perth Circuit. This domiciled Englishman was not bound to know that what he was doing was a crime under the laws of Scotland. He owed no duty to those laws, and was not protected by them. If the jurisdiction was affirmed the consequence would be that any man writing to a correspondent in a foreign country would be bound to know the laws of that country. There was no forum delicti where a person has not been actually and physically present in the country during at least part of the time when the crime was being committed. If the panel was not bound to know the laws of Scotland it was contrary to every principle of jurisprudence that he should be tried for an offence under them. Up to the time of Bradbury and Allan it had never been attempted in any country to try such a case. The Act of Parliament (13 Geo. III., c. 31), which constituted certain offences crimina continua, only contemplated cases where the criminal was present at the time of the crime and fled into another country. It had nothing to do with such a case as this. An analogy lay between this case and cases of quasi delict. For instance, a man seduced a girl in Manchester, she comes to Dundee, and a child, the result of the seduction, is born there. An action for aliment of the child does not lie in Scotland.² Here the place where the crime was really committed was Blackburn. The act of posting the letter put it out of his control, and so completed the crime. It had been so held in cases applicable to various crimes.³

On the relevancy: In no case prior to those of Bradbury and *Allan*¹ had it been held that an allegation that the panel got goods by a promise of future payment, when such payment was never intended to be made, was enough to sustain an indictment charging a panel with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. Those two cases certainly decided that such an indictment was relevant, but the latest case, that of Hall, ante, p. 28, was an authority in the other direction. Further, the first charge was deficient in specification, as the only facts alleged did not amount to fraud. The heading of the memorandum was not false; it set forth the panel's real name and address. Where a statement is partly true and partly false the prosecutor must specify which part was false.

Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Witherington.

Argued for the Crown;—On the question of jurisdiction: The case was ruled by the cases of Bradbury and Allan, and these cases had been acted upon in innumerable unreported cases, both in the High and Circuit Courts. It was only when the letter was received and acted on the mind of the recipient that the crime was committed. It was in Scotland that the deceit worked, and, further, the delivery of the goods was made in Scotland, where they were handed to a common carrier. The crime flowed into Scotland, whether it was begun in England or no. It might quite well be that there was jurisdiction in the English Courts as well as in the Scotch.

On the question of relevancy: This question was also foreclosed by the authority of Bradbury and Allan and the earlier cases.¹

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The crime charged in the major proposition is falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. To the constitution of this offence it is necessary that the accused shall have (1) made false representations; (2) for the fraudulent purpose of cheating the person to whom they are made; and (3) to the effect of obtaining from that person by this means goods, money, or some other value or advantage, without any return or consideration, to the profit of the accused, and the corresponding injury of the other party. In the first charge in the minor proposition the prosecutor alleges (1st) that the panel wrote a letter in the following terms to Mr C. Muirhead of Edinburgh:—"Sir,—Enclosed cheque, value £25. Forward 100 couple rabbits, 100 brown hares, and small hamper of grouse;" (2d) that he enclosed in the letter a cheque for £25 signed by him, and addressed to the Manchester Joint Stock Bank (Limited) in favour of Muirhead; (3) that the letter and cheque were written at Blackburn, in England, and transmitted by post to Muirhead at Edinburgh; (4th) that the paper on which the letter was written had a printed heading in these terms—"Memorandum—From J. T. Witherington, commission salesman, Blackburn;" and that this printed heading was false and fraudulent, by which statement, in an indictment for the offence with which we are dealing, nothing else can be meant than that the representation that the writer of the letter was a commission salesman in Blackburn was false in fact, and made for a fraudulent purpose; (5th) that the panel did, "by the style, terms, and tenor of the said letter, headed as aforesaid, and by the said cheque or order, wickedly and feloniously, falsely, fraudulently, and wilfully, represent and pretend to the said James Muirhead, and induce him to believe, that you intended to purchase from him rabbits, hares, and grouse, at the price or to the value of £25—that you were a person of good credit, carrying on business as a commission salesman in Blackburn, and able to pay the said price or value—that the said bank cheque or order was equivalent to a ready-money payment—and that the same would be honoured on its being presented for payment at the office in Manchester of the said bank; and this you did, well knowing, and the fact being, that you had no adequate funds in the said bank to meet the said cheque or order, and that the same would not be honoured, and intending to defraud the said James Muirhead, and to obtain from him rabbits, hares, and grouse, without payment therefor;" (6th) that Muirhead being deceived by these false and fraudulent

The other charges in the minor proposition are libelled, mutatis mutandis, in the same way, with slight variations,—that is to say, they contain all the same elements of false and fraudulent representations for the purpose of cheating the person addressed, with the success of the imposture and obtaining of the goods without paying for them.

I.

It appears to me that these are relevant charges, because they answer in detail the definition which I have given of the crime, viz., the making of false representations for the fraudulent purpose of cheating the person to whom they are addressed, and to the effect of obtaining by this means the goods of that person without paying for them, to the profit of the panel and the injury of the party imposed on. The case chiefly relied on by the panel's counsel was that of Hall, tried by my brother Lord Young at the last Perth Circuit. But that case is clearly distinguishable from the present, for it was not there alleged in the minor proposition that the representations made in the panel's letter were false in fact. He represented himself as being a merchant and commission salesman, with an office in one part of Blackburn and a residence in another, and no part of that statement was alleged to be false. While I am of opinion that the minor proposition of this indictment is relevant in each of its charges, I must not be supposed to represent it as a well drawn indictment, or one that ought to be followed in practice. On the contrary, it seems to me as if it were a sort of experiment to discover how far a prosecutor may go in looseness and want of precision without becoming absolutely irrelevant.

The objection to the jurisdiction of this Court to try the panel for this crime raises a question of much greater interest and importance. But this question has, I apprehend, been settled in a sense adverse to the panel's contention by two decisions of this Court—the case of Bradbury in 1872, and the case of Allan in 1873, both to be found in the second volume of Couper's Reports.

Under ordinary circumstances I should have thought it enough to refer to these authorities as a sufficient ground for repelling the objection; but some doubts having been suggested as to the soundness of these judgments, and a full Court having been summoned to dispose of the objections to this indictment, it would hardly be satisfactory if the Judges now present did not expound the principle of law on which these prior judgments are founded.

The objection is rested on these considerations, that the panel is an Englishman; that the only fraud or criminal act alleged against him was committed in England; that he never was in Scotland, and is not subject to the criminal law or to the jurisdiction of the criminal Courts of Scotland; that criminal jurisdiction does not extend extra territorium, and that the true foundation of ordinary criminal jurisdiction is the locus delicti.

The argument is certainly plausible, and there is, at first sight, something startling and paradoxical in the proposition that a man may commit a crime in a place in which he was never personally present. The proposition is nevertheless not only technically or constructively, but actually, true; and if this is so, then the Court of the territory where the crime was committed, and where the panel was never personally present, has jurisdiction ratione loci delicti, and No. 13.

the whole argument of the objector falls.

June 17, 1881.

Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Witherington.

The best and most conclusive example, to my mind, in support of the truth of the above proposition, is the case of a murder by poisoning, which takes place in Edinburgh, while the murderer is domiciled and resident in London, and never was in Scotland. The manner in which the murderer accomplishes his purpose is to send by post, or otherwise, to his victim in Edinburgh, a packet of deadly poison, recommending it to him (knowingly and maliciously for the purpose of accomplishing the death) as a salutary medicine fitted to cure a disease under which he is labouring. If the victim acts on the suggestion and swallows the poison it is not doubtful that a murder has been committed in Edinburgh, and that the murderer was in London all the while. The species facti may be varied by supposing that the murderer employs an innocent agent to take the poison to the victim in Edinburgh, and persuade him to swallow it as a useful and potent medicine. The result is the same—the crime is committed in Edinburgh by a man who was never there. Baron Hume, in treating of criminal jurisdiction, after stating that this Court can never sustain its own jurisdiction against a Scotchman, ratione domicilii, for a murder or other crime committed beyond the limits of Scotland, proceeds to say—"It does not, however, follow that the law shall apply to those offences which have a continuance of time and succession of acts whereof part may happen here and part abroad. If one compose and print a libel in England and circulate it here, or if one forge a deed abroad and utter it here, certainly the proper Courts for the trial of such a case are those of this country, since it is here that the main act is done which completes the crime, . . . nay, more, it may be plausibly argued that he shall be subjected to the same course of trial who shall write an incendiary letter in England, and put it into a course of conveyance thence, by means of which it is received by the person to whom it is addressed in Scotland." In support of this latter statement the learned author cites a case which actually occurred in 1818.

Mr Alison, in his Practice of the Criminal Law, following the earlier authority, says,—“The principle applies to one who writes an incendiary letter in England and sends it down, whether by post or otherwise, to this country. He stands in the same position with one who, standing on the English side of the border, discharges a gun at a man on the Scotch side, and no reasonable doubt can be entertained of the competence of trying him in this country, where his crime has taken its destined effect.”

To shew that this doctrine is not peculiar to the law of Scotland it may be worth while to advert to a very good example in support of the general proposition which I have advanced, stated by Mr Justice Story (Conflict of Laws, sec. 625, b), as having occurred in the Supreme Court of New York. A citizen of Ohio had written what is called a fraudulent paper addressed to citizens of New York, which made him liable to punishment as for a criminal offence. He sent the paper to New York by an innocent agent, and it was there published and the offence there completed. “The defendant being afterwards indicted in New York for the offence, pleaded that he was a natural-born citizen of Ohio, and owed allegiance to that state; that he had never been within the state of New York, and that the fraudulent paper was executed in Ohio. It was determined that this was no answer to the indictment.”

In all the examples which I have adduced the commencement of the criminal action is in one country and the completion of it in another. But in most of

No. 13. these cases the perpetrator's success in his criminal object is necessary to complete the crime. In the case of poisoners there would have been no murder if the victim had not swallowed the poison, and in the case of incendiary letters there would have been no completed crime if they had not been received by the persons to whom they were addressed. There might, no doubt, have been in either case an attempt to commit a crime, which might have been criminally punishable, but the crime intended would not have been effected.

There are crimes of a different description which may be fully committed without the criminal succeeding in the object for which he commits the crime. The most obvious of these are forging and uttering. If a man forges a bill of exchange or a bank cheque, and sends it by post or by messenger to a correspondent for the purpose of its being used and acted on as genuine, the crime is completed as soon as the document passes out of his own possession or control, although the forgery may be immediately afterwards detected, and no one is injured. A good example of this occurs in the case of Smith, 2 Couper, p. 1.

Now, the question of jurisdiction here seems to me to depend on whether the offence charged in this indictment belongs to the former or the latter of these descriptions of crime.

The false and fraudulent representations are contained in a letter written in Blackburn. But the writing of that letter was not in itself a criminal act. The sending of the letter to Muirhead and its receipt by him would still fall short of constituting the crime charged. It is the success of the scheme which is necessary to complete the crime, and without such success in imposing upon Muirhead and inducing him to send the goods ordered there would be no ground for this indictment. While, therefore, the initiatory act of writing and posting the letter takes place in Blackburn, every other step in the action which is necessary to the constitution of the crime takes place in Edinburgh. It is here that Muirhead is imposed on and induced to believe the false and fraudulent representations of the panel; it is here that he acts on the belief so fraudulently created and delivers the goods in Scotland to a public carrier, who is thereby constituted the innocent agent of the panel in carrying out the fraudulent scheme to its completion. When the goods were delivered to the carrier they passed beyond the control of Muirhead, and the imposition was successful and complete. The poison contained in the Blackburn letter had done its work. For these reasons, I am of opinion that Edinburgh is the locus delicti in the present case, just as much as if the panel had sent either an accomplice or an innocent agent to carry out his fraudulent scheme to completion in Edinburgh.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to both questions which have been argued I am of opinion that they are foreclosed by authority, and ought not to be reopened. As regards the point on the relevancy which has been stated regarding the effect of a charge of obtaining goods without the intention of paying for them, or with the intention of not paying for them, I am of opinion that the relevancy of such a charge is no longer a matter of question. It was held to be so, late in the last century, and the judgment in the case of Hall, referred to by Baron Hume, has been followed by repeated subsequent decisions, and has been followed ever since by an unbroken chain of practice. It would, I think, be of the worst example, and could only detract from the stability of the law and the respect due to our judgments, if a point settled by so much weight of authority were considered as a matter of controversy. On the other question also—that of our jurisdiction to try this question—I adhere to the views expressed by Lord Neaves in the case of Bradbury, and those of Lord Ardmillan in the case of Allan, delivered nine years ago, and followed in numberless cases since. But in addition to what has fallen from your Lordship I shall say a word or two on the ingenious argument submitted to us from the bar, the ingenuity and ability of which were marked, but not more so than the fallacies on which it was built. As a question of international jurisprudence this point is ruled by the most elementary rules of international law. Two elements are requisite to complete the jurisdiction of any criminal Court, and these must coincide. The crime must be committed within the territory; and the Court must have power over the person of the criminal. But if these do coincide, no further question remains.

No. 13.

Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Witherington.

As to the first, every State has the right to punish offences committed within its territory, whatever may be the nationality or residence of the offender. This is, of course, the fundamental principle of civil government, and is of universal application. On the second, it may, no doubt, be that the culprit resides beyond the territory, and so beyond the executive power of the Court; but if the executive authority of the country where he resides thinks fit, by treaty or by legislation, to come in aid of the authorities in the locus delicti, that difficulty disappears, and if so, no further question can arise.

Now, here, in my opinion, the crime is sufficiently alleged in the indictment to have been committed in Scotland. It is said that the trader who was defrauded was a Scottish trader; he resided in Scotland; his goods of which he was defrauded were in Scotland, and he parted with them in Scotland in consequence of the fraudulent representations of the accused. It can make no difference that the letters which led to the fraud were written in England. They were intended to take effect, and did take effect in Scotland, and I know of no privilege which an Englishman has to commit offences in Scotland which a Scotchman could not plead.

As to the power of this Court over the person of the accused there is no question. The accused sits at our bar. He is not said to be there illegally, but, on the contrary, he is there through the intervention of an Act of Parliament. Both elements of jurisdiction therefore in this case concur.

LORD DEAR.—I entirely concur with both your Lordships upon this important question of jurisdiction, if indeed it can be called a question at the present day, after having been so repeatedly and solemnly decided. And I particularly agree with the observations of the Lord Justice-Clerk as regards the question of relevancy, and that it is quite enough to constitute a relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition to set forth that a panel, in pursuance of a fraudulent and felonious scheme to obtain the goods of others on false pretences without paying or intending to pay for the same, passes himself off as a bona fide purchaser, and so obtains and appropriates the goods which he does not pay for, and which he all along intended not to pay for. Innumerable indictments framed on this principle applicable to varying circumstances have been sustained, sometimes on argument, and frequently in respect the question was understood by the bar to be no longer open. It is not essential, in order to form a precedent that an indictment should have been objected to and the objection repelled. It is the duty and the practice of every Judge of the Court of Justiciary to examine carefully every indictment, whether objected to or not, and to find it

No. 13. irrelevant if it be so. It would be very remarkable if this were otherwise—if some parties were to be carelessly tried and convicted for alleged crimes which were not relevantly libelled, and which in the case of others similarly indicted were dealt with as no crimes at all. That has never been the practice in this country. Upon the long and elaborate interlocutors of relevancy formerly pronounced a great part of our criminal law is founded.

As regards the remark made that a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition ought to specify, inter alia, what the particular falsehood was, I have to observe that a false representation may be, and very often is, just as plainly made by the mere acts done as by words spoken. For instance, I tried a case on Circuit (Wilkie, 3 Coup. 102) in which the panel had contrived to live sumptuously, for how long I do not remember, by frequenting a succession of hotels in different localities, and without paying any bills at any of them, walking out on some slight pretence, saying he meant to return immediately, or very shortly, but never doing so. The false representation here consisted solely in assuming the manner and appearance of a bona fide customer. The case was keenly defended, but the jury, having the whole circumstances before them, had no difficulty in finding him guilty as libelled.

As regards the question of jurisdiction which has been of new debated in this case of Witherington, it is just as little open as the question of relevancy to which I have just alluded. Both points were involved in the indictment now lying on the bench against John Irwin Watson, who was tried before me at Glasgow in September 1879. Watson resided in Liverpool, where he was apprehended and brought to Scotland to answer to the charges against him. The indictment set forth in the major proposition that "falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition is a crime of an heinous nature, and severely punishable: yet true it is and of verity that you, the said John Irwin Watson, are guilty of the said crime, actor or art and part: in so far as you, having formed a fraudulent and felonious scheme for the purpose of obtaining the goods of others, and applying the same to your own uses and purposes without paying or intending to pay therefor, you, the said John Irwin Watson, did, in pursuance of the said fraudulent scheme (1), on or about the 10th day of September 1878, in or near Lower Breck Road, Annfield, Liverpool, or at some other place in Liverpool to the prosecutor unknown, wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently, write or cause or procure to be written and transmitted by post, a letter bearing the subscription 'D. Fisher,' or a similar subscription, addressed to Robert Robin, wine and spirit merchant, 62 Argyle Street, Glasgow, in the following or similar terms:—'10/9/78—Dear Mr Robin,—Since leaving Glasgow I can't get any whisky here as I like. Please send me two galls. of your very best per rail. Cheque on receipt.—Truly yours, D. Fisher,'"—which letter was duly received in course of post by the person to whom it was addressed, and the whisky forwarded by rail accordingly, and delivery obtained by the panel at the offices of the Globe Parcels Express Company in North St John Street, Liverpool, on 12th September 1878, and fraudulently appropriated by the panel to his own uses and purposes, "and you have not paid and did not intend to pay for the said goods," and the owner had thereby been defrauded by the panel.

The indictment contained thirteen other charges of a similar nature, all of them, with few exceptions, applicable to whisky, from January 1878 to January 1879 inclusive. The panel ultimately pleaded guilty to nine of these charges, and received sentence of three years' penal servitude.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion on both points. The questions are important, but I cannot say that I have felt any difficulty on either of them.

As regards the relevancy of the indictment, that is, I think, clear, even according to the strictest rules of law which have been applied in dealing with crimes of this description. For it contains in the minor proposition, as I read it, the three leading constituent elements of the crime of "falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition." There is a distinct allegation (1) of "the assumption of a false character;" (2) of the fraudulent use of the letter or letters in which that false character was assumed; and (3) of the successful imposition on the parties to whom the letters were addressed, whereby the panel obtained delivery of goods, which he appropriated to his own uses and purposes, without having paid, and without having had any intention of paying therefor. These points being established in evidence, I cannot doubt that the panel must be held guilty of the crime charged in the major proposition of the indictment.

The question of jurisdiction I consider settled by decision, and now no longer open. It was deliberately so settled in this Court in the cases of Bradbury and of Allan, to which your Lordships have referred, and if the records of the Court were carefully examined I have no doubt that a course of practice would be disclosed in which parties charged with committing the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, in circumstances substantially similar to those which are here libelled, viz., of the crime being conceived or planned in England by parties residing there, but perpetrated or completed in Scotland, have been tried and convicted here. But even if the question were open I should have had no difficulty in concurring. The authority of the leading writers on criminal law and on the sources of criminal jurisdiction in Scotland to which your Lordship in the chair has referred are clear upon the subject, and seem to me conclusive of the question. And the illustrations given appear to me to proceed upon a fair application of the principles upon which the doctrine of crimen continuum is based. Because while the crime is here charged as having been conceived in England, it was substantially perpetrated in Scotland. This was, I think, very clearly brought out in the few observations which fell from the Solicitor-General on this point, when he said that the imposition was not effected till the letter reached the person to whom it was written and addressed in Edinburgh. It was in Scotland, therefore, that the party addressed was deceived and imposed upon, and it was in Scotland that he parted with his goods. And these facts being so averred, Scotland is, I think, a locus the Courts of which have jurisdiction to try the case.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. Both questions are, I think, foreclosed by authority, and the objection against relevancy is foreclosed not only by the recent cases of Bradbury and Allan, but also by the case of Hall in 1849, and the still earlier case of Hall decided in 1789, the circumstances of which are mentioned in pp. 172-73 of the first volume of Hume's Commentaries. These cases, and the practice which has followed upon them, leave no doubt as to the law. The question as to jurisdiction is, as I have said, also foreclosed, inas-

No. 13. much as it was expressly decided in the cases of Bradbury and Allan already mentioned.

Her Majesty's

Even, however, if there had been no previous decisions to guide us, I should have come, without any difficulty, to the conclusion that neither objection could be sustained. It is not doubtful, in my opinion, that the allegations in the minor support the major proposition of this indictment, nor that if these averments are true, an offence was committed in Scotland. That being so, we must have jurisdiction over the criminal, whoever he may be, or wherever he was at the time the offence was committed. If, indeed, it was the law of Scotland that though a crime was committed, the person committing it could not be held answerable unless he was at the time upon the spot, an objection against jurisdiction in this case would have been formidable, seeing that the accused remained in England doing what was done through the intervention of others. Once grant, however, that a person may be guilty of a crime, although not personally on the spot when it was committed, and the unsoundness of the objection must also be conceded. For it cannot be that the Courts in Scotland are not entitled to try those who are guilty of crimes committed in Scotland, and that there may be accession without personal presence is shewn by what has occurred in many departments of the criminal law, notoriously in the case of persons who through another utter a forged writing or utter base coin. Nay, he may even be art and part in the commission of theft though personally far away at the time from the scene of depredation, and even ignorant of the particular offence which was in contemplation. These things are proved by the practice of this Court. Cases as to uttering I think it unnecessary to cite, but as accession without personal presence in the commission of theft is of less frequent occurrence, I cite three of the cases by which the law upon this subject is illustrated. These are the case of Walker, the date of which is 1801, the case of Wright, the date of which is 1802, and the case of Wilson v. Macdonald, the date of which is 1818. The two first are referred to and commented on by Mr Burnett in his treatise on the Criminal Law, pp. 275 and 555, and all three are set forth in the notes upon p. 116 of the first volume of the Commentaries of Baron Hume.

Indictment—Relevancy—Refusal of leave to desert diet pro loco et tempore—Dismissal of panel from bar—Re-indictment for same offence—Competency.—Where a libel was found not relevant, and the Court refused a motion by the Advocate-Depute to desert the diet pro loco et tempore, and dismissed the panel from the bar, held that the prosecutor was not barred from raising a new libel for the same offence.

Observed that when the diet is deserted simpliciter on the motion of the prosecutor, he is barred from further proceedings for the same offence.

Ante, p. 28.

JOHN HALL was charged on 25th March 1881, at the Circuit Court at Perth, before Lord Young, with the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition.

The record of the Court bore—"John Hall (falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition). Objections having been stated to the relevancy of the libel by Mr Jameson, on behalf of the panel, Lord Young finds the libel not relevant. G. YOUNG.

"The Court dismissed the panel from the bar. ÆNEAS M'BEAN."

Hall was some time after re-apprehended under a new warrant, and was re-indicted for the same offences with which he had been charged at Perth, alteration having been made on the indictment to meet the objections sustained by Lord Young.

On 13th June, before a full bench, objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the Court. This objection was identical with that taken in the case of Witherington, ante, p. 41, and the judgment of the Court pronounced upon 17th June ruled it also. The objection of want of jurisdiction was therefore repelled, and the indictment was found relevant.

Counsel for the panel thereupon took the further objection that, the panel having been dismissed from the bar at the Circuit Court by the presiding Judge, no further proceedings were competent for the same offences libelled in the first indictment.

It was stated from the bar that at the Circuit Court the indictment having been found irrelevant, the Advocate-Depute (Taylor Innes) moved the Court for leave to desert the diet pro loco et tempore, and that leave was refused by Lord Young.

Argued for panel;—It being admitted that the Court had refused the motion to desert the diet against the panel pro loco et tempore, and dismissed him from the bar, further proceedings for the same offence were incompetent. A criminal diet must either (1) be continued to a day certain; (2) be deserted pro loco et tempore; or (3) be deserted simpliciter.¹ The calling of the diet was the act of the Court,² and it is in the power of the Court if they are not satisfied to grant the prosecutor's motion for a desertion pro loco et tempore, to refuse to desert otherwise than simpliciter. That latter right is at times exercised.³ There were not many instances of refusal of the motion to desert pro loco et tempore, because it was usually granted almost as matter of course. It was, however, refused in the case of M'Atamney.⁴ In this matter the case of a libel being found relevant does not differ from the case of a libel being found irrelevant. If the prosecutor admittedly cannot go on, and the Court refuses to desert otherwise than simpliciter, it must import that the Court does not wish a new prosecution to be raised. There is, indeed, express authority for the proposition in the case of *Tabram*¹, in the opinion of Lord Ardmillan. If these new proceedings were allowed the prosecutor, after the motion for desertion pro loco et tempore was refused, would be precisely in the same position as if it had been granted. The motion must have been refused to stop future proceedings, and for no other reason.

Argued for the Lord Advocate;—There was nothing in the fact that a libel was found irrelevant, and that the panel was allowed to go from the LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The panel here declines to plead to this indictment, on the ground of certain proceedings which took place at the last Perth Circuit, where he was indicted for the same offence, and of which this is the record :—"John Hall was indicted and accused of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. Objections having been stated to the relevancy of the libel on behalf of the panel, Lord Young finds the libel not relevant. The Court dismissed the panel from the bar." That is the whole record. We are told that the Advocate-Depute, on the libel being found irrelevant, made a motion to the Court to desert the diet pro loco et tempore, and that that motion was refused. It does not appear to me that the fact of that motion having been made and refused affects the question before us at all. The question is, What is the effect of the Court having dismissed the panel from the bar? Now, when a libel is found irrelevant the course which is very usually followed is that the prosecutor moves the Court to desert the diet pro loco et tempore. But supposing the prosecutor not to do so—supposing he makes no motion at all—it is plain that the process must be got rid of somehow or other, and I apprehend that that is the very position of matters to which the observation of Baron Hume refers (vol. ii. 277), where he says—"If the Court desert the diet on account of some objection to the citation, or the form or relevancy of the libel, this also of its own nature is a special judgment relative only to that particular process, and it cannot hinder the raising of a new libel in better form." That means, according to my reading of it, that whether the prosecutor make any motion on the subject or not, if the libel is found irrelevant, the Court must get rid of the process, and may do so by deserting the diet simpliciter. But whether the diet is deserted simpliciter or not, or whether the Court simply dismisses the panel from the bar in respect of the libel being found irrelevant, it rather appears to me that the result will be the same. Dismissing the panel from the bar seems the logical consequence of finding the libel irrelevant. There could be no further prosecution when the libel was found irrelevant. There could not be a single step taken further. The case is at an end, but it could not hinder the raising of a new process. This, however, is an entirely different proceeding from another which Baron Hume mentions, where the prosecutor moves the Court to desert the diet simpliciter. The effect of that is quite different, and it has been adjudged in a well-known case what that effect is. Baron Hume says—"If a prosecutor being present shall himself move the Court to desert the diet simpliciter, and thus neither allude to any dilatory cause for dropping his present libel nor intimate any purpose to raise a new one, such a measure cannot well be construed otherwise than as a thorough relinquishment or discharge of his right of prosecution. This construction was finally settled in the case of William Leslie, where the libel having been deserted simpliciter on the prosecutor's own motion, he was found to have raised a bar thereby in the way of all further process at his instance. In truth, judgment seems to have been given to the same effect long ago in the case of John Leith & Others, Nov. 20, 1671." Now, it appears to me that that expounds the law in this matter quite consistently, and very clearly, to be that the desertion of a diet simpliciter on the motion of the prosecutor is an end of all proceedings against the panel for the offence libelled against him. But nothing that follows in ordinary course upon finding a libel irrelevant can have that effect. It does not matter whether the diet is deserted on the motion of the prosecutor pro loco et tempore, or whether, failing any motion on his part, the Judge simply gets rid of the process by turning it out of Court and dismissing the prisoner from the bar. I am therefore of opinion that this is a bad objection.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entertain no doubt at all upon the point which has been raised, and I entirely concur with your Lordship. I only wish to add, that my impression is that the distinction between an interlocutor deserting the diet simpliciter and one deserting the diet pro loco et tempore seems to be that in the first case the process is ended, while in the second it remains to this effect, that a new libel only requires to be served to render all the previous procedure available. The effect of this distinction, however, would require further consideration. It does not affect the question of the right to raise a new libel. The mere finding of a libel irrelevant, and a consequent interlocutor deserting the diet simpliciter, and dismissing the panel from the bar, is only a termination to that process. It is not a bar to a new libel differently framed unless it have proceeded on the motion of the prosecutor. That being my opinion, I concur in holding that the objection should not be sustained.

Statute—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 6, sub-sec. 4—Buttermilk—Extraneous matter necessary in preparation of article.—Sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, sets forth that "no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, . . . provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section . . . (4) where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation."

A person was convicted of an offence under the said section for selling buttermilk containing "30 per cent of added water," to the prejudice of the purchaser. On appeal the Court quashed the conviction, on the ground that as the only charge was that of selling buttermilk with a certain quantity of added water, and it had been proved that the addition of some water was necessary in the process of manufacture, the case fell under the exception of sub-sec. 4. (Lord Young, while concurring, preferring to rest his judgment on the ground that the facts did not amount to a contravention of the 6th section of the statute, inasmuch as the water was not proved to have been added with the intention of cheating the public, or to the prejudice of the purchaser.)

Question (per Lord Justice-Clerk) whether sub-sec. 4 did not exclude the possibility of a conviction in respect of the sale of any articles in which extraneous matter was necessarily mixed in the course of preparation or collection, however great the proportion of that extraneous matter might be.

IN the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Airdrie, James Warnock, farmer at South Howden farm, in the parish of Bothwell, was charged, at the instance of Arthur Johnstone, inspector of nuisances for the said parish, with an offence within the meaning of sec. 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875,* "in so far as on Tuesday, the 10th day of May 1881 years, the said James Warnock did, by himself, on or near the public road leading through Mossend, in the parish of Bothwell aforesaid, . . . sell to the said Arthur Johnstone a pennyworth of buttermilk, being an article of food, which article of food, when so sold as aforesaid, was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, having been found on analysis to contain 30 per cent of added water, and was so sold as aforesaid to the prejudice of the said Arthur Johnstone, the purchaser thereof."

On 8th June 1881, evidence having been led in the case, the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) found the charge proven, and imposed a mitigated penalty of five shillings, "as it was stated that this was the first case of the kind in the district."

Warnock demanded a case for the consideration of the High Court of Justiciary.

The following facts were stated in the case:—The appellant, on the day libelled, sold to the respondent one pennyworth of buttermilk. The respondent thereupon divided the milk into three parts "by putting it into three bottles, and gave one of them to the appellant; that he then stated to the appellant that the milk was to be analysed by a public analyst; and that, after so stating this, the appellant told the inspector that the milk contained water. After the inspector sealed the article, a portion was sent to the public analyst," John Clark, "who furnished a certificate in reference thereto in the following terms:—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879. I, the undersigned, public analyst for the county of Lanark, do hereby certify that I received on the 11th day of May 1881 from you a sample of buttermilk, marked No. 12, securely sealed, for analysis; and have analysed the same, and declare the result of my analysis to be as follows:—I am of opinion that this buttermilk is diluted with 30 per cent of added water. Note.—In cold weather it is customary to add hot water to milk which is to be churned to bring up the temperature, but in no case is it necessary to add more than 20 per cent. . . .—JOHN CLARK, Ph.D., at 138 Bath Street, Glasgow.'

"The analyst, when examined, proved his report, and stated that in no case was it necessary to add more than 20 per cent of water to the milk; and that the opinion of the trade, so far as he knew, was that 20 per cent of water was quite sufficient."

"For the defence four farmers were examined, who all had considerable experience as to churning, and who disposed of their buttermilk in a similar manner to the appellant, and who stated that it was necessary at all times to use water in churning, and that they had always done so, and spoke to its being a universal and well-known practice.

"The quantity of water required, they explained, varied considerably, and depended for the most part on the state of the temperature, as the milk would only churn when brought up to and kept at a temperature of about 60 degrees. No. 15.

* Sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, enacts:—"No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding £20, provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases,—that is to say . . . (4) where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation. . . ."

"Three of these spoke to varying quantities of water being used up to 25 per cent, while the fourth stated that water to the extent of 30, 40, and even as much as 50 per cent might be required. . . . Two parties who had purchased buttermilk from the appellant testified that they considered it as fair good buttermilk, and quite up to the quality of that sold in the neighbourhood. July 15, 1881.
Warnock v.
Johnstone.

"The appellant stated that he sold the article to the inspector in the same state as that in which it came from the churn, no additional water having been put into it."

The questions of law stated for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Whether the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, that the sample in question contained 30 per cent of added water, was justified by the evidence submitted on the point; and, if not, whether the conviction can stand. (2) Seeing that water is invariably used in churning, and is necessary for the preparation of buttermilk, whether the case does not fall under exception 4 to clause 6 of the 'Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875'; and, if so, whether the conviction can stand. (3) Whether, in the state of the foregoing facts, it can be held that it was sufficiently brought to the knowledge of the purchaser that he was purchasing an article containing water; and, if so, whether the sale could be said to be to the prejudice of the purchaser; and, if not to the prejudice of the purchaser, whether the conviction can stand. (4) Whether, seeing the appellant only sold as buttermilk an article of food well known invariably to contain a greater or less extent of water, and that without the purchaser making any reference as to the quality, the section founded on justified the judgment pronounced; and, if not, whether the conviction can stand. (5) Whether or not, in the whole circumstances, upon the evidence above stated, the appellant was properly convicted under the statutes founded on."

Argued for the appellant;—The article sold to the respondent was of the nature, substance, and quality of that demanded, and was not sold to him to his prejudice. There was no recognised standard of purity in buttermilk. Further, the case fell under the exception set forth in sub-section 4 of the 6th section of the Act, as it was proved and stated as a fact by the Sheriff that water was invariably added to the milk before the process of churning commenced, and was necessary for the preparation of buttermilk.

Argued for the respondent;—The question was one purely of fact, and the Sheriff's judgment was therefore final. He had stated as fact that there was more water in the sample analysed than was necessary, and therefore the 4th sub-section did not apply. The proportion of extraneous matter necessary was a question for the Sheriff alone, and his decision was not subject to review on that point.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this appeal ought to be sustained. To the 6th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, on which this prosecution proceeds, there is in the 4th sub-section an exception expressed in very general terms:—"Where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation," then no offence shall be deemed to have been committed.

Now, here we are not called upon to decide whether, where there is an unreasonable quantity of such extraneous matter found in any food or drug, it may not be the subject of a prosecution under the section. That may be doubtful, as it is not by any means clearly stated whether there is not an exception made of all articles with extraneous matter necessarily in them. If such a case was meant to be made here, then certainly the libel does not cover it, for in that case it should have been set forth that it was well known what quantity of that extraneous matter there should be in the substance when sold. Now, there is no statement of that kind in the case here at all. On these grounds the difficulty which I confess at first I had, as to how far we could go behind the evidence set forth by the Sheriff, is met by the terms of the second question for our consideration. In the case he tells us, as fact, that water is invariably used in churning, and is necessary for the preparation of buttermilk. That being so, I think the case is within the exception. I must say that I think this is by no means a profitable kind of prosecution, and ought never to have been brought. Looking at the facts stated in the case, I cannot say that I think the quantity of water found in the buttermilk was so extravagant as—if a prosecution could be brought on that ground—to afford ground for a conviction; but we need not decide that question now. I think the appeal should be sustained.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. I assume the facts to be as stated. I assume that prior to the churning, of which this buttermilk was one of the results, 30 per cent of water was added. The Sheriff finds that that was so. I assume, further, that the analyst thought that no more than 20 per cent of water should have been added. The Sheriff, however, informs us that certain dairymen and farmers were of a different opinion to the analyst as to the quantity of water needful or advisable, and, with great respect to the Sheriff's judgment, I cannot help thinking that these dairymen and farmers, if their evidence is to be relied on, are the best judges on the matter. Now, the result of churning is to produce butter, and a fluid which, ever since churning was known in this country, is called buttermilk, and that without any reference to analysis as to the quantity of water added before the churning took place. Well, without challenging the Sheriff in any of his findings in fact, I suppose that buttermilk is a lawful article of commerce, and that to sell it under that name is not illegal. The buttermilk might have been adulterated for the purpose of cheating the public by concealing its quality. But I find no suggestion of that here. Where, then, is the contravention of this 6th section? How was the purchaser prejudiced? I cannot see it. It is not suggested that the article was not worth the money given for it; all that is said is that the analyst says there should only be 20 per cent of water added before churning, and in that he is contradicted by the trade.

I think this prosecution should never have been instituted. It is an abuse of the statute. I do not care to put my judgment on the 4th sub-section alone, for I think it more wholesome to rest it on the more general grounds which I have stated, that the facts set forth do not shew a contravention of the section itself; but, with reference to the 4th sub-section, I am disposed to agree that the statute does not apply to a greater or less quantity of extraneous matter being used in the manufacture of the article. The skill of manufacture consists in determining the quantity of ingredients to be used in the operation. But, still agreeing on that point, I wish to rest my judgment on the grounds I first stated.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair in your grounds of judgment, and with both your Lordships in the decision arrived at. I think the case falls under the 4th sub-section, and is not one in which, on the facts stated, there ought to have been a conviction. The Sheriff states that without water buttermilk cannot be made, and on that ground I think the conviction cannot stand. With reference to what Lord Young said, I wish to add that I do not think this is a question of fraud at all. For wise purposes the Legislature has thought fit to make this section, and if any person supplies to another a different subject to what was asked for, and it is proved to be to the purchaser's prejudice, then there is a contravention of the statute. Prejudice is an easy word to understand. Where a person gets a substance different in nature, quality, or substance from what he asked for, then, unless the contrary be proved, there is that in the case which may be taken as a contravention. The question here is, was this an article different in quality, nature, or substance from what was demanded? It appears to me that it was not, because it, from the mode of its manufacture, necessarily contained water.

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

1880-81.

WINTER SESSION.

ANGUS KENNEDY, Appellant.—Patten.

JOHN ALEXANDER, Objector and Respondent.—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 1.

Nov. 8, 1880.

County Franchise—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 9, Kennedy v. and schedule G—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 6—Tenant and Occupant—Entry in Register—Necessity for statement of occupancy on the Roll.
—Held that “tenant” is a sufficient entry in the qualification column of the register of voters, without the addition of the words “and occupant,” even in cases where “actual personal occupancy” is essential to the qualification.

JOHN ALEXANDER objected to Angus Kennedy, who appeared on the Registration roll of voters for 1879 as “Angus Kennedy, farmer, joint tenant, farm, Achslair,” being continued on the roll of voters for Argyllshire, in respect that the qualification set forth in the electoral register was insufficient under the Act of 1868.* The rental of the farm was £71, and there were three joint tenants. The lease was under fifty-seven years.

The Sheriff (Forbes Irvine) sustained the objection, and expunged Kennedy’s name from the roll.

Kennedy took a case.

The facts as stated in the case were,—“The assessor, in correcting the register, had added the words ‘and occupant’ to the qualification without a new claim or notice on the church doors. The original entry was objected to, and also the addition made, as ultra vires of the assessor. I was asked to add the words ‘and occupant,’ but I declined to do so, in respect it appears to me to be a change of qualification, and beyond the powers conferred on me by the 44th section of the County Voters Act.”

The questions of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal were (1)

* Sec. 9 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, enacts, inter alia, that tenants in lands, &c. shall be entitled to a vote “where such tenant shall, for the foresaid period of twelve months, have been in the actual personal occupancy of any such subject where the yearly rent is not less than fifty pounds,” &c. Sec. 6 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, enacts, inter alia, that every person shall be entitled to vote who “is and has been during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the last day of July in the actual personal occupancy as tenant of lands and heritages within the county of the annual value of fourteen pounds or upwards, as appearing on the valuation-roll of such county.”

Kennedy v.
Alexander.

"Was the original entry in the electoral register sufficient? (2) Had the assessor the power to make the addition above mentioned? And (3) Had the Sheriff the power to do so?"

Argued for the appellant (Ques. 1);—The original entry on the roll was sufficient without the addition of the words "and occupant." No change in the form of the schedule G, No. 1, according to which the register was made up under the Act of 1832, had been made by the Act of 1868. By that schedule "tenant" was all the entry required on the roll, and yet in certain cases "actual personal occupancy" was required under that Act to entitle the tenant to be put upon the roll as much as it is required by sec. 6 of the Act of 1868. There being no change introduced by the Act of 1868, the words "and occupant" were superfluous. If the first question was answered in the affirmative it was unnecessary for the Court to answer the second and third, as in that case the alteration complained of was unnecessary.

Argued for respondent (Ques. 1);—The words "and occupant" were necessary to be entered on the roll to shew that the voter was qualified under the provisions of the 1868 Act. Under that Act personal occupancy was in all cases required, and the only classes of tenancy which under the Act of 1832 afforded a right of voting without "actual personal occupancy" were tenancy under a lease for fifty-seven years where the tenant's annual interest in the subjects was not less than £10, and tenancy under a lease for nineteen years where his annual interest was not less than £50. Now, the valuation-roll proved that this voter could not be enrolled as joint tenant of this farm under either of these classes, as the rent was only sufficient to afford a qualification for one tenant, and here there were three joint tenants. Prima facie, therefore, it appeared from the roll that this voter had not a good qualification; the addition of the words "and occupant" would shew the true state of affairs. At present the voter was registered on a qualification which he did not possess.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I have listened attentively to the arguments on all the questions set forth in the case, and the consideration I have given to them leads me to say that I think the appellant is entitled to succeed on the first question, and therefore, if your Lordships concur in that view, it will be unnecessary to go any further into the inquiry.

The appellant stood on the roll for 1879 as joint tenant. There were three tenants on the farm, and the rent was £71, which gave him the necessary qualification under section 6 of the Act of 1868. But it is necessary under that section that a tenant should not merely be a tenant, but that he should also be in "actual personal occupancy," so this voter might be a joint tenant, and yet he might not have the statutory qualification. There is no doubt about that. Now, the way the appellant was enrolled was as "joint tenant;" there was nothing about occupancy in the roll of 1879; and that being so, this objection was taken. If it is necessary not only that there should be personal occupancy, but that it should be set forth on the roll, it is plain that the objection is good. If, on the other hand, the last is not necessary, then the objection is plainly bad. I have come to the conclusion that the circumstance of actual personal occupancy is not required as a statutory provision to be set forth on the roll. I do not doubt that, if not always, it has frequently been inserted in the roll since 1868, but it appears to me that the effect of this section of the 1868 Act, shortly stated, is nothing but a reduction of one of the qualifications created by the Act of 1832. Under the 9th section of that Act there were tenants of three classes—first, tenants under leases of fifty-seven years, who, whether in actual occupancy or not, were entitled to be on the roll if the clear yearly value of their interest was not less than £10; second, tenants in the same position as to occupancy if they held under a nineteen years' lease and the clear yearly value of their interest was not less than £50; and last of all, tenants who were entitled to be put on the roll if their rent amounted to £50, even if they had nothing but a lease from year to year, but then it was necessary that they should be in actual personal occupancy. Now, these last are, it appears to me, in precisely the same position as tenants under the 1868 Act. Both may be merely tenants from year to year, but both must be in actual personal occupancy. But it was not required by the Act of 1832 that occupancy should be set forth on the register. The schedule to that Act shews the contrary. If the voter is to be registered as proprietor he is described as such; and if as tenant—whether occupancy is or is not required as part of his qualification—he is to be described as tenant. All this being so, and no change having been made with regard to the form of registration by the Act of 1868, I cannot see why we are to have a different form of registration under this Act from what we had under the Act of 1832. I am of opinion, therefore, that we should sustain the appeal on the first question submitted to us, and I think it unnecessary to give any answer to the second and third.

Alexander.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, and have come to it without much difficulty. I think it very important to start with this, that it is not said that the appellant was not entitled to a vote. But it is argued that he is to be struck off the roll this year because in the old electoral roll he was not properly entered as to his qualification, and because in making up the new roll there was no means of altering the description. Now, I agree that there is no statutory regulation requiring that when a person's qualification depends on occupancy, the fact of occupancy shall be mentioned in the roll. It is contended, on the other hand, that the schedule of the Act of 1832, though it has only columns for proprietors and tenants, means that in those columns you shall also describe the essential requisites without which the tenant or proprietor would not be entitled to the franchise. Were we to hold this it would be to make a new statutory requisite. The policy of the Act is that everyone who is really entitled to a vote should be put on the roll. Now, in the first place, the electoral roll is to be in the form prescribed by the Act of 1832; no new schedule is furnished, no new form or column. Under that Act there was a provision for a class of tenants holding from year to year and paying a £50 rent, to whose right to vote personal occupancy was essential—as essential as it now is under the Act of 1868; but it is not said that the fact of occupancy must appear on the electoral roll under the old Act; and I agree therefore with Lord Craighill on the broad ground that it is not necessary to put under different columns of the roll things which the headings of these columns do not require. We need not enter upon the second and third questions, but on the broad ground I agree that the appeal should be sustained.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. This is the case of a person who has stood on the roll, at all events since the year 1879. He had been enrolled as joint tenant, and the presumption is that at the time when he was so put on the register it was ascertained that he had a good qualification. The objection, and the only one now made, is, not that he has not a good qualification, but that joint tenancy is not a qualification on which a party can under the Act of 1868 be allowed to stand on the roll without the addition of the word "occupant." Now, the only difference in this respect which I can see between the Acts of 1832 and 1868 is, that by the 6th section of the Act of 1868 a rental of £14 is sufficient to afford a county qualification, whereas it required £50 to do so under the Act of 1832, and that in the margin of the 6th section of the Act of 1868 the qualification is called an "occupation franchise." The margin, however, is not, strictly speaking, part of the statute. But assuming that it were so, personal occupancy was just as much the basis of the tenancy qualification in the third branch of the 9th section of the Act of 1832 as it is of section 6 of the Act of 1868. Now, if this objection had been raised under the Act of 1832, I do not think it could have been successfully maintained, for the form of register in schedule G of that Act takes no notice of occupancy as a separate qualification. The qualifications at the head of the column are given as those of "proprietor or tenant"; and although the word "occupant" may sometimes have been added after the word "tenant" on the register, there was nothing in the statute to make it imperative to insert that word; and I can find nothing in the Act of 1868 altering the Reform Act of 1832 in the above respects. On these broad grounds I concur in thinking that the entry in the register is sufficient, and that it is unnecessary to give any opinion on the second and third questions. There must therefore be a remit to enrol.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to insert the appellant's name on the roll.

County Franchise—Qualification—Beneficiary—Trust—Heritable or Moveable.—A and his two sisters were the sole surviving beneficiaries under a trust-deed and settlement conveying property both heritable and moveable; the value of the heritable estate being £76 per annum, subject to a feu-duty of £5 per annum, and the amount of the moveable estate £1300. The trustees, of whom A was one, were infeft in the property. Under the trust-deed one-fifth of the whole estate was to be paid over to A, and he was likewise to receive the income of other shares as they fell in. At the date of this case he was entitled to and received seven-fifteenths of the income of the whole estate. The trust-deed contained a power of sale, which had not been exercised. An objection to A's right to be placed on the roll of voters as joint proprietor of the heritable property, on the ground that his right was moveable and not heritable, repelled.

JOHN RAMSAY ANDERSON objected to John Niven, doctor of medicine, who was on the assessor's list, being entered on the roll of voters for the county of Midlothian as "joint proprietor of houses and shop, Currie," on the ground that he was not joint proprietor in the sense of the statute of the said heritable property.

The Sheriff (Davidson) repelled the objection, and admitted Dr Niven to the roll.

The objector took a case.

The facts as stated in the case were—"That under the trust-disposition and settlement of James Abernethy, who died many years ago, Dr John Niven and his two sisters are the only surviving beneficiaries; that Dr Niven is also a trustee under the said deed; that the trust-estate consists of both moveable and heritable estate; that the annual value of the heritable property in the county of Midlothian is £76; that the feu-duty is £5 a-year ; that it is entered in the valuation-roll as belonging to the trustees of the late James Abernethy ; that said trustees are infest in the property ; that the value of the moveable estate is about £1300 ; that under the trust-deed one-fifth of the whole estate is to be paid over to Dr John Niven, and that he is likewise to receive the income of other shares as they fall in ; that he is now entitled to seven-fifteenths of the whole estate ; that said one-fifth has never been made over to him, but that he receives annually seven-fifteenths of the free annual income of the trust-estate, heritable and moveable, no special part thereof being set apart by the trustees to represent his seven-fifteenths ; that the trust-deed contains a power of sale, but the trustees have not exercised that power. The subjects are of sufficient annual value.”

Nov. 8, 1880.
Anderson v.
Niven.

Argued for the appellant ;—The beneficiary's right in the property was not of the nature of a heritable right. The trustees had not actually conveyed to Dr Niven any part of the heritable estate, and were not bound to do so, the moveable estate of the testator being sufficient to enable them, if they saw fit, to pay the beneficiary his shares entirely from that source. The beneficiary could not point to any part of the heritable estate as being specially his.¹

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD MURK.—It appears to me that this judgment was right. Reference was made to the case of Ovens, where Lord Craighill and I gave opinions last year on substantially the same question ; but there is a material difference between the cases, and I have no difficulty as to the broad ground on which that distinction rests. There is here no direction to convert, while in Ovens' case there was an express direction to that effect ; and in compliance with leading decisions on that point we held that the property, in respect of that direction, had been made moveable estate. Here, on the other hand, the property is heritable, and there is a rent of £76, seven-fifteenths of which go to the claimant, and that is more than sufficient value for a qualification. It is said that there is no obligation on the trustees to give Dr Niven any part of the rents of the heritage. That may be, but we are not told that the trustees have withheld any part, and as to whether they could do so I give no opinion. But to the extent of the value of seven-fifteenths of the property it is matter of admission that the proceeds of the heritable estate belong to the claimant. I am therefore of opinion that there is here a heritable right or interest in the beneficiary of the requisite value under the trust-deed, and that in respect of that interest he is entitled to be registered.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the beneficiaries are the real proprietors, the trustees holding merely for their behoof while the property remains unsold and unconverted, and it may never be converted. Are not Dr Niven and his sisters the proprietors of both heritage and moveables ? It will not do to say that the trustees might refuse to give Dr Niven any share of the heritage. The trustees could not do so. Dr Niven is entitled to a share of the heritage as well as of the moveables, and accordingly in point of fact the trustees are giving him seven-fifteenths of the whole estate—that is, of the free rents of the heritage—and the free interest of the moveables. The case might be very different if there were a direction to convert, but the present case is quite distinct—there is only a power to sell. It is not contended that there is here any direction to convert, and there is no allegation of any absolute necessity to convert. The trustees merely hold the estate for behoof of the beneficiaries, not in equal shares, but so that Dr Niven shall have seven-fifteenths, and his sisters the remaining eight-fifteenths among them.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think if we were to decide otherwise we should be unsettling a rule of law fixed by a train of decisions. Dr Niven is a beneficiary; his share of the heritage forming part of the trust-estate is more than is required for a qualification; and this appears to me to be all that is necessary for a vote according to the interpretation of the statutes long since adopted and consistently observed in this Court.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, with expenses.

AT a registration Court for the county of Roxburgh, held by the Sheriff of Roxburghshire (Pattison) at Melrose, a claim was presented for Robert Lockie, Darnick, to have his name entered in the list of voters for the election of a member of Parliament for the said county, his qualification being that of tenant and occupant of house and land in Darnick.

The claim was signed by "Ralph Dunn, solicitor, Melrose, agent for Robert Lockie."

It was objected by Frank Rutherford, writer, Galashiels, a registered voter for the said county, that the claim could not be received as not being signed by the claimant himself, and that Mr Dunn had no written mandate or authority to sign it when he did so. The notice of the claim was dated 4th September 1880, and was duly lodged with the assessor of that date, in terms of the statute.

The Sheriff repelled the objection and admitted the claim, on the ground that the authority to sign the claim was sufficiently proved, and that it was not requisite that the authority should be in writing, or that a written mandate should be granted.

Rutherford took a case.

The following facts were stated in the case:—"It was proved by parole evidence that the claimant, Robert Lockie, had personally instructed Mr Dunn to get him put on the register, and authorised him to sign a claim, and do whatever was necessary thereto; and he had given him receipts for rent which he had paid, by way of instructing and supporting his claim, which receipts Mr Dunn produced in Court. No objection was stated otherwise. The claimant's tenancy and occupancy were established, and the value was sufficient."

Argued for appellant;—The mandate to sign a claim or objection must be in writing. See section 25 of the County Voters Act, 1861.*

* Section 25, County Voters Act, 1861, provides, inter alia,—"It shall be lawful for any person who shall have given any notice of claim or any notice of objection to support the same before the Court by himself, his agent or mandator. . . . and every mandate produced to the Court, and bearing to be signed by any person entitled to give or to support any notice of claim or of objection, shall be prima facie a sufficient mandate," &c.

In statutes the word "mandate" always meant written mandate. An absent litigant must give a written mandate to his agent. Section 13 of the Reform Act of 1832 allowed a claim to be subscribed for a claimant by his agent, but this case was ruled not by that Act, but by the County Voters Act, 1861. Further, section 3 of the latter Act repealed section 13 of the Reform Act of 1832. Nov. 13, 1880.
Rutherford v.
Lockie.

Argued for the respondent;—Section 13 of the Act of 1832 was repealed by the Act of 1861 only "in so far as the same may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of this Act." No change was thereby made by the County Voters Act on the Act of 1832 with regard to mandates, and under the latter statute a written mandate was not necessary. The objection was a purely technical one.

LORD MURE.—I am satisfied that the Sheriff has here proceeded on a fair construction of the Acts. The Reform Act of 1832, by section 13, provides that a claim may be "subscribed" by a party "or his agent," and I cannot read the repealing clause of the County Voters Act, 1861, as repealing that provision. Now, there is nothing in the Act of 1832 which says that the agent must have a written mandate; and in administering that Act agents have been held entitled to sign claims without any such mandate. In Mr Swinton's Digest of Registration Cases I find that possession by an agent of the titles of a subject has been held equivalent to a mandate to sign a claim for enrolment—case of Archibald Smith, 1837, p. 79.

It is plain, however, from the information given in the note on the same page, that in the working of that Act a written mandate was not considered essential to authorise an agent to give in a claim, provided he was in possession of what might be considered equivalent authority at the time the claim was lodged; and to go further back, it will be seen from the cases noted in Connell on Elections, p. 26, that under the old election law possession of titles was, in the ordinary case, held to be sufficient to authorise an agent to make a claim, and that a written mandate was required only where parties were out of the kingdom.

It has been contended for the objector that the Act of 1832 is so qualified by the County Voters Act of 1861 as to make it imperative that an agent should have a written mandate; and the last clause of the 25th section of the Act was referred to and mainly relied on in support of that view. I am, however, unable to read the clause as sufficient to alter the rules laid down and applied under section 13 of the Act of 1832. It simply provides that—"Every mandate produced to the Court, and bearing to be signed by any person entitled to give or to support any notice of claim or of objection, shall be prima facie a sufficient mandate." But it does not say that no other evidence of an agent's authority to subscribe a claim than a written mandate is to be admitted. On the contrary, the expression used—shall be prima facie evidence of mandate—appears to me to imply that other evidence may be required and adduced to instruct the mandate, such as the possession of title-deeds and instructions given to the agent to sign the claim before it was lodged.

* Burgh Voters Act, 1856, sec. 36,—“Any claim, objection, notice of appeal, or other writ, may be signed, and any proceedings under this Act may be prosecuted by any person as agent or mandatory for the party thereto, and any mandate bearing to be signed by such party shall be prima facie a sufficient mandate.”

Rutherford v.
Lockie.

Having regard, therefore, to the rules acted on in the Court of Freeholders, and under the Act of 1832, and there being nothing in the Act of 1861 imperatively requiring a written mandate, the question we have to consider is, whether there is evidence in this case sufficient to satisfy us that the agent had proper authority to do what he did? Now, it is stated in the case that it was proved that the claimant had personally instructed Mr Dunn to get him put upon the register, and authorised him to sign a claim, and that he had handed him his receipts for rents wherewith to support the claim, and which were produced in Court. It appears to me that the giving of the receipts, in the case of a tenancy qualification, is just as good an element of evidence of authority to lodge a claim as that of an agent having the title-deeds in his possession in the case of property qualification. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Sheriff was right in repelling the objection in the present case.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. Mr Darling argued, with his usual ability, the general point that under the Act 1861 a written authority was absolutely needed. I should be sorry if that were so; and I do not think it is. This is a very technical objection. If an agent can sell an estate without a written authority surely you can put a man on the register in a similar way; or, take the case which was put to us of an illiterate voter, he would require a notary and four witnesses to put him on the roll. The objection is so technical a one that I think we should not sustain it unless compelled to do so.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The first objection was abandoned by the counsel for the appellant, who conceded that it was not necessary that claims should be signed by the claimant himself, but that his agent may do it for him. On the question whether a written mandate to the agent is required I concur in thinking that it is unnecessary, and that both on a consideration of the statutes and of the past practice as noticed by Lord Mure. Such being the case, the question is always just this, where a claim has been signed by the claimant's agent, has it been proved that the agent had sufficient authority to do so? That is a relevant inquiry, as is shewn by the cases cited to us from the bar. Here there is authority instructed in the ordinary way, and that being so, I am of opinion that all which the statutes require has been complied with. I should regret if any difficulty were put in the way of lodging claims, and that would be so were we to sustain this appeal.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, with expenses.

GEORGE H. STEVENSON, Objector and Appellant.—J. J. Reid.
JAMES MILLER, Respondent.—Graham Murray.

County Franchise—Valuation-roll—Proof aliunde of value—Claimant impugning valuation-roll of preceding year.—The value of certain heritable subjects was entered in the valuation-roll 1879-80 at £10, and in the roll 1880-81 at £20. It was admitted that the entry in the roll of 1879-80 should have been £20. Held that the tenant was entitled to the franchise.

Question, whether the valuation-roll of 1880-81 was not in itself conclusive on the question of value.

JAMES MILLER, Musselburgh, claimed to be enrolled as tenant of shootings on the lands of Morham.

No. 4.

The claim was objected to by George Henderson Stevenson, a voter on the register, on the ground that the value of the shootings was entered in the valuation-roll for the year 1879-80 at £10 only, and in the roll for the current year at £20 sterling.

The objector took a case.

The facts, as stated in the case, were—"It was admitted that the rent actually paid for the shootings for the year 1879-80 was £20, and that the assessor had entered the value without any return from the proprietor or tenant after the usual time for the giving in of such returns had expired, although the claimant received a notice in the usual form that the shootings were entered at £10 sterling, to which he took no exception."

The question of law was—"Is it competent, in the circumstances, to admit proof of value to contradict the entry in the valuation-roll for 1879-80, in support of a claim under sec. 6 of the statute 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48?"

Argued for the appellant;—It was not competent to contradict the valuation-roll on the question of value by proof aliunde.¹ The claimant must shew, under sec. 6 of the Representation of the People Act, 1868, that he had been in occupation of the subjects for twelve months prior to 31st July of the year in which he makes his claim, and that the subjects were of sufficient value "as appearing from the valuation-roll of the county." That clause made the roll conclusive as to value.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The assessor's return of the value of these shootings in the roll 1879-80 was admittedly wrong. No doubt the tenant had an appeal under the Valuation Act against that return, and did not exercise it, but to punish him by excluding his vote would be to punish him under one statute for an omission under another. (2) As the valuation-roll runs from Whitsunday to Whitsunday it was necessary to consult two rolls to find the value of a subject for twelve months prior to July 31st. But sec. 6 of the Reform Act, 1868, said "as appearing from the valuation-roll," not rolls. That alluded to the current roll, and admittedly in that roll the value was sufficient for a qualification. The County Voters Act only provided that at the Registration Court the valuation-roll—that is, the current roll—shall be laid before the Sheriff. In *Alexander v. Thomson*¹ the claimant had to impugn the current roll, whereas here the respondent was not even trying to disprove an entry in the roll of last year, for that the entry was erroneous was stated as matter of fact in the case. (3) Proof aliunde had been allowed in various cases to contradict the valuation-roll, though not on the question of value.²

LORD GIFFORD.—This is a case of some general importance, for it raises the important question whether it is necessary that, in addition to the occupancy of a subject of sufficient value at the time of registration, there shall be proof of sufficient continuous value during the whole twelve months preceding the last day of July. It is not necessary to settle that question here, as we have an admission of the fact in the special case. But, apart from the general question

² Brown v. Holmes, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 328, 41 Scot. Jur. 192; Blackwood v. Euman, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 325, 41 Scot. Jur. 191; M'Gaw v. Maitland, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 327, 41 Scot. Jur. 192; Morrison v. Anderson, Nov. 5, 1879, ante, vol. vii., p. 7.

No. 4. involved, we have plenty of evidence to sustain this vote. When the Sheriff goes over the roll submitted to him by the assessor he has only one valuation-roll before him, viz., that of the current year. The statute says that any tenant claiming under the 6th section of the Act of 1868 shall be entitled to a vote who "is and has been during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the last day of July in the actual personal occupancy as tenant of lands and heritages within the county of the annual value of fourteen pounds or upwards, as appearing on the valuation-roll of such county." The Sheriff here first tests the sufficiency of the value—it is £20 per annum; secondly, he finds that there has been occupation for the necessary twelve months of the same subject—that is matter of admission. Then rises the question raised in the objection. The objector says,—“You are now in possession of a subject of legitimate value, but I shall prove by the production of the valuation-roll of last year that it was not of that value last year;” and he says that the evidence of that roll is conclusive against the claim. I do not think that that is so. The roll that is conclusive is this year’s roll, but there is nothing in the statute to shew that last year’s roll is conclusive also. According to Mr Reid’s argument it is incompetent to prove any change in the value during the twelve months, though it may have been rising during that period. Even if it were the case that the rent during the first six months had only been £10 I am of opinion that if the rent now amounts to £14 or more, and occupation for twelve months of the whole subject, being the identical subject, is proved, that is enough to sustain the claim. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Nov. 13, 1880.
Stevenson v.
Miller.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. This is a claim by a tenant who alleges that he has got the required qualification by means of occupancy of shootings for a year at a sufficient rent. It is objected that the full value of the qualification does not appear from the valuation-roll, and that the claimant is therefore not entitled to vote, as the provisions of the 6th section of the Act of 1868 have not been fulfilled. The facts are, that in the valuation-roll of 1880-81 the subjects are entered by the assessor as of £20 in value; and if that valuation-roll is the one referred to in the section the objection plainly cannot be sustained. But what is said now is that we must read the word “valuation-roll” in that section as if it had been valuation-rolls, because the specified period is that of twelve months immediately preceding July 31st 1880. There is one roll for the years 1879-80 which runs to Whitsunday 1880, and another which runs from that date to July 31st of this year and onwards to Whitsunday 1881. If that view were sound we should be obliged to sustain the appeal. But I think that the statutory meaning of the words “valuation-roll” in section 6 of the 1868 Act is the roll which is laid before the Sheriff to determine the value of the subjects on which claims are given in: the provision in the County Voters Act 1861 is that the roll for the current year is to be laid before the Sheriff; and this, I think, must be taken to be the roll referred to in the 6th section of the Act of 1868. The appeal therefore must be dismissed.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordships in thinking that this is an important question, and it is the one on which we reserved our opinions last year in deciding the case of Wilkie v. Adair, Nov. 16, 1879, ante, vol. vii. 49. This case, however, necessitates a decision on the point whether any other evidence than that of the valuation-roll of the year in which the Registration Court is held can be admitted to instruct the value, or an objection to the value, of a qualification. No. 4.

On this question I am clearly of opinion that although the valuation-roll, which is laid before the Sheriff under sec. 24 of the County Voters Act, 1861, is to be taken as evidence of the value of the qualification, it is not to be the sole, but only prima facie evidence of the value, and that there is nothing in the provisions of that Act or of the Act of 1868 to prevent the Sheriff from admitting other evidence if necessary in supplement of or even to qualify that roll. The statutes regulating these matters must be read together, and so reading them I have come to the conclusion, as indicated in my opinion last year in the case of Adair, that sec. 17 of the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, has never been repealed, and must therefore be held to be in operation. Now, the Valuation Act of 1854 made the valuation-roll conclusive evidence of value. But by sec. 17 of the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, which in that section as well as in others, such as in secs. 24, 25, and 27, relative to procedure and appeals, applies to counties as well as burghs, it is provided that the valuation-roll made up under the Act of 1854, shall be "received and taken as prima facie proof that the gross yearly rent or value of any subjects specified in such valuation-roll is and has been for the year from the 15th day of May in such year of the amount set forth for the time in such valuation-roll." And it is also specially provided "that it shall be competent to prove to the satisfaction of any Sheriff or Court of Appeal under this or the first recited Act that any such subjects are or have been of a greater or of a less annual value than the value stated in such valuation-roll."

So standing the law at the date of the County Voters Act of 1861, the 24th section of that Act provides that, when the Sheriff holds his Registration Court, the valuation-roll for the year shall be laid on the table of the Court. In the present case the valuation-roll for 1880-81 was laid before the Sheriff, and in that roll the value of the claimant's subject was entered at £20. Now, when in section 6 of the Act of 1868 the annual value is referred to as appearing in the valuation-roll, and when that section is read, as I think it must be, along with the provisions of the Acts of 1856 and 1861, it appears to me that the valuation-roll there spoken of is that extending from the 15th of May of the year with which the Sheriff is dealing, and not the valuation-roll of the preceding year. But it was maintained on the part of the objector, and he undertook to shew, that by the valuation-roll of the preceding year the value during part of the requisite twelve months was only £10, and so proposed to cut down or qualify the roll laid before the Sheriff by the roll of the preceding year, and shew that the qualification was not of the proper value. Now, I do not dispute the appellant's right to lead this additional evidence. But I must also hold that by sec. 17 of the Act of 1856 it was competent to rebut that evidence, and to shew that the old valuation-roll was wrong and the new one right. On these grounds I cannot exclude the evidence led in this case to shew that the rent actually paid during the year prior to 31st July 1880 was £20. I agree, therefore, with your Lordships in holding that the Sheriff's decision is right.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, with expenses.

Process—No appearance for respondent in an appeal.—The Court will not sustain an appeal in respect of no appearance for the respondent, but will require the appellant to shew cause why the Sheriff's judgment should be altered.

County Franchise—Title to object—Person on assessor's list—Altered qualification.—A voter stood on the register for the year 1879–80 as "tenant and occupant." He lost that qualification and at the same time became qualified as "proprietor." The assessor placed him on the list of persons having lost their qualifications, and placed him on the list of persons having become entitled to vote. JAMES AITKEN, solicitor, Bathgate, who stood upon the assessor's list, objected to James Robertson, who was also on the assessor's list as "proprietor of house and garden, Cuffabouts, Carriden," being placed upon the roll as a voter for the county, on the ground that he had no present beneficial interest in the subject.

A preliminary objection was taken by James Robertson to the competency of Aitken's objection, on the ground that he was not then on the roll of voters so as to entitle him to object.

The Sheriff-substitute (Home) sustained the objection, and Aitken took a case.

The facts as stated in the case were,—“That Aitken stood on the register of voters for the county for the year 1879–80 as a ‘tenant and occupant.’ He had lost that qualification, and had become qualified as a ‘proprietor.’ The assessor had, therefore, placed the said James Aitken (1) on the list of persons disqualified; and (2) on the list of persons having become entitled to vote. There was no objection to the said James Aitken being enrolled on his new qualification.”

When the case came on for hearing before the Appeal Court there was no appearance for the respondent, either by counsel or agent. The Court refused to sustain the appeal in respect of no appearance, and proceeded to hear counsel for the appellant on the appeal.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The case was not ruled by the case of Mason v. Weir, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 290. There the objector had not been on the roll in the previous year as Aitken had been. The list made up by the assessor was merely a draft of proposed alterations to be laid before the Sheriff, and Aitken could not be held to be off the roll until the Sheriff had deleted his name. (2) Objections had to be lodged, under the provisions of the County Voters Act, 1861, sec. 11, on or before 4th September, whereas the assessor did not make up his list until 11th September. The appellant's name had therefore not been struck off the roll even by the assessor at the date the objection was sent in. The appellant had always voted on his old qualification until the new roll was adjusted by the Sheriff.

LORD MURE.—I am satisfied that this decision is not well founded. As I understand the case, this objector was on the roll last year as a qualified voter, and if an election had taken place at the time this objection was lodged he would have been entitled to vote. In these circumstances I am very clear that if there is no provision to the contrary in the Act—and I can find none—a person who is entitled to vote is also entitled to object to parties asking to be enrolled.

LORD GIFFORD and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

On the merits, their Lordships were of opinion that Robertson was not entitled to be placed on the roll. No. 5.

The son, in a deed of appointment, after making provisions for his sons, directed his trustees to hold the remainder of the fund "upon trust, to pay the interest thereof" to his two daughters for their own separate use, notwithstanding coverture, and so that the daughters should not have power to dispose thereof by way of anticipation, and upon the death of each daughter to hold her share for her children in such shares as she should have appointed, and, failing children, for such persons as she should have appointed.

In a question, raised during the survivance of the son's widow, between the son's children and the father's trustees, who maintained that the appointments by the son were invalid, on the ground that he had restricted his daughters to mere liferents, and had not validly disposed of the fee of their shares, held that the appointment was valid, and had vested in the daughters the capital of their shares, but that these were limited to their separate use for life, independent of any present or future husband, and were to be held by them subject to the power of appointment conferred on them by their father's settlement, but without power to make any other assignment or appointment by way of alienation.

2D DIVISION.
I.

ADMIRAL GEORGE GUSTAVUS LENNOX died on 12th May 1866, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he left the residue of his estate to John Johnston, Esq., and others, as trustees, with instructions to pay the income as an alimentary allowance to his only son, George James Lennox. He gave the son power to "settle and secure to his wife, by marriage-contract or other deed, an annuity out of the said interest, dividends, or other annual produce, payable to her quarterly or half-yearly after his death, as he may direct, the balance, if any, of the said interest, dividends, or other annual produce, being paid to or applied for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage, if any, in such manner as my said trustees or trustee may direct: Declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that upon the death of the said George James Lennox, or, in the event of his marriage, upon the death of the surviving spouse, the said free residue of my estate, so liferented by him, shall belong and be paid to the child or children of the marriage at such periods, and in such proportions, and under such limitations, conditions, and restrictions as he, the said George James Lennox, may have directed by any deed or writing under his hand; failing which, equally amongst them, share and share alike, upon their severally attaining majority; failing all which, to my daughter, the said Anne Murray Lennox otherwise Walker, or her heirs or assignees."

George James Lennox married and had a family, and in his last will and testament he conveyed the trust-funds to certain trustees, and provided the liferent of the whole to his widow, subject to certain payments out of capital of £1700 to each of his three sons on their respectively attaining majority. A farther sum of £1700 was made payable to each son on the death or marriage of their mother. And with regard to the residue of the fund he directed—"And after the decease or marriage of my said wife, as aforesaid, I direct and appoint that my said trustees shall hold the sum of £4000, the residue of the said trust-funds, upon trust, to pay the interest and annual proceeds thereof unto my two daughters, Elizabeth and Ann Eleanor, during their respective lives, in equal shares and proportions (subject, nevertheless, as hereinafter mentioned), for their and each of their own separate and absolute use and benefit, notwithstanding coverture, and so that my said daughters respectively shall not have power to dispose thereof by way of anticipation; and from and after the decease of each or either of my said daughters respectively I direct and appoint that one moiety or equal half part of the said trust-moneys, funds, and securities, shall go and be held in trust for the children or child of each of my said daughters respectively, in such shares, and in such way and manner, as my said daughters respectively, by any deed or deeds, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by will or codicil, and whether they shall be under coverture or not, shall appoint; and in default of such appointment, and so far as any such appointment shall not extend in trust for the children of each such daughter, who, being male, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being female, shall attain that age or marry, in equal shares; and if there shall be only one such child, the whole to be in trust for that one child: And in case there shall be no such child or children of my said daughters respectively who shall attain a vested interest in the said trust-funds, then in trust for such person and persons, in such shares, and in such way and manner, as my said daughters respectively shall in manner aforesaid appoint."

Lennox's
Lennox, &c.

George J. Lennox died on 21st November 1871, and was survived by his widow Mrs E. G. L. Lennox and by three sons and two daughters. George Richard, the eldest, having been born on 4th March 1859, and so having reached majority on 4th March 1880, claimed payment from his grandfather's trustees of £1700, in terms of the appointment made by his father.

Admiral Lennox's trustees having disputed the validity of the appointment, the question was brought before the Court in a special case.

Argued for Admiral Lennox's trustees;—The appointments made by George James Lennox were bad, in so far as the provision to the daughters was not a competent one under the terms of the Admiral's settlement. Where a right was given to apportion a capital sum it was not duly exercised by giving merely an annuity out of the fund to the beneficiaries.¹ The appointment to the daughters being bad, then all the appointments fell along with it.² If, however, the appointment to the sons was allowed to stand, at all events, the restriction on the daughters' shares must not, and they should take the residue equally as fiars.

Argued for Mr and Miss Lennox;—The appointment to the sons was quite good under the power conferred, and must be given effect to. The restriction, however, upon the daughters' shares could not be given effect to. Whatever they took under their grandfather's settlement must be as fiars, not as liferenters merely.

a power is conferred on another to divide or apportion the amount among them, it has been settled that it is beyond the power to restrict the share of one of the beneficiaries or legatees to a mere right of life, and an attempt so to exercise the power will be of no avail. But it has been settled by the English case of Carver v. Bowles, and is good sense, that if an appointment embraces the whole fund to be distributed it will not necessarily be vitiated by the introduction of conditions and restrictions tending to limit the enjoyment of any particular share. I should have been disposed to follow the authority of that leading case as conclusive of the general doctrine. But it so happens that both the power of appointment and the terms of the appointment itself are in the present case as nearly as possible identical with those which occur in Carver v. Bowles. In both the power authorised the appointer to appoint under such conditions and restrictions as might be thought fit, and the actual restrictions imposed in this case are as nearly as may be expressed in the same words. I propose, therefore, that we should pronounce a judgment in terms of that pronounced by the Master of the Rolls in the case I have referred to. It may be quite true, as it was in that case, that some of these restrictions reduce the actual enjoyment to little more than a life-interest, but they do not appear to me to exceed the limits which were contemplated by the testator.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion.

George James Lennock having the power to appoint and to impose limitations and restrictions, he has, in my opinion, executed these powers well. He has conveyed the whole estate to trustees to invest the same, and to pay the whole annual produce thereof to his wife so long as she shall survive him, and continue his widow. So far there can be no dispute as to what he did—he was entitled to make this provision for his wife. The wife's interest, however, is subject to this qualification, that as each of his sons attained the age of twenty-one he is to be entitled to a payment of £1700 out of the capital of the estate liferented by her. This also was certainly within his power. He thus appoints to his sons as they attain majority £1700 each. No doubt, so far he has not disposed of the whole fund, but that cannot make this partial appointment invalid. No one has a right to object to this appointment. It is a long step, then, towards our decision to hold that these provisions of £1700 to each of the sons are good. He then goes on to provide that after the widow's death each of his sons shall receive a farther sum of £1700. I think that appointment is also good. In this way he has appointed £3400 to each of his sons, and that leaves £4000 still to be disposed of. This he appoints to his two daughters in the following manner. After the death of the widow he directs his trustees to "hold the sum of £4000, the residue of the said trust-funds, upon trust, to pay the interest and annual proceeds thereof unto my two daughters . . . during their respective lives, in equal shares," for their respective use, notwithstanding coverture, the daughters to have no power to dispose of the same by anticipation. After the death of the daughters the will goes on to provide that one-half of the sum of £4000 shall be held for the children of each daughter in such shares as their mothers may appoint; and failing such children, then for such persons as the daughters may appoint. I think that is a good appointment of £2000 to each of the daughters. They are each to have the interest of that sum absolutely to themselves during their lives, even although they may marry. Then arises the question which alone creates any difficulty, viz., the provision that the capital of the fund so liferented shall go to the children of the daughters, and to them alone, if any come into existence. But it is not at all necessary for us to decide now as between the daughters and any possible children they may have what their respective rights are. No such question may ever arise. I do not think that anything in that clause affects the validity of the appointment of Admiral Lennox's residue. There is most certainly a valid appointment of £3400 to each of the sons. The trustees will make these payments to the sons, and hold the £4000 for the daughters. When the daughters demand payment of that fund from the trustees it will be time enough to fix their rights. I decline to decide by anticipation what are the rights of these ladies. This is not the time to settle whether they can cut out their children or no.

Revenue—Inhabited House Duty—48 Geo. III. c. 55, Sch. B, Rules 5 and 6—41 Vict. c. 15, sec. 13, sub-secs. 1 and 2.—The Corporation of Glasgow, as trustees of Glasgow v. Inland Revenue. under a local Act, were owners (1) of a building occupied by them as an industrial and natural history museum, to which the public were admitted free; and (2) of a building partly occupied by them as picture galleries, to which the public were admitted free, and partly by an institute of engineers, to whom separate rooms were let by the Corporation.

Held that the whole of these premises were liable for inhabited house duty under 48 Geo. III. c. 55, and did not fall under the exemption of 41 Vict. c. 15, sec. 13, sub-secs. 1 and 2, as "occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, &c. by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit."

THE Corporation of Glasgow, as trustees under the Public Parks and Galleries Act, 1859, brought the two following appeals against assessment for inhabited house duty. The two cases were argued together.

The facts, as stated in the first case, were—"1st, That the assessment is made in respect of the occupancy by the Corporation of Glasgow as trustees foreshaid of the premises known as Kelvingrove House and Museum, used wholly as an industrial and natural history museum, with the exception of the assistant curator's house. The valuation of the whole premises is £165. 2d, The premises consist of two divisions, the old and the new. The old building is in height two storeys and attics, and is wholly used as an industrial and natural history museum, except the assistant curator's house, consisting of two rooms and kitchen on the first flat, and three rooms on the attic flat. The new building consists of one hall with a gallery, and is wholly occupied as an industrial and natural history museum. 3d, There is internal communication by means of stairs and passages throughout the buildings. 4th, The public are admitted free to the museum."

The facts as stated in the second case were—"1st, That the assessment is made in respect of the premises occupied as under, viz.—

Rooms occupied by the Institute of Engineers, valued at	100	0	0

"2d, In the upper flat of the main building there are five rooms filled with pictures and other works of art, to which the public are admitted free. In the first flat, a hall and two small rooms let to the Glasgow Philosophical Society, the like accommodation let to the Glasgow Institute of Engineers, and an office used by Mr Paton, the curator of the galleries. In the sunk flat the caretaker's house, consisting of three rooms and kitchen. Behind the above building, and communicating therewith, there are three rooms, with three cloak or retiring-rooms; these rooms are filled with pictures and other works of art, to which the public are also admitted free. 3d, There is internal communication by means of stairs and passages inside the building between the caretaker's house and all the other rooms. 4th, The galleries are occasionally let for meetings or exhibitions."

The Commissioners of Income-tax, &c. having confirmed both the assessments, holding that the assessments were properly imposed under rule 6 of schedule B of 48 Geo. III. c. 55,¹ and that the houses did not come within the exemption of section 13, sub-sections 1 and 2, of 41 Vict. c. 15,² the Corporation of Glasgow obtained cases for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

Argued for the Corporation of Glasgow;—(1) The premises here were not liable for inhabited house duty, because they were not inhabited by any one. The Corporation, who were statutory trustees, could not inhabit them, and no more did the public who visited them. At all events the premises of the Corporation Galleries which were occupied by the two societies were not inhabited by any one. (2) The discussions there were for the promotion of their business, and therefore the premises were occupied for business purposes, and so fell under the exemption of 41 Vict. c. 15.³

Oct. 19, 1880.
Corporation of Glasgow v.
Inland Revenue.

Taking the case of Kelvingrove Museum as the first, because the most simple, the facts are these—The assessment is made in respect of the occupancy by the Corporation of Glasgow, as trustees under a local Act, of the premises known as Kelvingrove Museum, which seems to be kept entirely as an industrial and natural history museum, with the exception of some apartments which are occupied as the dwelling-house of the assistant-curator. It is one house, with internal communications by means of stairs and passages throughout. The museum of course is intended to be exhibited to the public, and admission to it is free. It has been contended, in the first place, that the Magistrates of Glasgow, holding this building for the benefit of the community, are not in the position of occupiers of the house, and that the house itself is not within the meaning of the statute an “inhabited house.” It seems to me impossible to give any weight to either of these contentions. It is needless to say at this time of day that an inhabited house does not mean a place of residence—that habitation in the sense of the statute may consist of any kind of occupation of a house or building. If it be not unoccupied—that is to say, without any use made of it at all—then it is an occupied house within the meaning of the Act, and, being occupied, it is also within the meaning of the statute an inhabited house. But then it is contended further that the case falls within the exemptions contained in the 13th section of the 41st of Victoria, cap. 15. There are two cases for exemption there under the two sub-sections 1 and 2. As regards sub-section 1, it is quite clear that that cannot by any possibility apply to this museum, because that sub-section applies only to the case where parts of the house are let out to different tenants for different purposes, or are at least occupied by persons for different purposes. This museum is occupied entirely by the Magistrates of Glasgow for one purpose. The second sub-section contains an exemption of a different kind, but it is just as clear that that cannot apply, because it exempts only such premises as are occupied solely for the “purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit;” and in no sense whatever can the occupation by the magistrates as statutory trustees be described in these words. Therefore the assessment is obviously quite rightly made in regard to the case of the museum.

The case of the Corporation Galleries stands in a somewhat different position, for the house there consists of several parts occupied in different ways. There is, in the first place, a portion of the premises known as the Corporation Galleries, and occupied by the Corporation for exhibiting pictures and other objects of art, which is the greater part of the building. But there is also a caretaker's house, and there are rooms occupied by the Institute of Engineers, and also rooms occupied by the Philosophical Society. The owners of the entire house are undoubtedly the Magistrates of Glasgow, as trustees under the local Act which I have already mentioned, and therefore the case falls within the 6th rule of schedule B of 48 of Geo. III., as being the case of a house “let in different storeys, tenements, lodgings, or lands, and inhabited by two or more persons or families, in which case the house is to be subject to, and shall in like manner be charged to, the said duties as if such house or tenement was inhabited by one person or family only, and the landlord or owner shall be deemed the occupier of such dwelling-house, and shall be charged for the said duties." It is clear, I think, that that rule applies to this case. The greater portion of the house is occupied by the trustees as owners, but other portions of it are occupied by the Philosophical Society and by the Glasgow Institute of Engineers as tenants, and if the case stood upon the original statute only there would be no more to be said. But it is maintained that under the first sub-section of section 13 of Act 41 Vict. cap. 15, there is relief in so far as concerns that portion of the premises which is occupied by those two societies, the Philosophical Society and the Glasgow Institute of Engineers. The provision is this—"Where any house, being one property, shall be divided into and let in different tenements, and any of such tenements are occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, or are unoccupied," then after certain notice the Commissioners may grant relief from the assessment. Now, I think it may be doubted how far the appellants here have placed themselves in a position to take advantage of this clause of exemption supposing it to apply to their case, because the statute requires that a particular notice shall be given where such relief is claimed, and a notice, not of a formal character merely, but a notice containing a distinct statement of the facts in respect of which the relief is claimed. That is to be given to the surveyor within a certain period, and adjudicated upon separately by the Commissioners. But the respondent here has taken no objection to this question being raised upon the present case, and it would not be desirable to avoid determining the point merely upon the ground of that technicality, and therefore I am quite prepared to give my opinion as to the applicability of this sub-section to the case in hand. No doubt the portions of the premises here occupied by the Institute of Engineers and the Philosophical Society are quite within the description of this clause in so far as they are portions of a building let in different tenements. But it is not in every case where portions of a building are let in different tenements that relief is to be given; it is only where these separate portions of the house are "occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit;" and the appellant has never been able to explain in the course of the argument how the Institute of Engineers or the Philosophical Society are earning a livelihood by carrying on the discussions which take place in these rooms. The discussions, no doubt, may be very useful in themselves, and very profitable in a certain sense to the members of these societies, but there is neither livelihood nor profit in the sense of the statute to be derived from any amount of discussion. Therefore I think it clear that that section of the statute does not apply, and I need hardly say that the second section, although pleaded upon also in the case of the Galleries, is just as clearly inapplicable. In both cases, therefore, I think the assessment must be confirmed.

IN both cases the Court confirmed the decisions of the Commissioners.

Succession—Period of Payment—Intention of Testator—Calendar or Lunar Month.—A testatrix directed her trustees, with all convenient speed, to collect and realise her moveable estate, and “as soon as convenient after my death to deliver, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death,” to pay such bequests and legacies as should be directed by any writings under her hand. Lastly, the trustees were directed to pay the interest of the whole residue of the estate to the heir of entail in possession of a particular estate “at the said term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death.” The first term’s payment of said interest to commence “as at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas twelve months after my death.” The testatrix died at nine in the morning of 15th May 1880. A question having arisen as to whether the legacies became payable at Martinmas 1880 or not until Whitsunday 1881, held that on a reasonable construction of the settlement, and in accordance with the evident intention of the testatrix, Martinmas 1880 was the first term six months after the testatrix’s death, and that the legacies became payable then.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the words “six months” fell to be construed as meaning six lunar months. X

MISS LAURA ISLAY CAMPBELL of Dunstaffnage died at nine o’clock on the morning of 15th May 1880, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 19th June 1879. By this settlement she named certain trustees and conveyed her whole estate and effects to them. The directions to the trustees were (1) with all convenient speed to collect and recover the whole of her moveable and personal estate and effects, and from the proceeds thereof to pay her debts and deathbed and funeral expenses; (2) “as soon as convenient after my death to deliver, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death to pay or account for all such bequests and legacies, and to carry out all such instructions” as the testatrix might thereafter give; (3) certain specific articles were directed to be delivered to persons named in the settlement; (4) “my trustees shall, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death, make payment of the following legacies;” (5) certain additional legacies were directed to be paid to her trustees and others; and (lastly) the whole residue of her means and estate were directed to be held for the liferent behoof of Alexander James Henry Campbell, heir of entail to Dunstaffnage, “or, failing him, the heir of entail who shall at the said term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death be in possession of the family estate of Dunstaffnage; and my trustees shall pay to such heir of entail the free income arising from the said residue half-yearly as soon as convenient after the same falls due, beginning the first term’s payment as at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas twelve months after my death for the half year preceding.” The said Alexander James Henry Campbell survived Miss Campbell, and became heir of entail in possession of Dunstaffnage.

Owing to Miss Campbell dying on the morning of the Whitsunday term day, 1880, a dispute arose as to what was the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after her death, and a special case was prepared setting forth the above facts, to which Miss Campbell’s trustees were the first parties, and her legatees, including her residuary legatee, the second parties.

Miss Campbell’s trustees maintained that as the testatrix died on the morning of the Whitsunday term, 1880, the first term of Whitsunday or

Oct. 20, 1880.
Campbell's
Trustees v.
Cazanove, &c.

The legatees maintained that the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after Miss Campbell's death was Martinmas 1880.

The opinion and judgment of the Court was requested upon the following question:—"Which is the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after Miss Campbell's death within the meaning of her trust-disposition and settlement?"

Argued for Miss Campbell's trustees;—In questions of this sort "month" meant calendar month. By custom in the case of bills of exchange a month was a calendar month.¹ By Act of Parliament it was expressly declared that in all public statutes month meant calendar month.² That being so, the period of six months here must be calculated as calendar months, and in that case the six months had not expired as at Martinmas 1880.

Argued for the legatees;—(1) The question was to be settled according to the intention of the testatrix. Her intention clearly was to give her trustees a reasonable space of time in which to realise her estate. The result of holding that Martinmas was not the first term six months after the testatrix's death would be that legacies directed to be paid six months after her death would not be paid until twelve months had elapsed. (2) The legal term between Martinmas 1879 and Whitsunday 1880 did not expire until the Whitsunday term day had come to an end, and the testatrix must therefore be held to have expired in that half year. It followed from that that Martinmas 1880 was the first term six months after her death according to every reasonable consideration. (3) If the time was to be calculated strictly, then the true "month" in its strict sense was a lunar month of twenty-eight days, in which case six such months had elapsed between 15th May and 11th November 1880.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am inclined to think that it is unnecessary while deciding this case to refer to the question of whether the months are to be taken as lunar or calendar. The simple question seems to be whether or not the punctum temporis of Whitsunday is to be held as one and indivisible, and if not, whether, as the testatrix died before it expired, the ensuing Martinmas must not be held as the first term six months after her death. I think that on a reasonable construction of the whole circumstances it must be held that the six months expired at Martinmas 1880, and that result seems certainly most in accordance with the intention of the testatrix.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am inclined to think that the six months had really elapsed by Martinmas 1880. I think the testatrix was looking to the well-known terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, and not to the exact space of six months. To hold that is to give effect to the intention of the testatrix, which is the proper thing to do in such a case.

² 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 21, sec. 4.

In deciding the question, however, we have the exact meaning of the word "months" as here used to interpret, and in my opinion we must interpret what is meant by "six months" in a will which directs something to be done at the "first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after" the testatrix's death.

No. 11.
Oct. 20, 1880.
Campbell's
Trustees v.
Cazenove, &c.

"Month" has two significations in our language. Primarily, it means a period of twenty-eight days. Its second—and only other meaning—is a calendar month, that is, one of the twelve named months into which the year is divided in the almanac, which months are of different durations. In Scotland we are quite alive to the distinction which I have now mentioned, but as there is seldom occasion to give effect to it, there is great scarcity of decision upon the point. In every criminal sentence, however, whether in the supreme or inferior Courts, when a prisoner is to be confined for a period of months, there is invariably inserted the word "calendar," and I think if that word were not so inserted the period would be taken as so many lunar months, and that that is the reason why the word "calendar" is made use of. I cannot hold the unvarying use of "calendar" to be mere surplusage. In the case of bills of exchange merchants who deal most with them have made a law for themselves, and fortunately the custom is the same on both sides of the Tweed, and a month means a calendar month.

If, however, there exist no decision and no practice on which rights are founded and established, I think it of great advantage that the recognised meaning of such a period of time as a month should be the same throughout the whole country. At the same time calendar months can be most easily calculated, and accordingly in 1850 a statute was passed directing that in all Acts of Parliament a month should mean a calendar month unless otherwise expressed, and that statute extends to Scotland. It was quite proper that such a statute should be passed, but at the same time it must be observed that it proceeds upon the assumption that a well-known distinction exists between calendar and lunar months.

In this particular case I am of opinion that the "first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after" the testatrix's death, taken in the primary signification of a month, is clearly Martinmas 1880, being the Martinmas following the Whitsunday on which she died. That is also a reasonable conclusion, and probably in accordance with the intention of the testatrix. There can be no presumption that she wished the term of payment of legacies six months after her death, and the term when payment of interest on residue twelve months after her death was to commence to be on the same day, and that day the anniversary of her death. I therefore arrive at the same conclusion as your Lordships, and think that the question should be answered to the effect that "the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after" the testatrix's death was the term of Martinmas 1880.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Although I am averse to resuming any subject after it has been discussed, and think that it is not a practice to be indulged in, I wish to state that I purposely restricted my observations on the ground of judgment. I have only now to add that I reserve my opinion upon the question of calendar and lunar months, as I am not at present prepared with any remarks upon it. I understand that Lord Gifford concurs with me in the ground upon which I based my judgment.

FRANCIS WOODROW MANFORD, Claimant and Objector.—Strachan.

Poinding of the ground—Effect of service of Summons.—The service of a summons of poinding of the ground has the effect of putting a nequs on the moveables which are on the subjects at the date of service, and interpellates the heritable proprietor from allowing others to acquire rights over them.

Held that an auctioneer who had, under the instructions of the heritable proprietor of certain subjects, removed moveables which had been on the subjects when a summons of poinding of the ground was served, and who had afterwards sold these moveables by auction, notwithstanding service of a note of suspension and interdict, was not entitled to deduct from the price received therefor either advances made to his employer or his commission.

2^D DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
I.

BY bond and assignation in security recorded on 9th August 1876 Matthew Thomas Anderson and others admitted themselves to have borrowed from Francis Woodrow Manford the sum of £2000, and in security of the loan they disposed certain heritable subjects in Dunoon, including a villa called Belmont, of which they were proprietors, to Mr Manford. On 7th August 1879 Mr Manford raised an action of poinding of the ground against the borrowers under the bond, and on 21st October he obtained decree in absence in that action. At the date of the service of the action there was a considerable quantity of household furniture and other moveable property in the villa and the subjects in Dunoon, but shortly after the service of the summons the borrowers employed Isaac Lyons, auctioneer, Greenock, to remove the furniture and moveables from Dunoon, and to sell the same for their behoof in Greenock. Mr Manford having presented a note of suspension and interdict against the sale of these articles the note was served on Lyons on 12th October, and interdict was granted and declared perpetual on 21st November 1879. In the meantime the various articles had been removed from Dunoon to Greenock and had been sold by auction by Lyons on 15th October. The amount realised by the sale was £76, 15s. 0½d. This sum was subject to deduction of the expenses of removal, and Lyons also claimed to deduct £20 advanced to the borrowers, and a charge of £3, 16s. 9½d. as his commission. Matthew Anderson and others and Mr Manford both having claimed the proceeds of the sale in the hands of Lyons, a multiplepoinding was raised, in which Lyons was made nominal raiser and Matthew Anderson and others were the real raisers. Lyons lodged a condescendence of the fund in medio, in which he deducted the sum of £23, 16s. 9½d. above mentioned. Mr Manford compeared as a claimant, and objected to the fund in medio in so far as the sum of £23, 6s. 9½d. was deducted from the proceeds of the sale. He pleaded;—(1) The objector having, by the execution of the said summons of poinding the ground and decree following thereon, acquired a real and preferable right to the said furniture, the said Isaac Lyons is not entitled to deduct or retain from the proceeds thereof any sums said to have been advanced by him to the granters of the said bond, or any of them. (2) The sale of the said furniture by the said Isaac Lyons having been a wrongful and illegal act on his part, and to the prejudice of the objector, he is not entitled to deduct or retain any sum for commission on the said sale.

Lyons v. Anderson, &c.

Lyons pleaded that the objections were untenable in law.

On 17th June 1880 the Lord Ordinary sustained Mr Manford's objections to the condescendence of the fund in medio, and found that the sum of £23, 16s. 9½d. fell to be added thereto. On 22d June Mr Manford was ranked and preferred to the fund as amended.

Lyons reclaimed, and argued;—The service of the summons of pointing of the ground had no effect in itself. No nevus was laid upon the moveables until they were scheduled, and so effectually pointed.¹ In this case the furniture, &c. were removed from the heritable subjects and were in Greenock and sold before decree was obtained in the action.

Argued for Mr Manford;—The service of the summons of pointing of the ground put a nevus on the moveables then on the subjects which interpellated the proprietor from removing them or allowing any rights to be obtained over them by others.² Pointing of the ground was thus essentially different from ordinary pointing.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I certainly had a very strong impression that a heritable creditor who had raised an action of pointing of the ground could not compete with personal creditors whose diligence had been executed until he himself had actually executed his pointing,—that is to say, until not only decree had been pronounced on an executed summons, but actual pointing following thereon had taken place. I am not satisfied, however, that I can maintain that position in the face of the cases which have been cited to us, and I think we must follow them, and hold that immediately the summons of pointing of the ground is served the debtor is interpellated from allowing others to acquire rights over the moveables on the subjects pointed.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am quite of the same opinion. I think the cases quoted shut us up to find as your Lordship proposes. Pointing of the ground differs from personal pointing in so far that the creditor who points the ground in doing so is not trying to get what he had not before, but is rather asking for a declarator of a right which he already has. There is no race of diligence between a pointing of the ground and a personal pointing. Lord Mackenzie in Campbell's Trustees v. Paul fully explains the reasons for this distinction.

LORD YOUNG.—As soon as the facts of the case were explained it became quite clear that the dispute between the parties turned upon the question whether any, and if any what, virtue lies in the execution of a summons of pointing of the ground, and early in the argument I asked if there was no authority upon that point. If no virtue attaches to the mere execution of the summons in the way of restraining the debtor from dealing with his moveables and disposing of them voluntarily, or hindering personal creditors from acquiring rights over them, it is quite plain that this privilege of a heritable creditor would be worthless, because the actual scheduling is the end of a somewhat long course of procedure, and the execution of the summons would have merely the effect of giving notice to the debtor to remove his moveables. I was therefore not surprised to find that it has been distinctly decided that the execution of the summons has the effect of preventing other rights being acquired over the moveables.

That is the view of the law established by these cases. In taking that view we proceed on an assumption which is undoubtedly anomalous, and in the opinion of some objectionable, namely, that a creditor having a security over land has also a real right over the moveables of the land of a peculiar character, because it does not operate in the way of preventing the debtor from conferring rights over the moveables on other persons so long as he is not interpellated; but then the execution of the summons of poinding the ground acts as an interpellation, and in that way the right over the moveables has an actual value.

I entirely agree with your Lordships that this case is decided by the authorities, as it could only be decided consistently with the practical existence of a real right in the moveables in the heritable creditor. That right, I repeat, is anomalous, and in the opinion of many objectionable, but so long as it exists it would be worthless were we to hold that it could not be of any value until a long course of procedure had been gone through.

JAMES MONTGOMERY, Pursuer.—Ure.

MARGARET EDMISTONE OR MONTGOMERY, Defender.—A. J. Young.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Aliment—Expenses.—A husband having obtained decree of divorce in the Outer-House, the wife presented a reclaiming note. On the wife's motion the Court gave her decree for aliment, to continue until final judgment on the reclaiming note, and for a sum to account of her expenses up to the close of the proof in the Outer-House.

B.

THIS was an action of divorce on the ground of adultery by James Montgomery, feuar and portioner, Airdrie, against his wife. Before the action the parties had been living apart, and it was admitted that under an agreement the husband allowed his wife 28s. a-week for the maintenance of herself and six children. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, granted an interim decree for £10 to the wife for her expenses of process, and, after the proof was led, pronounced decree of divorce.

Mrs Montgomery presented a reclaiming note. After the case had been sent to the roll Mrs Montgomery presented a note asking a sum from her husband in name of aliment from 15th August 1880, up to which time she had received aliment from him, to the date of final judgment, and also a sum for payment of the expenses of process.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—We think the reclamer should have the aliment under the agreement continued at the rate of 28s. a-week from the date of the last payment, and that a sum of £30 should be paid towards the expense of leading the evidence. It must be distinctly understood that it is towards the expense of the proof that this sum is to be applied, and not towards the expense of printing the proof, which forms part of the expense of this reclaiming note.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decern against the pursuer and respondent for payment to the reclamer of aliment at the rate of 28s. a-week since 15th August last, to continue till final judgment in the cause: Further, decern against the respondent for payment to the reclamer of the sum of £30 further to account of her expenses to the close of the proof in the Outer-House."

Poor—Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), secs. 69 and 76—Interruption of acquisition of residential settlement by obtaining medical advice and drugs from the parochial board.—Held that the acquisition of a residential settlement was interrupted by the pauper having applied for and obtained medical advice and drugs to the extent of 2s. 2d. from the parochial board.

ANDREW WALLACE, inspector of the poor of the Govan Combination, Glasgow, raised this action in the Sheriff Court at Greenock against J. S. Deas, inspector of Greenock, and A. Dempster, inspector of the City Parish of Glasgow, for repayment of sums expended on the maintenance of a pauper, Peter McNeil, and his children.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Renfrew.
M.

The defenders admitted that the pursuer was entitled to be relieved of the sum he sued for by either one or other of them, and they gave in a minute relieving him from further appearing in the case.

A proof was led.

It was admitted that the pauper was born in the City Parish of Glasgow, and it appeared from the proof that during the time he resided at Greenock he (on 23d May 1876) applied for parochial relief; "that he was then in destitute circumstances, seriously ill from pleurisy, and unable to work, and that he was a proper object of parochial relief; that the defender Deas offered to admit him to the poor-house, which offer he refused, but that he received medical advice and also drugs to the value of 2s. 2d. or thereby."

The City Parish maintained that the proof shewed that he had gone to reside in Greenock on 10th May 1871, and had completed a five years' residence therein without having applied for or received parochial relief.

The Sheriff-substitute (Smith) held that it was proved that he had gone to reside in Greenock only on 26th June 1871, and that his application for and receipt of parochial relief on 23d May 1876 prevented him acquiring a settlement there.

The Sheriff (Fraser) adhered.

The inspector of the City Parish appealed, maintaining that the pauper had acquired a residential settlement in Greenock either by five years' residence from 10th May 1871 or from 26th June 1871.

LOED PRESIDENT.—(After stating that he concurred with the Sheriffs in holding that the pauper's residence in Greenock was not proved to have commenced prior to 26th June 1871)—The other question is of a different kind, and turns upon this, whether what occurred on 23d May 1876 was, in the meaning of the Poor-Law Act, a receipt of parochial relief. The

No. 14. relief was medical treatment and medicine. The pauper was visited by the parish doctor, a salaried officer of the parochial board, and received medicine at the expense of the parochial board. Now, that relief was given under the authority of the statute (sec. 69), and was relief which the parochial board is not entitled to give to anyone but a pauper. Section 69 provides "that in every parish or combination it shall and may be lawful for the parochial board, and they are hereby required, out of the funds raised for the relief of the poor, to provide for medicines, medical attendance, nutritious diet, cordials, and clothing for such poor, in such manner and to such extent as may seem equitable and expedient." Now, the power which is here given to the parochial board, and the obligation which is imposed upon them, is to provide out of the proper poor's funds medical assistance and medicine for "such poor," and they can go no further. If this man was not in the position of a pauper he was not entitled to receive medicine or medical advice at the expense of the parochial board. But it was hardly suggested that he was not in that position. No doubt he did not require to be fed or clothed, but these are not indispensable conditions of pauperism. If he was off work and in want, the parochial board was entitled to assist him in whatever way he required, whether with food, clothing, or medicine, and though here the relief was confined to medicine, it was no less relief given, and quite properly given, under the statute. If it had been thrust upon him when he did not require it, that would have been another affair; and cases have been decided in which it was held that a residential settlement was not interrupted by relief so given, because it was improperly given. But that was not the case here; on the contrary, the relief was given quite properly, and consequently, under section 76 of the statute, there has not been a period of five years during which the person acquiring the settlement has not been in receipt of parochial relief.

Oct. 22, 1880.
Wallace v.
Dempster and Deas.

LORD DEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The medical advice was obtained at the expense of the parochial board, who paid the doctor by salary. I do not know what another doctor might have charged; I do not know what the medicine was; it may or may not have been costly, but whatever the value was, I agree that this man was not entitled to get it from the parochial board unless he was a pauper. The principle applicable is the same as if he had received food or clothing.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—(After expressing his concurrence on the question of fact)—The second and more important point raises a question of law. Is professional medical advice and medicine parochial relief in the sense of the statute? I think there is no difference between aid given in that form and food and clothing. If it had been a case of voluntary giving of medicine, or if the applicant had gone to a public dispensary, there might have been a different question. But here we have a formal application followed by relief, and though the amount was small the principle seems none the less clear. I therefore agree with your Lordships on this point, which I think is the only question of any consequence in the case.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

Bankrupt—Action of exhibition and transumpt—Trustee's power of recovering documents—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, secs. 90, 91, 92.—The trustee of a bankrupt brought an action against the bankrupt's father as sole trustee under his own antenuptial marriage-contract, under which the pursuer alleged that the bankrupt had a right of fee in certain properties, concluding for exhibition and transumpt of the writs and evidents. Held that the proper remedy of the trustee was to call for production of the writs he required under sections 90, 91, and 93 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and action dismissed as unnecessary.

THIS was an action of exhibition and transumpt by Thomas L. Selkirk, trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Service, junior, writer in Glasgow, against the father of the bankrupt, as sole surviving trustee under his own marriage-contract. The pursuer averred that James Service, senior, had, under his antenuptial marriage-contract, conveyed to himself and others, as trustees, certain properties, and that his wife had also conveyed by the same deed certain other properties to the same trustees; that the trustees were to hold these properties for the spouses in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee, and that one of these properties had been sold for £1050 to the Glasgow Improvement Trustees under their Act of 1866, and that the price ought to be in bank; that the bankrupt and his sister were the only children of the marriage, and thus that the bankrupt had an interest in these properties, and the money obtained by the sale of one of them.

The prayer of the petition was "to grant a warrant against the above named defender, ordaining him to exhibit and produce in the hands of the clerk of Court the whole writs, vouchers, and evidents of and concerning the re-investment or deposit in bank of the sum of £1050 sterling mentioned in the condescendence hereto annexed, and also the whole writs and evidents of the heritable subjects described in the sixth statement of the condescendence hereto annexed, to the effect that the said writs, vouchers, and evidents may be judicially transumed, and authentic transumps thereof delivered to the pursuer; and on the same being so produced, to ordain that the said writs be exactly transumed, and that transumps thereof duly authenticated by the clerk of Court be delivered to the pursuer; and to declare that the said transumps shall be as sufficient and of as great force, strength, and effect to the pursuer as if he had extracts of the same from your Lordship's Court-books."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said James Service, junior, having acquired the bankrupt's right of fee in one-half of the said sum of £1050, is entitled to decree as craved quoad the writs, evidents, and vouchers of the re-investment or deposit in bank of the said sum of £1050. (2) The pursuer, as trustee foresaid, having acquired right to the bankrupt's spes successionis in one-half of the said sum of £1050, is entitled to decree as craved quoad the writs, evidents, and vouchers of the re-investment or deposit in bank of the said sum of £1050. (3) The pursuer, as trustee foresaid, having acquired the bankrupt's right of fee in one-half of the subjects described in article 6 of the foregoing condescendence, is entitled to decree as craved quoad the writs and evidents of the said subjects.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) No title to sue. (3) The pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the prayer of the petition.

Selkirk v.
Service.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) found that the pursuer was entitled to exhibition and transumps, and ordained the defender to produce the writs called for for this purpose.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Clark) found "that the pursuer has not set forth grounds sufficiently relevant to warrant the prosecution of the present action of transumpt: Therefore sustains the third plea in law for the defender, and dismisses the action, and decerns." *

The pursuer appealed, and argued that although the trustee might have other ways of obtaining the documents, yet that the present action was a competent mode.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think there is any doubt as to the proper office of an action of transumpt, though it is one which is not often seen now-a-days. It is stated very clearly by Erskine (iv. 1, 53)—"An action of transumpt, which is also accessory, is competent to any person who has a partial interest in a writing, or immediate use for it to support his titles or defences in other actions against him in whose custody the writing lies, to exhibit it, that so a transumpt thereof may be judicially made out and delivered to the pursuer." And he says a little further on—"The pursuer's title to it is most commonly an obligation signed by the defender to grant transumps; but though there should be no such obligation, the action lies if the pursuer can prove that he has an interest in the writings, e.g., that they make part of the title-deeds of his lands; but in that case he must bear the whole expense of transuming." Now, the only question here is, whether that action is a proper proceeding for a trustee in a sequestration to resort to, where his object is to investigate the affairs of the bankrupt, and see whether a certain interest under the provisions of a marriage-contract has vested in the bankrupt, and can be made available for the benefit of his creditors? and I am clearly of opinion with the Sheriff that it is not a proper course. A trustee is armed under the Bankruptcy Statute with very large powers, and especially by sections 90, 91, and 93, he has the means of obtaining exhibition of the whole documents which he seeks in this action by summoning the bankrupt and his father and sister, the only persons interested in this property, and examining them all—in short, of obtaining the whole information in that form, and exhibition of the whole writings here asked for, in the most summary form and at the smallest possible expense. I think it is quite out of the way of a trustee's duty to resort to such a proceeding as this, and I am for adhering to the Sheriff's interlocutor.

If the trustee were to persist in the present action, and were allowed to do so,

* "NOTE.—The averments on record, in so far as they refer to the right of obtaining exhibition for transumpt, are very loose, though probably they are as strongly made as the circumstances of the case warrant. The documents referred to are apparently of two classes. The first are those which have been placed on record, and they therefore can be obtained inspection of, and certified copies taken in the ordinary way. The second are such as can be reached under sections 90 and 91 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. It is therefore difficult to see what end will be served by allowing the present action to proceed. On looking into the authorities as regards an action of transumpt, I do not find any case, nor could any case be indicated, in which the action of transumpt was used for the expiscation of matters arising in a sequestration. Upon these grounds it seems to me that the present action falls to be dismissed."

the first thing he would require to do would be to prove his interest in the writings, which would just be to enter on the merits of the whole case.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I concur with the Sheriff in holding that what the pursuer wants might be got by simpler means, for it is plain that the documents called for could be reached under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. I am of opinion, therefore, that this action is, in the circumstances, incompetent, or rather unnecessary, but I am not prepared to concur with the Sheriff in holding that the grounds of the action are irrelevant. The pursuer avers that the bankrupt has an interest in the fee of certain property, that the property was sold and a price got for it, and that he cannot find out whether or how that price has been invested. Now, in the absence of any other mode of recovering the documents, I should not be prepared to hold that this action would be irrelevant, but I think that it is an expensive and unnecessary form of proceeding, in a case where the Bankrupt Act has provided a simpler remedy, and that it ought, on that account, to be dismissed.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and I very much agree with the remarks which have just fallen from Lord Mure. I am not prepared to say that the trustee has no right to the exhibition and copies of these documents; he probably has; and if this dispute had occurred before sequestration, and the question had been one between James Service, junior, and his father as sole trustee, to get access to these writings, I think the action might have been quite competent. The trustee must prove an interest in the documents, but even assuming that he has done so, he had under the statute a shorter and cheaper remedy. The statute enables bankrupt estates to be wound up without unnecessary litigation, and it is the duty of trustees to avoid expensive legal proceedings as far as possible. I concur with the grounds of judgment stated in the Sheriff's note.

THE COURT of new dismissed the action as unnecessary.

Reparation—Wrongous information—Privilege—Malice and want of probable cause.—A tenant, while removing some flooring from his house was stopped by his landlord on the street; the tenant having refused to return with the flooring, which he claimed as his own, was given into custody by the landlord, but on being taken to the police-office was at once liberated. In an action for reparation held that the landlord had in the circumstances been guilty of such recklessness in giving the tenant into custody as to amount in law to malice, and damages given accordingly.

HUGH THOMSON occupied a house in Fleming Street, Glasgow, as 2D DIVISION. tenant, from Whitsunday 1871. Having a fancy for keeping pigeons he, in 1872, obtained leave from his then landlord to lay flooring upon the rafters in an attic above his dwelling-house, and this attic so floored he fitted up with pigeon-houses and used as a place for rearing and keeping his pigeons. In 1876 George Denholm purchased the tenement in which Thomson's house was, and Thomson became his tenant, and remained so until he received notice to leave as at Whitsunday 1880. o'clock on the evening of 16th April, while Thomson was engaged with some companions in wheeling a barrow loaded with pigeon-houses and flooring from Fleming Street to his new house, Denholm, accompanied by one of his clerks, came up to him in New Road, and insisted upon his taking the wood back to Fleming Street, alleging that the flooring belonged to him as owner of the house. This Thomson refused to do, and Denholm then appealed to a police constable who was standing by. In consequence of this Thomson was taken into custody, and he and the barrow of wood were taken to the Camlachie police-office. When at the police-office Denholm charged Thomson with taking wood belonging to him from the Fleming Street house. The police-inspector suggested that as the matter seemed to involve a question of civil right Thomson should in the meantime take back the wood to Fleming Street, and the case was dismissed, no charge being entered in the police books.

On 28th April Thomson raised an action in the Sheriff Court against Denholm, concluding for £50 in name of solatium or reparation for the injury done to his character and feelings by the accusation which had been made against him. He pleaded;—(1) The defender having acted towards pursuer in a malicious and injurious manner, is responsible for the result of such actings. (2) The defender having, by his grossly calumnious conduct as aforesaid, severely damaged and hurt the character, reputation, and feelings of the pursuer, is bound to make reparation therefor.

Denholm defended the action, and pleaded;—(1) The charge made by defender against pursuer was made with probable cause, and was privileged. (2) The statements made by defender regarding pursuer being true, and made upon justifiable occasion, he should be assoilized, with costs.

A proof was taken, at which the facts given in the above narrative were brought out. It appeared that Denholm had never in so many words charged Thomson with stealing the wood, but it had been generally understood that that was the nature of the charge made. Thomson adduced evidence that the fact of his apprehension and removal to the police-office had been made the subject of comment by his neighbours and acquaintances.

On 30th June 1880 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on Friday 16th April, about nine o'clock in the evening, defender gave the pursuer into custody on a charge of stealing wood from him: Finds that the pursuer was taken along the streets in custody to the Camlachie police-office: Finds that the defender, in preferring such a charge, acted with a recklessness amounting to malice in the legal sense: Finds also that the charge was made without probable cause: Finds, accordingly, that defender is liable in damages to pursuer; assesses these at the sum of £20: Repels, accordingly, the defences, and decerns against defender for said sum of £20 sterling," &c.

Denholm appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The only legal force which can be employed to prevent the wrongous removal of the property of an individual is the police, and that was all that was done here. There was no malice in what had been done. The defender was in the bona fide belief that his property was being taken away without his consent, and he called in the strong arm of the law to protect himself. It did not matter that he was in error as to whose property the wood really was. He acted in bona fide, and therefore could not be said to be malicious. There was certainly a probable cause for his actings. Both malice and want of probable cause must be made out before such an action could succeed.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am quite satisfied with the views expressed by the Sheriff. It is plain that this flooring was put in by the tenant himself for his own purposes. He thought he could remove it, and he was in the act of doing so when the defender interfered and handed him over to the police as taking away what did not belong to him—in other words, on a charge of theft. The evidence of the police officers shews this, and the only question is, has the pursuer good grounds for an action of damages under the circumstances? and I think there is no question that he has. Where privilege is pleaded it is necessary for the party aggrieved to shew that the act complained of was maliciously done—in other words, with undue disregard to the rights of persons—and I think that we have here a very strong case of that kind. The defender, no doubt, had what he thought his rights, but he ought to have made inquiries before he took the course he did. He was not entitled to risk the pursuer's character by exposing him to the public gaze in the way he did on such grounds, and therefore I think that we have malice here, and that the Sheriff-substitute is right. I also think that he has not treated the defender harshly, and there can be little doubt that had the case gone to a jury the penalty to be paid would have been considerably greater.

No. 16.

Oct. 22, 1880.

Denholm v. Thomson.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. There seems to have been considerable difficulty attending the dispute as to whether the flooring was a fixture proper or only a trade fixture, and therefore removable by the tenant, but the way to settle it was certainly not to give the pursuer into charge of the police. Here, though there may have been privilege, there was undoubted recklessness in making the charge, and I must say I think that the Sheriff-substitute in the damages awarded has read the defender a very mild lesson indeed.

LORD YOUNG.—It is said in the summons that the defender maliciously and without probable cause gave the pursuer into custody as a thief, and it only remains for us to say whether the evidence supports the charge, and I think it does, and I therefore concur with your Lordships in affirming the interlocutor appealed against. The only criticism I desire to offer on the interlocutor is that I wish the finding had been one of malice and want of probable cause alone, without the addition of a partial definition of malice. The malice here no doubt arose from a temper of mind unduly exciting the man to act with an ill-feeling which would not probably in other circumstances have appeared; but I wish to offer this remark to the consideration of Sheriffs, that I think it is not desirable that they should put partial definitions into their interlocutors.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that on the occasion libelled the appellant (defender) gave the respondent (pursuer) into the custody of a police officer on a charge of stealing wood, and that the respondent was in consequence conducted in custody through the streets of Glasgow to the police office: Find that in so doing the appellant acted maliciously and without probable cause: Therefore dismiss the appeal," &c.

JAMES A. GUTHRIE, of Craigie, died in January 1873. He left a will in the English form dated 20th April 1872, and a trust-disposition and settlement in the Scotch form dated 1st May 1872. A question having arisen in the course of certain proceedings in England whether a heritable bond, belonging to the deceased, over certain lands in Forfarshire was carried by the will or by the trust-disposition, a Case from the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, was taken for the opinion of the Court of Session by the parties, viz. (1) the deceased's eldest son, David Charles Guthrie, and (2) Beatrice Mary Guthrie and others, his other children.

By the will Mr Guthrie nominated his wife and certain other persons his executors. After certain other provisions, which did not mention the bond, the executors were directed to hold the residue for the widow and children. By the trust-disposition and settlement, on the narrative that he was "desirous to settle the succession and disposal of my heritable estate in Scotland in the event of my death," Mr Guthrie appointed Mr A. C. Guthrie and others trustees, and conveyed to them "all and sundry lands and heritages, and in general the whole heritable estate, of whatever kind or nature, situate in Scotland, at present belonging or which shall belong to me at the time of my decease, with the whole vouchers and instructions, writs, titles, and securities of and concerning my said heritable estate situated in Scotland, and all that has followed or may be competent to follow thereon." He directed them, in the first place, "to dispone and convey my lands and estates of Craigie, and whole other lands and heritages belonging or which shall belong to me at my death, situated in the county of Forfar, parts of the lands and other heritages, in general terms above disposed, to and in favour of David Charles Guthrie, my eldest son, whom failing," &c. In the second place, he directed his trustees to dispone and convey the estate of Flichity, and the whole lands and heritages belonging to him in Inverness-shire, to his second son.

Argued for David C. Guthrie, the eldest son;—The words in the trust-settlement, "whole other lands and heritages belonging or which shall belong to me at my death situated in the county of Forfar," carried the bond. Before the Act 1868 was passed these words would, without doubt, have included the bond, and there was nothing to affect the meaning of the words in sec. 117* of the Act of 1868, or in the interpretation

* "From and after the commencement of this Act no heritable security granted or obtained either before or after that date shall, in whatever terms the same may be conceived, except in the cases hereinafter provided, be heritable as regards the succession of the creditor in such security, and the same, except as hereinafter provided, shall be moveable as regards the succession of such creditor, and shall belong after the death of such creditor to his executors or representatives in mobilibus, in the same manner and to the same extent and effect as such security would, under the law and practice now in force, have belonged to the heirs of such creditor."

clause sec. 3.* Bonds were still called heritable securities, and fell under the words "lands and heritages." The truster's intention was that everything heritable belonging to him in Forfarshire should go to his eldest son, including the bond. This was a reasonable construction of the deed, and ought to be given effect to by the Court. The special words in the disposition applicable to the bond should be preferred to the general words of the will.

Guthrie, &c.

Argued for the younger children ;—The question was whether the bond was heritable or moveable, and as that question was decided it would be carried by the disposition or by the will. There could be no doubt that the bond was moveable under section 117 of the Act of 1868, and was carried by the will.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor returning this answer—
"By the operation of the statute 31 and 32 Vict., cap. 101, the heritable bond for £19,000 in the said case mentioned forms part of the personal estate of the said deceased and belongs to his executors, to be administered by them in terms of his last will and testament, unless by any valid testamentary writing the said deceased has directed the said bond or sum of money therein contained to be otherwise disposed of: For the purpose of determining the said question of law the two testamentary instruments left by the said deceased, viz., the last will and testament dated 20th April 1872, and the trust-disposition and settlement dated 1st May 1872, though executed of different dates, must be read as contemporaneous instruments embodying the whole testamentary purposes of the deceased, except in so far as the same are altered by the codicil of 16th November 1872: The clause in the first named of these instruments conveying the residue of the personal estate and effects of the said deceased to his executors is suitable and effectual to carry and convey the said heritable bond and sum of money therein contained: The last named of these two testamentary instruments, according to its sound construction, does not convey or purport to convey the said bond and sum of money: The Court, therefore, is of opinion that the said bond was carried to the executors of the said deceased by the said last will and testament, and was not carried to the trustees acting under the said trust-disposition and settlement."

Moscrip v.
O'Hara,
Spence, & Co.

Proof—Proof pro ut de jure of agreement to qualify contract of employment—Agent and Client—Agent's right to recover fees—Notary-public.—In an action by a notary-public, who paid attorney-tax, but was not otherwise a qualified law-agent, against a firm of money-lenders for payment for professional services in collecting debts, protesting bills, &c., the money-lenders averred that by a verbal agreement entered into before the notary-public was employed it was expressly stipulated that he was to get no remuneration except what he could extract from the debtors. The pursuer pleaded that such an agreement could only be proved by writ or oath. The Sheriff allowed a proof at large, and on considering the evidence held the agreement proved. On appeal the Court adhered to his judgment.

2d Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

IN June 1879 O'Hara, Spence, & Co., a money-lending firm in Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against George Moscrip, designed as writer in Glasgow, but who was merely a notary-public, and had paid attorney-tax as such, for payment of certain sums of money he had been employed to collect for the pursuers, which they alleged he had received, and had not accounted for. Moscrip defended the action, and averred that any balance apparently due had been paid by him for the professional services of a procurator in the Sheriff Court, employed on behalf of the pursuers.

In answer O'Hara, Spence, & Co. averred, inter alia, that by the agreement under which Moscrip was employed to act for them he was to receive no payment from them, but was to get his expenses out of the parties from whom he collected the money.

Moscrip pleaded, inter alia, that the special agreement founded on by O'Hara, Spence, & Co. could only be proved by his writ or oath.

Moscrip then raised another action against O'Hara, Spence, & Co., concluding for £230 as due to him for his own professional services, and for outlays made by him when compelled to employ a procurator to act for him in the Sheriff Court.

The actions were conjoined.

A proof was taken, in the course of which three partners of the firm of O'Hara, Spence, & Co. deponed that the agreement averred by them was entered into as a condition of Moscrip being allowed to collect their accounts, protest bills, and otherwise act for them. Moscrip himself denied that any such agreement had ever been made, and in support of his statement produced certain accounts, from which it appeared that on several occasions O'Hara, Spence, & Co. had paid him small sums in name of expenses. O'Hara, Spence, & Co. deponed that the sums so paid were expenses paid by the client along with his debt to themselves direct, and that they had at once paid the expenses so recovered to Moscrip. Moscrip was unable to produce any books, and, indeed, had kept none.

The Sheriff-substitute (Lees), on 24th December 1879, found "that the defender was employed by the pursuers to carry on their judicial and other the like legal business for them, but expressly on the footing that he was not to be paid by them for so doing, and was to look to the opposite parties for payment in the event of success." He, however, found him entitled to repayment of outlays bona fide made by him in the conduct of the pursuers' business.

Moscrip appealed to the Sheriff (Clark) who, on 16th February adhered to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

Moscrip appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) Such an agreement as was averred here qualifying the well-known contract of employment could only be proved by writ or oath.¹ (2) Although a notary-public was not entitled to charge according to a qualified law-agent's table of fees, still he was entitled to payment quantum meruit.²

Moscrip v.
O'Hara,
Spence, & Co.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have thought it right to read the evidence, and the result at which we have arrived is that we see no reason to differ from the Sheriffs in the Court below.

The case, however, is not without difficulty and delicacy. There are two actions, the one at the instance of this money-lending firm against their collector—because that is truly the position in which Moscrip put himself—for certain sums of money which they say he collected on their behalf. The other action is at the instance of the collector against his employers for payment of professional services alleged to have been rendered by him to them in the course of recovering or endeavouring to recover various sums of money due to them.

In regard to the first action I need say nothing, but with respect to the second the defenders plead that it was agreed between them and Moscrip that he was to give his professional and personal services for nothing except what he might manage to extract from the debtors while collecting the debts. The collector denies this agreement, and pleads in addition that any such qualification of the contract of employment can only be proved by writ or oath.

Moscrip is not a law-agent—he is only a notary-public. The business, however, in which he was principally engaged was not a notary-public's work, and although I am not to be understood as saying that a notary-public who pays attorney-tax is not entitled to recover remuneration for his services quantum meruit, still I think the nature of the services rendered makes a difference in the strength of his claim for remuneration.

Although I am not disposed to interfere with or differ from Lord Rutherford's dictum in the case of Taylor v. Forbes, which has been referred to, still I am not inclined to follow it in this case. That was the case of a duly qualified practitioner suing for payment for professional services rendered in the ordinary course of his business. This is not a case of that kind at all. It is the case of an ordinary individual without any peculiar qualification undertaking a certain business under a certain contract.

The next question which arises is whether the contract is proved, and what it was. I think it is proved that Moscrip was to carry on the legal and other business of these money-lenders on the footing that he was to look for his remuneration solely to the persons opposed to him, and that, of course, only in the event of success. From the evidence I hold that to be the contract. Three partners of the firm speak to that as being the arrangement. True, Moscrip denies that that was the agreement—and that is not the least unpleasant part of this case—because the case turns on simple averment and denial.

The real evidence of the case shews, however, that that was the true nature of the contract. The exceptions from the ordinary course of dealing, which were so strongly pressed upon us, are the very cases which prove the defenders' case. They are all cases where the debtor paid the debt and expenses direct to

JAMES ALLAN & SON, Defenders.—Keir—Dickson.

Master and Servant—Yearly engagement—Tacit relocation—Special agreement.—Held that the rule of tacit relocation did not apply to an engagement of a workman for one year.

ED DIVISION.

ON 5th January 1879 a strike took place in the shoemaking trade in Edinburgh. James Allan & Son, boot and shoemakers there, in order to secure workmen, undertook to supply those men who would return to their workshop with constant employment for a year. On 24th February they entered into an engagement with, among others, Hugh Lennox, a journeyman shoemaker. This engagement was in the following terms :—" Memorandum.—From Allan & Son, bootmakers, 42 Leith Street, to Mr Hugh Lennox.—Edinburgh, 24th February 1879.—Dear Sir,—I bind and oblige to give you constant work for the period of twelve months from this date, at the rate of 28s. per week. JAMES ALLAN & SON."

Lennox entered their service and continued to work for them until 24th February 1880, when Allan & Son's manager reminded him that his engagement expired that day. Lennox thereupon consulted an agent, who wrote to Allan & Son that day claiming that he was entitled to a new engagement for a year by tacit relocation, forty days' notice not having been given him of the proposed termination of the engagement. Allan & Son did not recognise this claim, but, on 25th February, they put up a notice in their workshop stating that none of the yearly engagements were to be renewed. In consequence of the 24th of February being a Wednesday they allowed Lennox to work on for them until Saturday when they paid him his week's wages as usual, and intimated that they would thereafter only engage him on the same terms as their other workmen. Lennox refused to work on these terms, and raised an action against Allan & Son, in which he concluded for £72 as the amount of wages which he was entitled to under the new twelve months' engagement, which he averred had been entered into by tacit relocation.

Allan & Son defended the action.

Pleaded for Lennox ;—(1) The defenders' agreement with the pursuer having been renewed by tacit relocation, they were not entitled during its currency to terminate the same without fault or consent on his part.

A proof was allowed and taken, in the course of which it was admitted that engagements for twelve months were very unusual in the shoemaking trade.

The Lord Ordinary, on 24th July 1880, pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the pursuer was engaged by the defenders as a shoemaker, for the period of twelve months from 24th February 1879, at the rate of 28s. per week, in terms of the memorandum, No. 6 of process, and that at the end of that period he was informed by the defenders that his engagement was terminated, and that if he remained it would be on the same terms as other workmen daily engaged: Finds that he was not dismissed, and that he was not entitled to hold his said engagement renewed for another period of twelve months: Finds also, that having been offered continued employment upon the usual terms, he had no claim to wages in room of notice: Therefore assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

Lennox reclaimed, and argued;—No warning had been given before

Allan & Son.

* "NOTE.—By agreement of parties the proof in this case was held to be the proof also in two other actions against the same defenders; and the Lord Ordinary was desirous to go over the evidence before disposing of any of them. The result, however, has been, that the Lord Ordinary is unable to find in any of the cases ground for a judgment in favour of the pursuers.

"In the present action at the instance of Hugh Lennox, the pursuer's engagement took place on 24th February 1879, under the special circumstances described by him. It was embodied in a memorandum in the following terms:—(quoted in narrative).

"According to the Lord Ordinary's view of the proof, no warning was given to the pursuer, prior to 24th February 1880, that his services were to be discontinued. The defenders evidently thought no warning was needed. But when they heard on the morning of 25th February, by the letter, No. 12 of process, which they then received from the pursuer's agent, they caused notice to be given to the pursuer and other workmen similarly engaged, that their engagements were not to be renewed, and that if they remained after the expiry of their engagements (as apparently they might have done), it would be upon the same terms as the other workmen daily engaged. The pursuer was told that he might work out his week, and have continued employment upon the ordinary terms, but he insisted that he would work under a continued yearly engagement, or not at all; and at the close of the week he accordingly left, intimating his claim to a renewed service for another period of twelve months upon the ground of tacit relocation.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the engagement in question was not one to which the doctrine of tacit relocation is applicable. It was quite a special engagement entered into under exceptional circumstances, and unaccompanied by any stipulation, express or implied, that the service was to continue at the end of the twelve months for another period of the same duration if no notice was given. In substance it was, in the Lord Ordinary's view, an engagement by the week, with a guarantee on the part of the employer that it should endure for twelve months. It does not follow that at the end of the period either party might terminate the employment without any notice whatever. The Lord Ordinary inclines to think that some notice was necessary, and that a week's notice would have been held to be reasonable in a question either of desertion by the servant or dismissal by the master. In the present case, however, he has come to be satisfied that there was no dismissal. He thinks it proved that the pursuer was offered farther employment, and refused to take it except upon the condition of his being accepted as a yearly servant, engaged by tacit relocation for a second period of twelve months.

"The Lord Ordinary has found the pursuer liable in expenses, because, in his view, there was no justification for raising the present action in the Court of Session, excepting the pursuer's desire to try the question of right as to whether the engagement was of the character which he ascribes to it. Upon that question the pursuer, in the Lord Ordinary's view, has failed; and as his mistake upon that point has been the cause of the whole litigation, in which he has been unsuccessful, the usual consequences must follow."

No. 19. the expiry of this yearly engagement, and in consequence tacit relocation for another year had taken place.¹

Oct. 26, 1880.
Lennox v.
Allan & Son.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The foundation of the pursuer's argument fails entirely, as he is without the basis on which alone it can be supported. The law of tacit relocation, upon which he relies, has reference only to specific classes of servants—agricultural, domestic, and the like. The pursuer does not dispute that the rule as regards them depends upon custom, yet he seeks to import it into the case of master and workman, where there is no such custom at all. The reason why there is no such custom as exists in the case of servants of the kind I have referred to is that an engagement of the kind that we have here is very unusual. The rule is an artificial one, and is created and grows out of the ordinary understanding among the people to whom it applies. If extended to other forms of employment it might easily become excessively inconvenient. In such cases an engagement for twelve months is not usual. This engagement must, therefore, be held to have been for twelve months only, and then to come to an end. In that case there was no necessity for notice of any sort on either side, except in the case of dismissal or throwing up of the employment.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. The necessity for giving forty days' notice in the case of an agricultural servant depends upon custom altogether—it is therefore a matter of customary law. It is true that custom was the foundation of it—that is, custom preceded the establishment of the law. If there had been an averment here of a custom or usage in the trade a proof of that custom would have been allowed. But there is no allegation of custom with regard to shoemakers, nay, it is admitted that there is no such custom, such an engagement as this being admitted to be very rare and exceptional. This is a very special engagement, framed to meet a strike among the workmen, and under it twelve months' employment is promised to this workman if he will break from his fellow-workmen during the strike. That leaves open the question of what is reasonable notice. That the circumstances of the case always decide. I concur with the Lord Ordinary that this is a special case, where there is no room for the application of tacit relocation.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The only point on which I wish to guard myself is whether there is any occasion at all for notice where the engagement is for a precise period. On that point I give no opinion; but my impression is that where there is no usage, and the agreement is for a precise specified period, the agreement itself contains the notice, distinguishing it from the case where no period is specified. What I would not approve of is that where, as here, we have an obligation to keep a man in work for a year, he should be able to say that that meant for longer than a year.

THE COURT adhered.

Earl of Bread-

Superior and Vassal—Non-entry—Proof of Superior's title.—In 1821 a vassal entered with a superior. The lands were subsequently sold, and no other entry was asked by the superior until 1879, when an action was brought for payment of casualty against a singular successor of the vassal in question. It was not stated when the latter died. Held that the defender was liable unless he could shew that the superiority belonged to some one other than the representative of the superior with whom the previous entry had been made.

1st Division.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

THE Earl of Breadalbane was superior of the six merk land of old extent of Soroba and others, in the parish of Kilbride, lordship of Lorn, and sheriffdom of Argyll, and now claimed payment, under the 4th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, of a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, of which the entry was untaxed, from Alexander William Macdougall of Soroba.

Major Duncan Macdougall was the vassal last seised in the lands, conform to precept of clare constat by John fourth Earl of Breadalbane, dated 20th August 1821, and instrument of sasine following thereon. He had since died, but the date of his death was not stated.

In 1824 Major Macdougall had sold the lands to Hugh Munro of Barnaline, and his trustees in turn sold to the defender, who was now infett.

The defender denied that his lands were held of the pursuer. He averred that Macdougall of Dunollie was his superior, and he produced certain titles shewing that Dunollie held the six merk lands of Soroba directly under the Duke of Argyll from the beginning of the last century, and had acquired the superiority and been entered with the Crown in virtue of a conveyance by the then Duke of Argyll in 1819, and had thereafter consolidated the superiority and mid-superiority by resignation in his own hand.

A proof was led, at which certain titles were produced, which are sufficiently narrated in the Lord President's opinion.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th June 1880, decerned in terms of the declaratory conclusion, and gave decree for payment of £284, 13s., being one year's rent of the lands after deductions.

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The pursuer had not established that he was superior of the defender's lands. He must do so before he could get decree.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Is it not enough to shew that there is a superiority of these lands vested in a party whose ancestor you have recognised? What do you say to Innes v. Gordon, Nov. 20, 1844, 7 D. 141?

Trayner.—The defender was not called on to pay the pursuer and risk a second payment to Dunollie. Upon the titles the one was as much superior as the other.

Argued for the respondent ;—Major Duncan Macdougall, the defender's predecessor, having entered with the then Lord Breadalbane in 1821, the defender must pay the casualty due upon the death of the Major, unless he could shew that Lord Breadalbane was not his superior. This had not been done. Under Dunollie's titles both property and superiority were consolidated. That shewed that his lands of Soroba were not the same as those for which the casualty was asked.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a very clear case. The pursuer alleges that he is the superior of certain lands, and, as such, claims a casualty from the defender, who, he asserts, is his vassal in the lands. The defender denies the pursuer's title. In such a case the first thing is to look at the defender's titles in order to see when and with whom he was last entered. The defender bought the lands in question in 1870 from a Mr George Grant Mackay, who had himself purchased them a short time previously. Before that, in 1824, Hugh Munro of Barnaline, a disponsee of Major Duncan Macdougall of Soroba, was infeft in the same lands. Major Macdougall had entered with the superior a few years previously, and the party with whom he entered was the pursuer or his predecessor, for, by precept of clare constat, dated 20th August 1821, he was acknowledged to be the vassal by the then Earl of Breadalbane, and was infeft in the same year. No doubt there has been no entry since. But we do not know how long Major Macdougall lived. He may have lived for a long time after 1824, and so long as he lived the fee was full. A purchaser of the estate would hold of him during his lifetime. So that we cannot tell when Lord Breadalbane had an opportunity of obtaining a new entry. And, therefore, there may be nothing very extraordinary or inexplicable in the circumstance that these lands may have been in non-entry for some years.

But the important fact is that the last entry was with a Lord Breadalbane, and that the present defender is the singular successor of the person who took that entry. That fact is conclusive of the case upon the authority of Innes v. Gordon, unless the defender will undertake to shew that the superiority is not with Lord Breadalbane, but with some one else. The present Lord Breadalbane is a successor of the Lord Breadalbane of 1821, by a regular progress of titles, so that the titles on both sides, both those of the superiority and of the dominium utile, are complete. There is therefore an end of the case, unless the defender can shew that the entry in 1821 was a mistake, and ought not to have been taken.

But when we go backwards from that date we find not one such entry but several such entries. There is one in 1740, another in 1795, and this one in 1821; so that thereby the defender's task is rendered the more difficult, because he must shew that all these entries proceeded upon a mistake, owing to the superiority having really belonged to some different person. How does he attempt to do this? He begins five years later than the date of the first entry I have mentioned, with a charter by the Duke of Argyll to Macdougall of Dunollie in 1745. It would be odd if Lord Breadalbane were giving in 1740 one entry to this subject and the Duke of Argyll were giving five years later another entry under the same superiority, the right of which had been exercised so recently before by another party. But passing that by, the state of the titles produced by the defender instructs that in 1819 Macdougall of Dunollie, being the owner of "the six merk land of Soroba," obtained a conveyance to the superiority from the Duke of Argyll, and upon that he was entered as crown-vassal in 1819. Then, having both rights in his own person he consolidated the property and superiority, and his successor now stands infeft as a crown-vassal in the superiority and dominium utile as so consolidated. He holds the superiority directly, just as a crown-vassal would. How that could put him into the position of being the superior of the defender I do not see. He is infeft in a substantial estate of dominium utile held of the Crown. But in the estate we are dealing with under this summons there is a mid-superiority reaching from 1740 down to the present day, or, at least, to 1821. I ask whether it is

A puzzle, no doubt, arises from the use of the same name; but it is possible, if not common, that there should be two such estates, and that is the only way of explaining the obscurity. But in order to the success of the defender it must be demonstrated that a person other than the pursuer is his superior; and I am therefore of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer is entitled to have his casualty.

Anderson v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank.

LIQUIDATORS OF CITY OF GLASGOW BANK, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Balfour—Kinnear—Asher—Low.

Public Company—Companies Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, sec. 121—Contributory—Suspension of a charge to pay calls granted without caution.—The liquidators of a joint stock bank, which was being wound up, came to an arrangement with one of the contributories, who was unable to pay the second call, that he should pay a sum of money and they should grant him a discharge. The authority of the Court was interposed to the compromise, and the money was paid. The liquidators refused to deliver the discharge, and obtained an order against the contributory for payment of the call, and caused him to be charged thereon. They averred that the contributory had not made a fair disclosure of his affairs before obtaining the discharge, and in particular that he had not disclosed the fact that he had recently become a partner of a trading company. They also averred that after the date of the compromise he had paid money into the copartnership funds.

In the special circumstances of the case note of suspension of the charge to pay a call passed without caution.

B.

JAMES ANDERSON, farmer, Sandyhills, was holder of £257 stock of the City of Glasgow Bank at the date of its stoppage on 2d October 1878. He paid the first call of £500 per each £100 stock. The liquidators having made a second call on 22d April 1879 Mr Anderson could not pay £5782, 10s., which was the amount he was liable for, and he entered into negotiations for a compromise. The liquidators eventually agreed to give him a discharge on his paying £1300. Accordingly he raised the money and paid the liquidators £1300 on 5th March 1880. The Court, on 19th March 1880, by interlocutor, interposed their authority to this arrangement. A discharge was prepared and was signed by Mr Anderson, but the liquidators refused to go on with it, and retained it in their own hands. They included the name of Mr Anderson in a list of contributories presented to the Court under section 121 * of the Companies Act, 1862, and

* "Section 121. Where an order, interlocutor, or decree has been made in Scotland for winding up a company by the Court, it shall be competent to the Court in Scotland during session, and to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation, on production by the liquidators of a list certified by them of the names of the contributories liable in payment of any calls which they may wish to enforce, and of the amount due by each contributory respectively, and of the date when the same became due, to pronounce forthwith a decree against such contributories for payment of the sums so certified to be due by each of them respec-obtained an order on him to pay the second call. Having been charged under this order Mr Anderson brought a note of suspension. No. 23.

The liquidators lodged answers, in which they averred that the complainer had not made a fair surrender of his estate. They stated,—“ Explained that after the sanction of the Court had been obtained to the proposed compromise with the complainer, the respondents discovered that at the time when he was negotiating the said compromise with them he was a partner in the firm of John R. Rennie & Co., tube manufacturers, Wallace Street, Tradeston, Glasgow. The complainer had concealed the fact from the respondents. On making this discovery the respondents at once directed that the discharge should not be delivered to the complainer, and that inquiries should be made as to his connection with said firm. The result of these inquiries was to shew that the complainer had entered into partnership with John R. Rennie, as tube manufacturers, by contract of partnership dated 2d July 1879. By said contract the complainer agreed to contribute £1500 to the capital of said firm. The respondents employed Mr John M'Lean, accountant, Glasgow, to examine the books of the firm, and, from a report furnished by him it appeared that the complainer had, on 31st December 1879, a sum of £698, 3s. at his credit in said firm. The complainer had paid that sum into said firm by instalments, the first of which was paid on 29th August 1879, and the last on 31st December 1879. The respondents, after receiving Mr M'Lean's report, called upon the complainer for an explanation, and on 4th May 1880 the complainer furnished them with a statement in which he attempted to reconcile the facts stated above with his said declaration upon which the said proposed compromise proceeded. As the said statement was unsatisfactory, and in several respects obviously untrue, the respondents called upon the complainer to account to them for the sum at his credit in said firm. The complainer refused to do so, and the respondents then took decree against him (as they were entitled to do), as a defaulting contributory, and gave him the charge which he now seeks to suspend.”

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The respondents having accepted the surrender of his estates made by the complainer, having thereupon compromised their claim against him, and he having executed a discharge, they are not now entitled to refuse delivery of the said discharge in duplicate, or to proceed with the present diligence. (2) The decree on which the said charge proceeds having been obtained without informing the Court of the foresaid compromise and of the foresaid executed discharge, has been obtained on a partial and misleading application, and is therefore not due authority for the diligence now complained against. (3) As the Court would not have granted the said decree had all the facts now stated been mentioned the present charge ought to be suspended.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) The complainer having fraudulently concealed his interest in the said firm the respondents were entitled to refuse delivery of the said discharge, and to take decree against the complainer as a defaulting contributory, and that notwithstanding that the said proposed compromise had been sanctioned by the Court.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators and considered the note of suspension, tively, with interest from the said date till payment, at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, in the same way and to the same effect as if they had severally consented to registration for execution on a charge of six days of a legal obligation to pay such calls and interest; and such decree may be extracted immediately, and no suspension thereof shall be competent, except on caution or consignment, unless with special leave of the Court or Lord Ordinary.”

answers thereto, and productions, grants special leave to the suspender to apply for suspension of the charge complained of without caution or consignment, and passes the note without caution or consignment."

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—They were quite justified in obtaining an order for payment of calls under the 121st section of the Companies Act, as the complainer had concealed the fact that he was a partner of the firm of Rennie & Co. when he made the arrangement for a compromise. The status of partner was worth something, and ought to have been disclosed. The discharge was not a delivered deed, and was no bar to the liquidators proceeding to enforce calls. Even if delivered, there was evidence to shew that it proceeded on an insufficient valuation of the complainer's means. It was not a contract, as the only person who got benefit from it was the complainer. At all events the note should not have been passed without caution.

Argued for the complainer;—The complainer had made a fair surrender of his whole effects, and the fact that he got funds from friends after he had arranged with the liquidators was no reason for refusing to give him the benefit of the discharge. The discharge was admitted by the liquidators, and therefore did not require delivery. The decree under the 121st section was obtained without any notice to the complainer, and he should have an opportunity of stating objection to it. He was unable to find caution, and if the note was not passed without caution he would be unable to obtain any inquiry into the circumstances.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case there was an arrangement made between the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank and the complainer for a surrender of his estate, in respect that he was unable to pay the second call which had been made upon the shares held by him in the City of Glasgow Bank, and that arrangement proceeded upon a payment made by him of £1300, in respect of which it was agreed that he should obtain a discharge from the liquidators of his whole obligations as a partner. The arrangement, the money having been paid, was sanctioned by the Court on the 19th of March last. The effect of course was to liberate Mr Anderson from all farther liability; but notwithstanding the liquidators have taken decree against him as a contributory in terms of the 121st section of the Companies Act of 1862, and he has brought a suspension of that decree upon grounds which are certainly rather peculiar. If the arrangement for compromise is binding upon the liquidators it is quite plain that they were not entitled to take the decree against him which they have done. But the ground upon which they have proceeded is, that they discovered, after the sanction of the Court had been given to the arrangement, but before the discharge had been delivered to Mr Anderson, that he had not made a fair surrender of his estate, but was possessed of funds and of an interest in a trading company which he had not disclosed to them. Now, it is quite necessary in a case of this kind to attend particularly to the terms and effect of the 121st section of the statute. It enacts that it shall be competent for the Court, on production by the liquidators of a list certified by them of the names of the contributories liable in payment of any calls, and of the amount due by each contributory, to pronounce forthwith a decree therefor, and that such decree may be extracted immediately. A similar clause in the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1858, has been interpreted in the case of Lumsden, in the same year (21 Dunlop, 110), as meaning that where an application is made by the liquidators, in terms of this section, to the Court, decree passes as a matter of course, and no person against whom decree is sought under that application is entitled to be heard against the granting of the decree. But then the statute provides further, that no suspension of that decree shall be competent except upon caution or consignation, unless with special leave of the Court or Lord Ordinary. Now, although that part of the clause is expressed in a negative form, it plainly implies an affirmative enactment, that a suspension may be competent upon caution or consignation, and also with special leave of the Court without caution or consignation. The question therefore comes to be, whether in the circumstances of this case we should comply with the demand of the complainer to pass this note without caution or consignation? That course is certainly not to be followed except in exceptional circumstances. But it rather appears to me, on full consideration, that we shall not be doing any violence to this clause of the statute, nor acting inconsistently with its spirit and intention, if we affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor passing the note without caution or consignation.

Anderson v.
Liquidators of
City of Glasgow Bank.

It must be observed, that unless the liquidators are well founded in their complaint that this gentleman has not made a full and fair surrender of his estate, they would have had no right to take this decree against him at all, because they had undertaken that he should be discharged of all his obligations upon payment of a sum of £1300, which has been actually paid. And the peculiarity of the case therefore is, that this suspension must necessarily be passed, unless it can be shewn by the liquidators that there is some justification for what they have done—I mean in withholding the delivery of the discharge. Under all ordinary circumstances, where the liquidators have not come under any obligation to the contributory, it would be quite out of the question to pass the note without caution or consignation, because the contributory is on the list of contributories, and that is the foundation of his liability. But in the present circumstances this contributory would be entitled to have the discharge which has been actually executed delivered over to him, and in his hands, but for the allegation which the respondents make, that he has not made a full and fair surrender of his estate. Now, if the liquidators could have shewn in the Bill-Chamber that this complainer was certainly possessed of funds and estate which he had not disclosed or given up, I think we should have been in a condition at once to refuse the note; but the circumstances brought before us do not bear that construction very clearly. I give no opinion on what the ultimate result of this case may be, but all I say in the meantime is, that without further inquiry I think we have not before us a sufficient justification of the liquidators refusing to go on to complete the arrangement which they made with this gentleman by delivering the discharge; and therefore I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAR.—It appeared to me at first that this note should only be passed upon caution, but it is plain enough that this would be equivalent to refusing the note, and as such investigation need not occupy much time, I am not disposed to differ from your Lordships that, after what has already taken place with the liquidators, it will be more satisfactory to have the investigation, and therefore that the note may be passed without caution.

LORD MURR.—I have come to the same conclusion. The only doubt in my mind was as to whether the note should be passed without caution: for in the circumstances of the case I have no doubt the note should be passed to try the points in dispute between the parties. There is a distinct allegation here, on the part of the complainer, that he has made a fair surrender of his property. That is denied by the liquidators, and is a very material fact in the case which requires investigation. To clear up that fact therefore, upon which the whole matter turns, proof is required. The difficulty is as to caution. But it must be observed that of the £5000 odd for which the liquidators take decree a very considerable sum has been paid to them on the understanding that the compromise was to take place. The only circumstance as to withholding information, which was strongly founded upon on the part of the liquidators, was that the complainer did not disclose the fact that he was a partner of a concern in Glasgow at the time the declaration was emitted. In point of fact, that is correct. There was no specific disclosure of that fact; and although the complainer had only recently become a partner, and had put no funds into the concern at that time, it would undoubtedly have been better if he had stated what his intentions were in that respect. But as far as I see at present, that is the only incorrect statement he made with regard to the information given to the liquidators. It appears, however, that since the date of the declaration he has paid certain sums of money into that concern. But I do not see any evidence to instruct that his statement is correct, that the money so paid in was all borrowed from friends after the date of the discharge, and that £200 of it was got from the relief fund in Glasgow which was distributed among the unfortunate shareholders of the bank; and I do not think it probable that the parties, who had the distribution of that relief fund, would have contributed this £200 to the complainer, if he had been in the position of having funds of his own. Upon the whole facts of the case I think we are warranted in passing the note without caution.

LORD SHAND.—I entertain a very clear opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and that he had no other course in justice to the complainer except that which he has adopted, of passing this note without caution. The statute, in the section of it to which your Lordship has referred, provides that decree shall pass against the contributories in a list given in by the liquidators, as a matter of course, and that a party shall not be heard to resist the granting of that decree at the time it is asked. That, I think, would have been a very harsh and unjust enactment if it had not been guarded as it has been by the Legislature; but there is a provision at the end of the section to the effect that while decree shall be so given for the purpose of despatch in the liquidation, the Court have it in their power in a suspension to allow the decree to be suspended without caution or consignation; and I shall only say that I think that while the Court will no doubt jealously see that a note is not passed in such circumstances without reasonable grounds, on the other hand where there are reasonable grounds for trying the question as between the liquidators and a contributory, the contributory should have the benefit of that provision.

Now, in this case the suspender says,—“I arranged that my entire liability should be met by a certain payment;” and the liquidators admit that. He says he made the payment, and the liquidators admit that. He is therefore in the position of having a concluded compromise with them with the authority of the Court. They say they have discovered something subsequently that destroys that agreement, but it appears to me to be very clear that the onus in regard to that matter is upon them; and unless they were in a position to satisfy the Court now beyond all question, upon the documents before the Court, that the agreement was not binding, I think this gentleman is entitled to have the note passed without caution, because it is obvious that if caution is imposed upon him it is simply throwing him out of Court, and deciding the case against him. No. 23.

Nov. 5, 1880.
Anderson v.
Liquidators of
gow Bank.

I shall say nothing upon the merits of the question involved, except this, that the case which the suspender presents is one of a class of which we have seen many—where a contributory ruined by the fall of this bank has made arrangements for beginning the world again as soon as he gets his settlement made. He had apparently arranged to enter into a contract of copartnery, and signed the contract in the beginning of July, and on 25th July he signed a declaration in which he says that he had disclosed everything he had in the world. The liquidators say he should have mentioned this contract of copartnery, and I do not say that a very cautious man might not have done so. But if the fact be that that contract of copartnery had given him nothing, and could give him nothing, in the way of property unless and until he got friends to advance money for him to put into the business to enable him to begin the world again, I can perfectly well understand the reason why there was no notice taken of that contract in the declaration. Accordingly, he does say that he had not put a penny into this business, and he had not a penny to put into it, and that after he had got his matters arranged friends lent him money, and he put that money subsequently into the business. I put it to the counsel for the liquidators if they were prepared to gainsay that, and if they were in a position to prove that this gentleman had funds of his own which he was improperly concealing, and I got the answer, No. In these circumstances, I have not the slightest doubt that the clear course, in justice to the suspender, was to pass the note, and that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

I shall only say further that I think it will be matter of regret if the parties should think it necessary to go into a proof upon this matter unless they find on investigation that there is clear evidence of concealment here. On the one hand, I think the suspender is somewhat to blame for the very loose way in which his explanatory statement was framed. Perhaps he may not be himself at fault for that; it may be that his agent is to blame for it. There was undoubtedly enough in articles 5 and 6 of that statement to justify the liquidators in thinking for a time that there had been an improper concealment here. But when we come to the subsequent part of the statement, and the documents on which it is founded, I cannot help thinking that extrajudicial investigation should shew one way or other quite clearly whether the sum of £600 put into the business was not got, as the suspender says it was, from friends after he had made the arrangement with the bank. If it should be found on such extrajudicial investigation—the suspender, of course, giving every facility in that direction—that this money was really borrowed from friends, and was not property of which he was possessed at the time he made this declaration, then I should hope that this litigation will proceed no farther. It may be that the suspender ought to pay the expense caused by the loose statement in his declaration, but I think that this is a case in which the liquidators should make such extrajudicial investigation as I have pointed at, and, if possible, get this matter arranged.

THE COURT adhered.

answers thereto, and productions, grants special leave to the suspender to apply for suspension of the charge complained of without caution or consignation, and passes the note without caution or consignation."

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—They were quite justified in obtaining an order for payment of calls under the 121st section of the Companies Act, as the complainer had concealed the fact that he was a partner of the firm of Rennie & Co. when he made the arrangement for a compromise. The status of partner was worth something, and ought to have been disclosed. The discharge was not a delivered deed, and was no bar to the liquidators proceeding to enforce calls. Argued for the complainer;—The complainer had made a fair surrender of his whole effects, and the fact that he got funds from friends after he had arranged with the liquidators was no reason for refusing to give him the benefit of the discharge. The discharge was admitted by the liquidators, and therefore did not require delivery. The decree under the 121st section was obtained without any notice to the complainer, and he should have an opportunity of stating objection to it. He was unable to find caution, and if the note was not passed without caution he would be unable to obtain any inquiry into the circumstances.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case there was an arrangement made between the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank and the complainer for a surrender of his estate, in respect that he was unable to pay the second call which had been made upon the shares held by him in the City of Glasgow Bank, and that arrangement proceeded upon a payment made by him of £1300, in respect of which it was agreed that he should obtain a discharge from the liquidators of his whole obligations as a partner. The arrangement, the money having been paid, was sanctioned by the Court on the 19th of March last. The effect of course was to liberate Mr Anderson from all farther liability; but notwithstanding the liquidators have taken decree against him as a contributory in terms of the 121st section of the Companies Act of 1862, and he has brought a suspension of that decree upon grounds which are certainly rather peculiar. If the arrangement for compromise is binding upon the liquidators it is quite plain that they were not entitled to take the decree against him which they have done. Now, it is quite necessary in a case of this kind to attend particularly to the terms and effect of the 121st section of the statute. It enacts that it shall be competent for the Court, on production by the liquidators of a list certified by them of the names of the contributories liable in payment of any calls, and of the amount due by each contributory, to pronounce forthwith a decree therefor, and that such decree may be extracted immediately. A similar clause in the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1858, has been interpreted in the case of Lumsden, in the same year (21 Dunlop, 110), as meaning that where an application is made by the liquidators, in terms of this section, to the Court, decree passes as a matter of course, and no person against whom

LORD SHAND.—I entertain a very clear opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and that he had no other course in justice to the complainer except that which he has adopted, of passing this note without caution. The statute, in the section of it to which your Lordship has referred, provides that decree shall pass against the contributories in a list given in by the liquidators, as a matter of course, and that a party shall not be heard to resist the granting of that decree at the time it is asked. That, I think, would have been a very harsh and unjust enactment if it had not been guarded as it has been by the Legislature; but there is a provision at the end of the section to the effect that while decree shall be so given for the purpose of despatch in the liquidation, the Court have it in their power in a suspension to allow the decree to be suspended without caution or consignment; and I shall only say that I think that while the Court will no doubt jealously see that a note is not passed in such circumstances without reasonable grounds, on the other hand where there are reasonable grounds for trying the question as between the liquidators and a contributory, the contributory should have the benefit of that provision.

Now, in this case the suspender says,—“I arranged that my entire liability should be met by a certain payment;” and the liquidators admit that. He says he made the payment, and the liquidators admit that. He is therefore in the position of having a concluded compromise with them with the authority of the Court. They say they have discovered something subsequently that destroys that agreement, but it appears to me to be very clear that the onus in regard to that matter is upon them; and unless they were in a position to satisfy the Court now beyond all question, upon the documents before the Court, that the agreement was not binding, I think this gentleman is entitled to have the note passed without caution, because it is obvious that if caution is imposed upon him it is simply throwing him out of Court, and deciding the case against him.

Anderson v.
Liquidators of
gow Bank.

I shall say nothing upon the merits of the question involved, except this, that the case which the suspender presents is one of a class of which we have seen many—where a contributory ruined by the fall of this bank has made arrangements for beginning the world again as soon as he gets his settlement made. He had apparently arranged to enter into a contract of copartnery, and signed the contract in the beginning of July, and on 25th July he signed a declaration in which he says that he had disclosed everything he had in the world. The liquidators say he should have mentioned this contract of copartnery, and I do not say that a very cautious man might not have done so. But if the fact be that that contract of copartnery had given him nothing, and could give him nothing, in the way of property unless and until he got friends to advance money for him to put into the business to enable him to begin the world again, I can perfectly well understand the reason why there was no notice taken of that contract in the declaration. Accordingly, he does say that he had not put a penny into this business, and he had not a penny to put into it, and that after he had got his matters arranged friends lent him money, and he put that money subsequently into the business. I put it to the counsel for the liquidators if they were prepared to gainsay that, and if they were in a position to prove that this gentleman had funds of his own which he was improperly concealing, and I got the answer, No. In these circumstances, I have not the slightest doubt that the clear course, in justice to the suspender, was to pass the note, and that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

I shall only say further that I think it will be matter of regret if the parties should think it necessary to go into a proof upon this matter unless they find on investigation that there is clear evidence of concealment here. On the one hand, I think the suspender is somewhat to blame for the very loose way in which his explanatory statement was framed. Perhaps he may not be himself at fault for that; it may be that his agent is to blame for it. There was undoubtedly enough in articles 5 and 6 of that statement to justify the liquidators in thinking for a time that there had been an improper concealment here. But when we come to the subsequent part of the statement, and the documents on which it is founded, I cannot help thinking that extrajudicial investigation should shew one way or other quite clearly whether the sum of £600 put into the business was not got, as the suspender says it was, from friends after he had made the arrangement with the bank. If it should be found on such extrajudicial investigation—the suspender, of course, giving every facility in that direction—that this money was really borrowed from friends, and was not property of which he was possessed at the time he made this declaration, then I should hope that this litigation will proceed no farther. It may be that the suspender ought to pay the expense caused by the loose statement in his declaration, but I think that this is a case in which the liquidators should make such extrajudicial investigation as I have pointed at, and, if possible, get this matter arranged.

THE COURT adhered.

 Huntly's Trustees v. Hallyburton's Trustees.

Entail—Right of heir to cut timber.—A truster directed his estate to be entailed on A, his nephew, and certain other heirs, with this provision,—“And for the preservation of the growing timber and plantations on my said lands, I hereby direct my trustees to reserve the timber and plantations on my said estate when they convey the said lands to A, and the other heirs before mentioned: And it is hereby provided and conditioned that it shall not be lawful to A, or the whole heirs of entail, to cut down the growing timber or plantations, or any part thereof, without the consent and authority of my said trustees; and that my said trustees shall not be empowered to give such consent unless the growing timber or plantations on my said estate shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation: Declaring also that the produce of all fallen trees, or cut timber, or bark, shall be applied in discharge of the various burdens charged on my said estate.” By a deed of alteration and ratification, executed a year later, he made this provision,—“I declare that the principal sums of all debts, legacies, and provisions shall be charged and chargeable upon and affect only the fee of my said lands and estate of . . . and others, and that the rents thereof shall be chargeable with annual payments only; and I further declare that the free revenues of my said estates shall not be accumulated during the subsistence of this trust, nor applied in the payment of capital debts or provisions, but, on the contrary, shall be regularly paid over to my nephew, A, and the heirs of entail substituted to him, as the same shall arise,—that is, the rents and revenues of these estates, after deducting all public burdens, interest of debts, and provisions, jointures, annuities, and other annual charges.” Held (rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) upon a construction of the two deeds that the heir in possession was not bound to apply the proceeds of sales of timber to the reduction of the capital debts of the estate.

Opinion per Lord President that he would have been so bound had the first deed not been altered by the second. Opinions per Lord Deas and Lord Shand that neither deed required him to do so.

Bona fide consumption.—Opinions per Lord President and Lord Rutherford Clark that the plea of bona fide perception and consumption applies only in cases where a person has been in possession of a heritable subject upon an apparently good but invalid title, and has been evicted and is called to account for the rents. Opinions per Lord Mure and Lord Shand contra.

Bona fide consumption.—B, an heir of entail, raised an action of count and reckoning against the representatives of A, a former heir of entail, for the proceeds of the timber which he was annually allowed to sell, on the ground that by the deed of entail he was bound to apply these in reduction of the capital debts secured on the estate. The defenders, besides maintaining that under his titles A was entitled to appropriate the proceeds of the wood sold, pleaded alternatively bona fide perception and consumption. Opinions per Lord Mure and Lord Shand that the plea of bona fide consumption was well founded. Opinions per Lord President and Lord Rutherford Clark contra.

IN 1835 Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton conveyed his estates to trustees, with directions to hold them (after paying certain legacies and annuities) for behoof of such persons and for such purposes as he might direct in any subsequent deed.

By a “trust-disposition and deed of entail,” dated in August 1838, Lord D. G. Hallyburton directed his trustees, as soon as they had executed the trust reposed in them by the deed of 1835, to execute an entail of the estate of Hallyburton on his nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, and his heirs, whom failing, on a series of heirs named. This deed contained a power to “revoke and alter the foresaid course and order of succession as to heirs of tailzie and provision, except the said Lord John Frederick Gordon and the heirs-male of his body." The deed contained this clause,—“And for the preservation of the growing timber and plantations on my said lands and estate of Pitcur I hereby direct and appoint the said Hunter Gordon and Patrick Chalmers, my said trustees, to reserve the timber and plantations on my said estate when they convey the said lands to the said Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the other heirs before mentioned: And it is hereby provided and conditioned that it shall not be lawful to the said Lord John Frederick Gordon, or the whole heirs of entail, to cut down the growing timber or plantations, or any part thereof, without the consent and authority of my said trustees; and that my said trustees shall not be empowered to give such consent unless the growing timber or plantations on my said estate shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation: Declaring also that the produce of all fallen trees, or cut timber, or bark, shall be applied in discharge of the various burdens charged on my said estate: But reserving to myself full power, at any time during my life, to direct and appoint my said trustees to cut down and dispose of such parts of the said growing timber and plantations as I shall think fit, the proceeds thereof to be disposed of as I shall direct.”

In March 1839 Lord D. G. Hallyburton executed a “deed of ratification and explanation,” which contained the following clauses:—“First, I declare that the principal sums of all debts, legacies, and provisions shall be charged and chargeable upon and affect only the fee of my said lands and estate of Pitcur and others, and that the rents thereof shall be chargeable with annual payments only; and I further declare that the free revenues of my said estates shall not be accumulated during the subsistence of this trust, nor applied in the payment of capital debts or provisions, but, on the contrary, shall be regularly paid over to my nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the heirs of entail substituted to him, as the same shall arise,—that is, the rents and revenues of these estates, after deducting all public burdens, interests of debts, and provisions, jointures, annuities, and other annual charges: Second, Notwithstanding my injunction on the trustees to denude in favour of my said nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the heirs of entail substituted to him, only after the other purposes of the trust have been fulfilled, I now hereby authorise and direct my said trustees to denude as soon as possible after my wife’s decease without issue, taking care, however, when doing so, to secure heritably on the estate such of the debts and provisions or annuities as may then still exist and remain unpaid: Third, And even during my wife’s life I authorise my said trustees to denude as aforesaid, provided the same be done with my wife’s concurrence, and upon an opinion given by counsel that her provisions, and the other provisions made by me, have been duly secured, and provided a proper indemnity is also granted and secured to my said trustees in regard to the contingent repayment of the money drawn by me from the trustees under my wife’s marriage settlement: Fourth, I declare that the power of making provisions on grandchildren shall be as competent to my said nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, as to any of the substituted heirs of entail: Sixth, As the intention of keeping up the foresaid trust is merely to secure payment and fulfilment of the various provisions made by me, I hereby declare that, so far as may be consistent with that object, and under reservation always of my said wife’s right to the mansion-house of Pitcur and adjoining grounds, as provided by the said deed of 1838, the whole management of the said lands and estate of Pitcur and others, situated in the counties of Perth and Forfar, shall, notwithstanding the subsistence of the said trust, be given to my said nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the substituted heirs of entail in their order, who shall have full power, under the limitations of the prescribed entail, to grant leases, to excamb grounds, and to make provisions on his or their wives and children or grandchildren, as permitted by the prescribed entail, in the same manner as if they were actually infest and possessed of the said lands and estate, and to avail themselves of the statute 10th George the Third, chapter 51, made to encourage the improvement of entailed estates in Scotland, and the later statutes of the 5th George the Fourth, chapter 87, and the 6th and 7th William the Fourth, chapter 42, and generally to exercise all the powers of administration competent to an heir of entail in possession which may not be inconsistent with the purposes of the said trust, hereby directing my said trustees to concur in and to give full effect to all such acts and deeds as aforesaid of my said nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, or the existing heir of entail beneficially entitled to my said estate for the time being: Lastly, I hereby expressly declare that these presents are granted in corroboration and explanation only of the foressaid trust-disposition, and trust-disposition and deed of entail executed by me as aforesaid, and shall not be held or construed to infer or import any alteration or innovation thereof, or of any of the clauses therein contained, except to the extent before specially specified and declared."

Lord D. G. Hallyburton died on 25th December 1841, and the trustees entered upon the management of the estate. The woods on the estate of Pitcur were very extensive. During the time the trustees acted they cut down considerable quantities of the timber. They did so only when they were informed by a person or persons skilled in forestry that the wood was ripe for cutting, or required thinning in the course of judicious management. The trustees dealt with the proceeds derived from the sale of timber as revenue, applying the same towards meeting the annual charges on the estate, and paying over the surplus, when there was any, to Lord John Frederick Gordon (now) Hallyburton. They so acted in conformity with an opinion they received from the late Mr, afterwards Lord Ruthersford, in 1842, "that the price of the wood so annually cut down should be considered as a part of the revenue of the estate for the year, and should not be applied in extinguishing capital of debt."

Lady D. G. Hallyburton died in 1851, and the trustees, with the view of getting exoneration of their past actings, and getting the deed of entail to be executed by them in favour of Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton and the other heirs judicially adjusted, raised in the year 1854 an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration in the Court of Session. In this process a deed of entail was adjusted and executed in 1855. There was inserted in it a clause in the following terms:—"Reserving always the timber and plantations on the said estate, which for the preservation of the growing timber and plantations on the said lands and estate, we are, by the foressaid deed called a trust-disposition and deed of entail, directed and appointed to reserve when we convey the said lands and estate to the said Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton and the heirs before mentioned; and it is hereby conditioned and provided that it shall not be lawful to the said Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, or the whole heirs of entail, to cut down the growing timber or plantations, or any part thereof, without the consent and authority of us as trustees foressaid, or of our successors in office, which consent, it is declared by the said last mentioned deed, we shall not be empowered to give unless the growing timber or plantations on the said estate shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation; by which deed it is likewise declared that the produce of all fallen trees or cut timber or bark shall be

 of Sasines 31st January 1856. Huntly's

 from 31st January 1856 to his death on 29th September 1878. He was succeeded by his nephew, the present (the eleventh) Marquis of Huntly, who disentailed the estate, and conveyed it to George Auldjo Jamieson, &c., as trustees.

The tenth Marquis of Huntly and the Earl of Aboyne (who in 1863 became eleventh Marquis of Huntly) were parties to the action of multiplepounding. The question of cutting timber was made matter of averment in the condescendence in the multiplepounding, and was referred to in two separate reports by the late Mr Hunter, Auditor of the Court, and by his successor, Mr Baxter, in 1868. The Lord Ordinary, on 9th January 1869, approved of these reports, and exonerated the trustees, and found that Lord J. F. Gordon Hallyburton was entitled to the free revenue of the estate. No objection was raised by the eleventh Marquis of Huntly.

The present action was raised by Mr Jamieson, &c., as trustees of the eleventh Marquis of Huntly, against the Reverend John Stevenson, &c., as trustees under the trust-settlement of the late Lord J. F. Gordon Hallyburton. The summons concluded for declarator that the late Lord J. F.
 Gordon Hallyburton "as heir of entail in possession of the lands and estate of Pitcur, in the counties of Forfar and Perth, was, in terms of the trust-disposition and deed of entail mentioned in the condescendence, bound to apply the whole proceeds realised by him from the sale of the fallen trees or cut timber or bark on the said estate in extinction of the debts, legacies, and provisions, &c., charged upon and affecting the fee of the said estate," and for count and reckoning of the proceeds of sales of timber during the time Lord J. F. Gordon Hallyburton possessed the estate, and failing that, for payment of £15,000.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The said deceased Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton having been bound to apply the whole proceeds realised by him from the sale of the timber on the said lands and estate of Pitcur in extinction of the debts, legacies, and provisions, &c., charged upon and affecting the fee of the said estate, and having failed to do so, decree ought to be pronounced in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. 2. The proceeds realised from the sale of the said timber having been received by the said deceased Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, the defenders, as his representatives, are bound to account to the pursuers therefor, and to make payment in terms of one or other of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—3. There being no obligation imposed upon the late Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton by the trust-settlements of the late Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton, or by the entail of the estate of Pitcur, to apply the proceeds of the sale of wood to the extinction of the burdens upon the fee of that estate, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. 4. The late Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton having bona fide received and consumed the proceeds of the sales of wood on the estate of Pitcur, so far as not necessary for estate purposes, and to keep down the annual charges upon the said estate, and in accordance with the construction of the trust-settlements of Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton, sanctioned by the interlocutors of the Court in the action of multiplepounding and exoneration, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. 5. The Marquis of Huntly having, in the full knowledge of the circumstances, acquiesced in the receipt and application of the said proceeds by the said Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, the pursuers, as claiming through him, are barred from raising the present action. 6. In no event can the defenders, as trustees and executors of the said Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, be held liable to account for a greater sum than the free proceeds of his executry estate remaining in their hands after satisfying all prior claims.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the libel: Further, appoints the defenders to lodge in process an account of the intromissions of the deceased Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton with the proceeds realised by him from the sale of fallen trees or cut timber or bark on the estate libelled from 31st January 1856 to 29th September 1878: Further, grants leave to the defenders to reclaim." *

* "NOTE.—The question in this case turns on the construction of two deeds executed by the late Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton, dated respectively 27th August 1838 and 28th March 1839. By a previous inter vivos trust-deed Lord D. G. Hallyburton had vested the estate of Pitcur in trustees, and the deeds which have been just mentioned contained his instructions with respect to the disposal of it. It is sufficient to say that he directed his trustees to entail on the late Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton as institute, and a series of heirs. This was accordingly done by a deed of entail executed on 16th and 17th July 1855, and on the death of Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton the Marquis of Huntly succeeded as heir of entail. He subsequently disentailed the estate with the necessary consents, and has sold it.

"The question is, whether, under the clause contained in the deed of August 1838, and quoted in article five of the condescendence, the 'produce of fallen trees or cut timber or bark' was appropriated to the payment of the capital of the burdens on the estate, of which a considerable number remain undischarged. It is admitted, on the one hand, that Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton cut down a considerable quantity of timber; and, on the other hand, it is not disputed that the cutting of the timber was an act of ordinary and proper administration, the timber so cut being either ripe wood or thinnings.

"1. The defenders objected to the pursuers' title. Assuming the claim to be otherwise well-founded, they contended that the title to sue was not vested in the Marquis of Huntly alone, but in him and the heirs of entail, with whose consent the estate was disentailed. The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt that view. By the disentail the Marquis became the absolute proprietor of the estate, and has right to all the dispositions which have been made in favour of the heirs of entail. If the produce of the timber is applicable to the payment of the debts which are charged on the estate, and if it had been so applied, the Marquis would have been so much the richer. It is suggested that he would have had to pay more for the consents of the next heirs, and that in consequence they have an interest. But the defenders, it is thought, have no title to raise any such question. By the disentail, the next heirs have surrendered all their interest, and it seems to be impossible in this case to enter on the conditions of the surrender.

"2. Again, the defenders maintain that the meaning of the truster was that the produce of the timber was to be applied in keeping down the interest of the debts on the estate, and they point to a clause in the deed of 1839, called a 'deed of ratification and explanation,' in which it is directed that the free rents and revenues shall not be accumulated, but paid over to Lord J. F. Gordon Hallyburton.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the case of the pursuers is well founded. He thinks that the just construction of the deed of 1838 is, that the produce of the timber was to be applied in the payment of the capital of the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) On a sound construction of all the deeds the heir in possession was entitled to cut the timber and sell the wood for his own behoof. The “revenue” of the estate which was given to the heir meant something more than the rents, and the only other thing it could mean was the proceeds of the sales of wood. The trustor’s intention evidently was not to prevent ordinary cutting, but to preserve the wood for the amenity of the estate. Even if the deed of 1838 left this doubtful, it was clearly his intention under the deed of 1839 to give the whole of the revenue, including the proceeds of the cuttings, to the heir in possession. (2) The proceeds of the wood sales were duly received by the heir in possession, and bona fide consumed by him. In order to found a plea of bona fide consumption competing titles were not necessary. It was only necessary that there should be a counter right and an absence of challenge, on the one hand, and a colourable title and bona fide possession on the other.¹ (3) The defenders were barred by Lord Huntly having acquiesced by the proceedings in the multiplepoinding to which he was a party.

Argued for the pursuers ;—(1) The Lord Ordinary was right on the construction of the deeds. The direction in the deed of 1838 by which debts affecting the estate, and this direction was not recalled by the subsequent deed of 1839. It is true that the produce of ripe timber and of thinnings would fall to the heir in possession, and that it may be regarded as a part of the revenue of the estate ; but it is thought that the deed of 1839 did not refer to the income derived from this extraordinary source, but only to the ordinary rents of the estate, for the trustor directed the trustees to ‘reserve the timber and plantations on the estate.’ The timber was thus to remain in their hands, and the deed of 1838 contains the only direction as to the application of the produce. This special direction was not, it is thought, recalled by the general direction that the rents were not to be accumulated. It is true that the reservation of the timber would not reserve any separate feudal estate in the trustees ; but it very strongly indicates what the trustor meant as to the application of the money derived from time to time from this source.

“The defenders point out that the purpose of the direction to reserve the timber was for the ‘preservation of the growing timber and plantations.’ So it was ; but this cannot, it is thought, affect the construction of the clause which disposes of the proceeds of the cut and fallen timber.

“3. The defenders pleaded that the proceeds of the timber had been bona fide received and consumed by Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton, and that, in consequence, they are not bound to account for them. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that the plea is not well-founded. It is certain that the trustees and Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton believed that the latter had absolute right to the proceeds of the timber ; that they entertained this belief in bona fide, and that, in consequence, Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton received and consumed the proceeds. But there are here no competing titles. The rights of the parties must be determined by the directions of the trustor only, and any error in the construction of the trust-deed cannot affect the rights of the beneficiaries under it.

“4. The defenders also pleaded acquiescence, but, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, there is no foundation for this plea.”

there was a special appropriation of the proceeds of the cuttings of wood was not recalled by the deed of 1839. The truster's intention was that the heir in possession should have no pecuniary interest in the cutting of wood. The objects which the entailor had were to preserve the wood, and to pay off the burdens on the estate. (2) There was no room for the plea of bona fide consumption. The plea applied only where a person was ousted from an estate which he had possessed on a colourable title, and from which he, after reaping the fruits, had been evicted. There was no claim in the present case to an estate, and no competing title. What was claimed were the fruits of the subject. (3) The Marquis of Huntly never acquiesced in the heir in possession appropriating the proceeds of the wood sales. It was not shewn that the question was ever brought before him.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Lord Douglas Hallyburton, having formed the intention of settling his estate of Pitcur upon his nephew, Lord Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, and a certain series of substitute heirs, executed three deeds for the purpose of carrying that intention into effect. The first of these was a trust-deed executed in 1835, the terms of which are not material to the present question, and the other two deeds, which are deeds of instructions and explanations to his trustees, were executed respectively in 1838 and 1839. The trustees, acting under the powers conferred upon them by these deeds, had a deed of entail prepared and executed in the year 1855 conveying the estate to Lord John Frederick Hallyburton and the substitutes of tailzie, in terms of the directions of the truster.

The question raised in the present case is, whether Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, as heir of entail in possession was entitled to cut timber on the estate, and use the proceeds of the sale of that timber as his own property, or whether he was under obligation to cut only under the advice and superintendence of the trustees, and pay over the proceeds of the sale to them for the purposes specified in Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton's deeds of settlement. It is to be observed that the timber upon this estate was of very great extent, and there were large plantations of fir which fell to be cut at a certain age and planted over again, so that, in addition to the ordinary natural proceeds of the timber, there were occasional very large cuttings and very large sales of timber which afforded a considerable though fluctuating revenue. It is admitted, on the one hand, that Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton had during his possession cut a very considerable amount of timber, but it is admitted, on the other hand, that nothing was done that was not in accordance with the fair administration of the estate, and particularly of the timber upon the estate; so that the question really comes to be, whether the timber belonged to the heir in possession, and fell to be cut by him at his own discretion, and the proceeds kept by himself, or whether there was any restriction upon him in that respect.

The summons concludes for declarator that the whole proceeds realised by him from the sale of the fallen trees or cut timber or bark on the said estate should be applied in extinction of the debts, legacies, and provisions, &c., charged upon and affecting the fee of the said estate, and that the defenders, who are the representatives of Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, should be decerned and ordained to hold count and reckoning for their whole intro-missions with the whole proceeds realised by him from the sale of timber and bark on the said estate from the 31st of January 1856 to the 29th day of September 1878—that is to say, for the period immediately following the execution of the deed of entail to the date of Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton's death. Now, the whole of this question depends entirely, in the first instance at least, upon whether there was any special provision limiting the right of the heir of entail in possession, for apparently nothing was done by Lord John Frederick Hallyburton that was not within his proper power of administration. There are two deeds that require our attention in determining this question—the deed of 1838 and that of 1839. Now, by the deed of 1838 the arrangement made by Lord Douglas Hallyburton was, in the first place, that the trustees should make provision for a great variety of purposes, jointures, and other things which had been provided for by other deeds of settlement; and then he provides:—"I hereby direct and appoint the said Hunter Gordon and Patrick Chalmers, and their successors, as soon as they shall have executed the trusts reposed in them by the said trust-disposition, and the other trusts hereinbefore specified, to denude of my said lands and estate, and to give, grant, and dispoise, heritably and irredeemably, to Lord John Frederick Gordon;" and so on. Now, according to the provisions of this deed, it is to be observed that the trustees were not to denude till all the other trust-purposes had been accomplished, and therefore the time for making the deed of entail might have been indefinitely postponed. Now, it is this deed which contains the clause upon which the pursuers specially found. It is in these terms:—"And it is hereby provided and conditioned that it shall not be lawful to the said Lord John Frederick Gordon, or the whole heirs of entail, to cut down the growing timber or plantations, or any part thereof, without the consent and authority of my said trustees; and that my said trustees shall not be empowered to give such consent unless the growing timber or plantations on my said estate shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation; declaring also that the produce of all fallen trees or cut timber or bark shall be applied in discharge of the various burdens charged on my said estate." Now, the contention of the pursuers upon this clause is that the proceeds of the timber when cut down and sold were to be applied in discharge of the capital of the burdens charged upon the estate, and they support the contention upon the ground that the words used by the testator can have no meaning or effect unless that is their proper construction, the proceeds of the ordinary sales of timber necessarily forming part of the natural revenue of the estate, although it may be revenue varying very much in amount from year to year, and like all other natural revenue primarily applicable to the keeping down of interest on burdens, and that an heir in possession cannot receive the rents or revenue of the estate until so much of them as is necessary for that purpose shall have been so applied. It required no special provision in the deed to produce that effect, because that would be the natural and legal application of these revenues, even after the deed of entail was executed and the heir entered into possession; therefore they say if there is revenue beyond what is required for keeping down the natural burdens on the estate, in the shape of proceeds of sales of timber, that is here directly ordered to be applied to diminish the capital of the debt. I am disposed to agree with the views of the pursuers on this matter. We see very well from the nature of the plantations on this estate there would come into the hands of the trustees or the heir in possession occasionally a very large sum, arising from the cutting down of plantations, in the course of one year, or two years, and, in point of fact, that happened. There was a very large sum realised more than once—but certainly once—in the course of Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton's possession—a sum quite beyond what could be called the average return from timber—and if the interest of the burdens had been provided for otherwise, and a large sum came into the hands of the trustees or the heir in possession from this source, I cannot imagine that the words of this clause could be read otherwise than as a direction to pay it over in discharge of burdens—that is to say, capital—the annual interest having been already provided for from the proper source, viz., from the income of the estate, and therefore, without going further into this matter, I confess that I do not entertain very much doubt that if this deed of 1838 had stood alone we should have been bound so to construe it. But this deed of 1838 must be read in connection with the deed of the subsequent year—that of 1839—which makes a very considerable change upon the arrangements of Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton. He had altered his mind in many respects in regard to the way in which his trustees were to deal with this estate, and among other things it is very important to observe that by the second purpose of the deed of 1839 he provides that, whereas the trustees had been directed by the previous deed to denude in favour of the heirs of entail only after the other purposes of the trust had been fulfilled, he now by this deed authorised and directed them to denude as soon as possible after his wife's decease without issue, taking care, however, when doing so, to secure heritably on the estate such of the debts and provisions or annuities as might then exist and remain unpaid. And he provides, still further, that even during the subsistence of his wife's liferent they may denude in favour of the heir, provided the same be done with the lady's concurrence, and with sufficient security for the provisions made for her. And then further, in the sixth purpose of the trust, he makes this provision:—"As the intention of keeping up the foresaid trust is merely to secure payment and fulfilment of the various provisions made by me, I hereby declare that, so far as may be consistent with that object, and under reservation always of my said wife's right to the mansion-house of Pitcur and adjoining grounds, as provided by the said deed of 1838, the whole management of the said lands and estate of Pitcur and others, situated in the counties of Perth and Forfar, shall, notwithstanding the subsistence of the said trust, be given to my said nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the substituted heirs of entail in their order, who shall have full power, under the limitations of the prescribed entail, to grant leases, to excamb grounds, and to make provisions on his or their wives and children or grandchildren, as permitted by the prescribed entail, in the same manner as if they were actually infest and possessed of the said lands and estate." Now, it is very clear that the position of Lord John Frederick Hallyburton, or any other heir of entail, after the execution of this deed of 1839, was very different from what it would have been under the deed of 1838. In the first place, they might be put in possession by the trustees at a much earlier period, and even during the subsistence of the trust, and before the deed of entail was executed they were to be allowed to deal with the estate and its administration just as if they were heirs of entail in possession under an executed deed of tailzie. I do not mean to say that through this alteration of the scheme of the testator it necessarily follows that the provision regarding the cutting of timber, and the application of its proceeds, is to be held as altered, because in the last clause of this deed the testator expressly declares that this deed shall not be held or construed to infer or import any alteration or innovation thereof, or of any of the clauses therein contained, except to the extent before specially specified and declared; and therefore if we had no more to go upon than the clause to which I have already adverted, I think that would prevent us from implying that any alteration was to be made on the clause, in the previous deed, regarding timber.

But then we have a clause which I have not read in its order, but which now calls for particular attention—the clause that makes the first alteration on the provisions of the previous deed. It is in these words—“I declare that the principal sums of all debts, legacies, and provisions, shall be charged and chargeable upon, and affect only the fee of my said lands and estate of Pitcur and others, and that the rents thereof shall be chargeable with annual payments only; and I further declare that the free revenues of my said estates shall not be accumulated during the subsistence of this trust, nor applied in the payment of capital debts, or provisions, but, on the contrary, shall be regularly paid over to my nephew Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the heirs of entail substituted to him, as the same shall arise,—that is, the rents and revenues of these estates after deducting all public burdens, interest of debts, and provisions, jointures, annuities, and other annual charges.” Now, I think this clause is not open to construction at all. Nothing can be more clear and definite than the intention here expressed, that the principal sums of all kinds of burdens shall be charged and chargeable upon and affect only the fee of the testator's lands and estate. Under these words, unless you can say the proceeds of the sales of timber are part of the fee of the estate, I do not see how you can possibly apply them to the reduction of the capital of debt without going in the direct face of the testator's own words. The debts are to be charged upon and affect only the fee. And still further, annual debts only are to affect the income and the amount of the free revenue, no matter from what source arising, and the free revenues are not to be applied in payment of capital debts or provisions, but are to be paid over to the heir of entail in possession. Now, I think it is impossible to doubt that that completely reversed the previous deed. The one deed says, “use a certain part of the revenue of my estate to pay off debts;” the other says, “no part of the revenue of my estate shall be so applied.” And therefore it appears to me that this deed expressly, and not by implication, but by words susceptible of only one meaning, recalled entirely all those directions in the previous deed regarding the application of money arising from the sale of timber. I therefore come to a conclusion the opposite of that of the Lord Ordinary, and am for assoilzieing the defenders.

But there have been some other pleas mentioned by the defenders to which it may be right that we should advert, as this case may possibly go further, and I am therefore disposed not to withhold my opinion as to them. They are the fourth and fifth pleas. I need not read them, but may just say that they are pleas of bona fide perception and consumption and acquiescence.

I think the plea of bona fide consumption is not applicable to this case, assuming that the first deed was not altered in regard to the timber and has received its proper construction, that the income derived from the sale of timber is to be applied in discharge of capital burdens. The doctrine of bona fide consumption, I think, applies only to the case of a person who has possessed on an apparently good title, which is afterwards found to be invalid, and has thus lost possession, and who has been evicted from the estate and is asked to account for the rents which he has received during the period of his possession. In short, it is the possession of a subject and eviction from that subject that lets in the doctrine of bona fide perception and consumption. There is no eviction here at all. There is no bad title. The title of Lord John Frederick Gordon was perfectly good. He never was evicted, and never could be evicted, from any part of the subject. But supposing the deed of 1838 was to stand alone, the question would arise whether he is entitled to use the whole revenue of the estate for his own behoof or for some purpose of his own? That would not, I apprehend, be a case where the doctrine would apply, and I am therefore prepared to repel that plea.

On the other hand, and without going into any detail on the matter, I think it is right to express my opinion that the plea of acquiescence is applicable to the conduct of the next heir of entail, the Marquis of Huntly, who subsequently disentailed the estate, and that the plea of acquiescence against him is well-founded, because I think there is no doubt that by his conduct, and the conduct of all concerned, Lord John Frederick Gordon was impressed with the belief, and acted upon the belief, that the revenue arising from timber belonged to himself.

The result of my opinion therefore is, that upon a sound construction of the deed of 1839 there was no restriction upon Lord John Frederick Gordon in regard to the timber at all; but even if that were ruled otherwise, I should be inclined to repel the plea of bona fide perception and consumption and sustain that of acquiescence.

LORD DEAS.—The two deeds upon the terms of one or both of which this question admittedly turns are the trust-disposition and deed of entail dated 13th August 1838, and the deed of ratification and explanation dated 20th March 1839. It makes no practical difference as to the result whether we hold that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be reversed in respect of the terms of the one deed or of the other, or of both. For my part, I think the first deed, if it had stood alone, would have warranted that result, and that the second deed is quite consistent with and confirmatory of the first. I think that, so far as regarded the growing timber, the whole object of the truster, when he made the first deed, was to preserve it for the amenity of the estate. He says so in that deed, in these words,—“For the preservation of the growing timber and plantations on my said lands and estate of Pitcur I hereby direct and appoint the said Hunter Gordon and Patrick Chalmers, my said trustees, to reserve the timber and plantations on my said estate when they convey the said lands to the said Lord John Frederick Gordon and the other heirs beforementioned.” And then he provides that “it shall not be lawful for Lord John Frederick Gordon, or the whole heirs of entail, to cut down the growing timber or plantations, or any part thereof, without the consent and authority of the trustees, and the trustees shall not have power to give that consent unless the growing timber or plantations shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation.” It is impossible to read this part of the deed without seeing that the preservation of the timber on this estate was the great leading purpose in the mind of the testator at the time, and very anxiously provided for. The words "for the preservation of the growing timber and plantations," &c., give a clue to the meaning of the rest of the clause. Then there follows a declaration "that the produce of all fallen trees, or cut timber, or bark shall be applied in discharge of the various burdens charged on my said estate, but reserving to myself full power at any time during my life to direct and appoint my said trustees to cut down and dispose of such parts of the said growing timber and plantations as I shall think fit, the proceeds thereof to be disposed of as I shall direct." By this declaration I take it the truster meant to say that the proceeds should be applied in discharge of the various burdens in their order, annual burdens being plainly comprehended, if not exclusively contemplated. There is nothing here to indicate that the powers of the heirs of entail to deal with the proceeds of this timber as annual income were meant in any way to be restricted. The only timber which could be cut was described as timber necessary in order to thin and preserve the plantations, and it was classed along with the fallen trees and bark. All power of cutting beyond the limited power thus given was reserved to the grantor during his life, as well as the power to direct how the timber itself, and the proceeds thereof, should be disposed of. But that becomes of really very little moment, as I said at the outset, when we come to the second deed. It refers to his previous deeds, including the deed of 13th August 1838, and bears to be in trust for the purposes and under the whole conditions and declarations therein contained, "with the following explanations, alterations, and additions." These words must, however, be read in connection with the declaration "lastly," which bears—"I hereby expressly declare that these presents are granted in confirmation and explanation only of the foresaid trust-disposition and trust-disposition and deed of entail executed by me as aforesaid, and shall not be held or construed to infer or import any alteration or innovation thereof, or of any of the clauses therein contained, except to the extent before specially specified and declared."

Now, it is certainly not specially specified and declared in this deed of March 1839 that the clauses applicable to the timber in the prior deed of August 1838 are to any extent altered or innovated upon by this later deed. The same remark applies to the other clauses in the deed of August 1838, which imported that annual burdens only, and not capital sums, were to affect and to be paid out of the income of the estate. The two deeds appear to me to be quite consistent in this respect, the second deed being only more precise and explicit than the first. Be this as it may, however, the second is of itself sufficiently explicit for the purpose. It declares "that the principal sums of all debts, legacies, and provisions shall be charged and chargeable upon and affect only the fee of my said lands and estate of Pitcur and others, and that the rents thereof shall be chargeable with annual payments only; and I further declare, that the free revenue of my said estates shall not be accumulated during the subsistence of this trust, nor applied in the payment of capital debts or provisions, but, on the contrary, shall be regularly paid over to my nephew, Lord John Frederick Gordon, and the heirs of entail substituted to him, as the same shall arise—that is, the rents and revenues of these estates after deducting all public burdens, interest of debts, and provisions, jointures, annuities, and other annual charges." And then they are to secure heritably on the estate such of the debts and provisions or annuities as may then (viz., at the period of denuding) still exist and remain unpaid. I

No. 24. am therefore of opinion, with your Lordship, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary cannot be allowed to stand.

Huntly's
Trustees v.
Hallyburton's
Trustees.

The view I take of the case leaves no room for raising the question of bona fide perception and consumption, and no necessity for relying on the plea of acquiescence.

LORD MURR.—Upon the construction of the deeds I have come to the same result as your Lordships.

If the case had turned upon the peculiar terms of the clause contained in the deed of 1838 relative to the preservation of the timber I should even then have had doubts whether the pursuers' claim was well-founded. But when the clause is read along with those in the deed of ratification and alteration of 1839, I think it is clear, whatever may have been the effect of the first deed on the right of the heir in possession to cut timber, that by the second deed, at all events, he had right to do so, and was thereby placed in a much more favourable position in that respect than he was under the deed of 1838. Under the deed of 1838, as I understand the general rule of law applicable to cases of this description, he was placed in a more restricted position, in the matter of cutting timber, than any ordinary heir of entail would have been, because an heir of entail is understood, in the ordinary case, to have the right to cut and dispose of timber on the estate when ripe and fit for use. The law was so laid down in the cases in this Court, which are referred to in the case of Boyd, March 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 637, where the question as to the right of an heir of entail to cut timber was raised, and where it was held that the heir was entitled to cut, provided it was done in the proper administration of the estate, and that he was only restricted as to the timber growing round and within certain distances of the mansion-house. Now, in this deed of 1838 the heir of entail was apparently deprived of almost all rights which an ordinary heir of entail would have had in these respects. But the second deed, and that clause in it which your Lordship has read, to the effect that the principal sums of all debts, &c., should only affect the fee of the estate, and that the rents thereof should be charged with the annual payments only, and the free revenues paid over to the heirs, appears to me to have very materially changed for the better the position of the heirs of entail in this case. Under this latter deed, and when carrying out a proper administration of the estate, the heir was, I think, entitled to apply the proceeds of the wood cut by him in the way in which he did, and that being the conclusion I have arrived at, it is unnecessary to say more in reference to this part of the case. That is enough to free the defenders from the claim here made by the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary has had also before him the question of bona fides, and his Lordship's view on that point was that he did not think the plea well-founded. He says in his note, on this part of the case,—“It is certain that the trustees and Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton believed that the latter had absolute right to the proceeds of the timber, that they entertained that belief in bona fide, and that in consequence Lord J. F. G. Hallyburton received and consumed the proceeds. But there is here no competing title.” And on that ground—that there was here no competing title—his Lordship held that the plea did not apply. Now, I am not quite sure that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that there can be no case of bona fides unless there are two sets of competing titles. I am, on the contrary, rather disposed to think that it is enough if there are two adverse and competing rights under the same title, and that under such a title the doctrine of bona fides might be held to apply, as, for instance, in the case of Boyd, to which I have referred. I take that case as an illustration. There Boyd, the heir in possession, was cutting wood to the injury, as the next heir thought, of the estate, and instead of lying by and allowing the heir to go on cutting he interfered and insisted that he was entitled to stop that proceeding, brought an action of interdict, and in that way succeeded in his object. Now, where there are, as in that case, two adverse rights contained in the same title—one the right of the heir in possession, and another that of the next heir, and the latter is entitled to come forward and assert his right—it appears to me that he ought not to stand by and allow the heir in possession to go on cutting timber, in the belief that he has an unchallengeable right to cut the wood and to use the proceeds as his own. If in Boyd's case the next heir had stood by and allowed his elder brother to cut wood and consume the proceeds for a number of years, thereby lessening from year to year the annual value of the wood until the elder brother died, and thereafter raised an action against his representatives for the proceeds of the wood received and consumed, I am inclined to think that two competing titles would not have been considered necessary to entitle the representatives of the deceased heir to raise the plea of bona fides.

Huntly's
Trustees v.
Hallyburton's
Trustees.

As regards the plea itself, I find that in the passage in Erskine to which we were referred in the argument (ii. 1, 25) it is stated "that a bona fide possessor is one who, though he be not truly the proprietor of subjects which he possesses, yet supposes himself proprietor upon probable grounds." And then in the passage in section 27, which was founded upon by the pursuer, Mr Erskine expresses the opinion that a person in possession of a subject on a title apparently good and sufficient is not bound to restore. Now, here it is admitted that the party who cut the timber possessed upon a title apparently good. He had the opinion of counsel (the late Lord Rutherford) to the effect that he was entitled to cut the wood. The matter had been considered doubtful, and advice was taken, and that advice was followed. In the whole circumstances of this case therefore it appears to me that the plea might properly enough be raised; and although I do not give any decided opinion as to its validity I am not, as at present advised, satisfied that the plea cannot apply; for if this case does not fall within the category of cases in which the doctrine has been applied it has most of the elements necessary to raise it.

With reference to the plea of acquiescence, it appears to me to be pretty clear upon the averments and admissions of parties, and from the judicial proceedings which have been referred to, that the late Marquis of Huntly, and his son, the present Marquis, must be held to have been made aware of the leading facts connected with the history of this trust. It was known that advice had been taken as to the right of the trustees and the heir of entail to cut wood, and that the advice given had been followed and the wood cut under proper inspection. It was also known that the way in which the proceeds of the wood had been disposed of was brought under the consideration of this Court in the action of multiplepoinding, to which the Marquis was a party, and that interlocutors were pronounced on the reports of professional men, relative to the cutting of the timber and the disposal of its proceeds, without objection on the part of the Marquis of Huntly. I am therefore of opinion that there is here such a case of acquiescence

No. 24. on the part of the Marquis of Huntly as must now prevent the present pursuers, his trustees, from succeeding in their claim in this action.

Nov. 5, 1880.
Huntly's
Trustees v.
Hallyburton's
Trustees.

LORD SHAND.—My brother Lord Deas has expressed very much the opinion I entertain in regard to the construction of these two deeds. We have the deeds before us, and have to construe them taken together, and taking them together I quite concur in the result arrived at by your Lordships. But I must say at the same time that if I had to determine this question upon the first deed alone, so far as I am concerned my opinion would be the same. The alternatives which are presented by way of construction are these—either that the proceeds of the wood growing upon this estate are to be applied in the ordinary way in which such proceeds are applied, in payment of the annual burdens, and belong to the heir along with the other rents and proceeds, or in the creation of a sinking fund which shall be kept and applied for payment of the capital sums with which the estate is burdened. And it appears to me to be reasonable in considering which of these two alternatives shall be adopted, that unless it is clearly declared that such a fund shall be formed, the other course shall be adopted, viz., that the proceeds of the wood shall be applied to the extinction of burdens in the same way as the rents or any part of them would be. In that view it may be observed, in the first place, that this clause does not contemplate an endurance of a long period of years and the accumulation of a considerable sum of money, but that it is limited to the ordinary fallen trees, the timber cut in the course of thinning, and the bark which may be produced and which may be in a condition for sale. In short, it is just the ordinary cropping of wood upon the estate. Then, in the next place, the purpose of the clause is really, as announced by the testator, the preservation of the amenity of the estate. There is no indication in the clause that his purpose is to reduce debts. On the contrary, the testator directs his trustees, for the preservation of the growing timber and plantations on his estate, to reserve the timber and plantations when they are conveying the estate, and he declares that the heirs shall not be entitled to cut timber without the consent of the trustees, and that the trustees shall not give such consent “unless the growing timber or plantations on my said estate shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation.” The clause also discloses a necessity for keeping up the trust, for it might be necessary, with a view to the preservation of this timber, that the trustees should give their consent to the cutting of wood. Then there follow the words by which it is said the truster directed the proceeds of the timber to be applied in payment of capital debts,—“Declaring also that the produce of all fallen trees or cut timber or bark shall be applied in discharge of the various burdens charged on my said estate.” It appears to me that these words must be held to have in contemplation only such burdens as were of an annual nature. No doubt the word “annual” is not used, but, in my opinion, the fair reading of the words is that the truster contemplated the application of the proceeds of the timber to the payment of the various annual burdens upon the estate. It was asked in the course of the argument what the meaning of this expression “various burdens” was. I have no difficulty about that. The testator had said the trustees were to reserve the timber. If he had said nothing about how the money was to be applied, it might have been made a question whether it was not to be thrown into the general trust-funds and applied to purposes different from the rents of the estate.

The last purpose of the deed is a reservation to the testator of full power to himself during his life to direct and appoint his trustees "to cut down and dispose of such parts of the said growing timber as I shall think fit, the proceeds thereof to be disposed of as I shall direct." Now, if there had simply been a direction to the trustees, "You shall reserve the timber," I think the probability would have been, that without some direction about it the proceeds would have gone into the general trust-funds. But he provides that although the timber is to be reserved, the proceeds shall be applied to the discharge of the various annual burdens on the estate, for I cannot read this clause as directing the establishment of a sinking fund. And, accordingly, without saying more upon this part of the case, I am, as I have already said, of the opinion that if the deed of 1838 had stood alone it would have afforded a sufficient defence.

Nov. 5, 1880.
Huntly's
Trustees v.
Hallyburton's
Trustees.

But when we take the other deed the case is made perfectly clear. The clauses that there occur are not introduced in this way,—that notwithstanding what I have said in my previous deeds, directing the rents to be applied in a certain way, I now wish the contrary to be done. We have general words used, and the words "rents" and "revenues" are used repeatedly with reference to the source of payment of the annual charges on the estate. I think, therefore, that the second deed carries out the testator's purpose, and does so in terms quite unambiguous. So much for the construction of the deed.

But in case a different view should be entertained if the case goes further, I am prepared, so far as I am concerned, to say that, in my opinion, the trustees who represent the Marquis of Huntly are precluded from raising this question. The defenders rest their defence upon two grounds, viz., (1) bona fide perception and consumption, and (2) acquiescence, and my opinion is favourable to both of these defences. It is not disputed by the counsel for the pursuers, and cannot be disputed, that you have the elements that are usual for the support of the plea of bona fide perception and consumption. You are here dealing with the annual proceeds or income of an estate, you have absolute bona fides, you have a colourable title that cannot be questioned, because all parties acted in the belief, the reasonable belief, that the person who was drawing these proceeds and using them had a title to do so; and finally there were parties who were in the position of having a competing right, and who could have asserted it at the time. It has been said that these circumstances do not bring this case within the authority of those cases in which the plea of bona fide perception and consumption has been sustained. It is said such a case should have two elements, viz., eviction and two competing titles.

But are these of the essence of the plea of bona fide perception and consumption? I think not. Take the first of them,—eviction. The plea does not arise from or depend on eviction. Eviction occurs, and gives occasion to state the plea of bona fides, but is not of the essence of that plea.

In regard to the next point—in the ordinary case there are two competing interests under separate titles, here there were two adverse interests arising under the same title. In such a case as the present the next heir is in a position to consent to the act of the heir in possession, or to assert his right and stop that act. If he does not, it seems to me it should be held that he had allowed the heir to consume the fruits. I think the substance of the plea of bona fide perception applies to that case. I do not think that there need be competing titles such as your Lordship has referred to; for, as I have said, I agree with Lord

No. 24. Mure in holding that the reason of the law applies to the case in which there are two adverse competing interests arising under the same title.

Nov. 5, 1880.
Huntly's
Trustees v.
Hallyburton's
Trustees.

But I think the case is freed from difficulty by the acquiescence of the Marquis of Huntly. What are the facts in regard to that? The pursuers here representing the Marquis of Huntly demand the proceeds of the wood from 1855 to 1878, a period of twenty-two years, while for eleven years the trust affairs were the subject of a judicial process in which the Marquis of Huntly was a party, and the very subject of this annual cutting of wood and appropriating the proceeds was prominently brought before the parties, and particularly by the reports of the Auditors of this Court, to whom the case was remitted, one of these being by the late Mr Hunter, and another by the present Auditor, Mr Baxter, who had succeeded to that office. I do not need to go into the details of these reports. It is sufficient to say that the Marquis of Huntly was a litigant in the cause, and allowed the reports to be approved of. The heir was thus entitled to assume that his right was recognised, and great injustice would be done to him and his representatives if, after having acted with the consent and acquiescence of all interested, the Marquis of Huntly or his representatives should afterwards be entitled to demand that the proceeds of all of these wood cuttings should be repaid, and not merely for the last period of eleven years, but for the first period of eleven years, when the trust matters were in Court and were approved of, and which approval plainly authorised the heir to go on as he had been doing. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against : Assolzie the defenders, and decern : Find the defenders entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

THE late Andrew Vans Dunlop, sometime surgeon in the service of the Honourable East India Company, died on 27th February 1880, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated February 8th, 1879, and fourteen codicils thereto.

By the said trust-deed Dr Dunlop conveyed to trustees, of whom the first party to this case was the sole acceptor, his whole means and estate, for the purposes mentioned in the deed. No. 25.

The eighth purpose of the deed, after making various provisions, bore—
 “To the said Andrew Vans Dunlop Best, my nephew, if he survives me, or to his lawful issue if he predeceases me leaving lawful issue, the sum of eighteen thousand pounds sterling, declaring that in case the said Andrew Vans Dunlop Best shall predecease me without leaving lawful issue, the said sum of eighteen thousand pounds shall revert to and form part of my general estate at his death; and also declaring that the representatives of the said deceased Doctor Alexander Vans Best, and the said William James Best, and Andrew Vans Dunlop Best shall not be bound to repay to my estate or representatives any sums which I may have advanced or lent to the said deceased Doctor Alexander Vans Best, or to the said William James Best, or Andrew Vans Dunlop Best, during my life, and the legacies hereby bequeathed to the children of the said Doctor Alexander Vans Best, and to the said William James Best, and Andrew Vans Dunlop Best, shall be held to be in addition to any such advances, which are hereby discharged.” Nov. 5, 1880.
Best v. University of Edinburgh.

The deed, after making various other provisions, finally constituted the Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh residuary legatees.

On 17th November 1879 the testator executed the following (his eighth) codicil:—“With reference to the eighth purpose of my trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by me in Edinburgh on the 8th day of February 1879, I hereby instruct my trustees and executors that I hereby reduce the sum of £18,000 sterling to £16,000 sterling, which I left in that eighth purpose to my nephew, Andrew Vans Dunlop Best, and this I have done from a cause with which he is well acquainted.”

On 5th February 1880 he executed the following (his twelfth) codicil:—“In addition to the legacy or legacies left to my nephew, Andrew Vans Dunlop Best, in the eighth purpose of my trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by me in February last, I hereby leave him £2000 sterling, if my estate can afford it, and I have no doubt that it can do so.”

A question having arisen with regard to the construction of these codicils, this special case was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

Dr A. Vans Dunlop Best, the second party, contended that by the terms of the codicil of date 5th February 1880 the restriction imposed by the codicil of 17th November 1879 was impliedly revoked, and that he was therefore entitled to payment in all of £20,000, viz., £18,000 in respect of the eighth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, and £2000 in respect of codicil of 5th February 1880.

The University of Edinburgh, the third party, contended that the restriction imposed by the codicil of 17th November 1879 was not revoked, and that the second party was therefore only entitled to £18,000 in all, viz., £16,000 in respect of the eighth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, as restricted by the codicil of 17th November 1879, and £2000 in respect of the codicil of 5th February 1880.¹

The following questions of law were stated for the decision of the Court:—“Upon a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils thereto of the late Dr Dunlop, is the party hereto of the second part entitled to payment of £20,000 from the party of the first part ? or, is he entitled to a payment of £18,000 ?”

Nov. 5, 1880.
Best v. University of Edinburgh.

LORD YOUNG.—This case, as Mr Murray stated it, is very simple, and does not admit of much argument. It is more a question of impression. The facts may be stated in a sentence. A testator left a legacy in his original trust-deed of £18,000 ; by a codicil he reduced that to £16,000, and then he increased it by a subsequent codicil in these terms—“ In addition to the legacy or legacies left to my nephew, Andrew Vans Dunlop Best, in the eighth purpose of my trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by me in February last, I hereby leave him £2000 sterling, if my estate can afford it, and I have no doubt that it can do so,” the question being whether the legacy here referred to as the legacy left by the eighth purpose of the settlement is that legacy as diminished by the codicil of November. It is impossible to have a very confident opinion as to what was intended, as there is doubtless ambiguity. The inclination of my own opinion,—I do not give it with confidence, but as the true legal result and not contrary in all probability to the wishes of the testator,—is that he wished to revert to the original legacy, and to increase the amount of it by £2000. I do not wish to suggest anything approaching to a general rule as to the effect of a subsequent codicil on a former one. I think it is clear enough that if the first codicil had simply cancelled the eighth purpose, and then the last codicil had left £2000 in addition, then without doubt the revocation would have been superseded and the legacy restored with the addition of £2000. The case here, however, is not so clear. As Mr Murray put it there is some improbability in the argument that the testator first meant to leave a legacy, then to deduct from it, and then to add just what had been deducted. I think that the true meaning and legal effect of the last legacy is that the testator must be held to have said, The legacy which at one time I intended to diminish I now wish to increase by £2000 ; and I cannot well read the last codicil as a simple cancellation of the reduction. I quite understand the argument and views of the other side, and they are not light ; but putting them in the opposite scale I think the views to which I propose to give effect are the heaviest. I should suggest that we should answer the question by saying that the second party is entitled to get £20,000 from the first party.

LORD GIFFORD.—This case, though short, is a difficult one. It turns on two considerations very nearly balanced. There is certainly some difficulty in getting at the will of the testator, as he made no less than fourteen codicils in one year. He was, in fact, perpetually doctoring his settlement. Now, when he came to make the last of these two codicils, I am by no means sure that I can hold that he had all the former codicils distinctly in his mind, for if he had I cannot think that he would have expressed himself as he did. He had, I think, resorted to the eighth purpose, and read it over so far as concerned his nephews, and deals with it as if he had said, “having reconsidered the eighth purpose of my settlement, I now want to make an addition to its provisions.” That, I think, is a fair paraphrase of the codicil of 5th February, and, though with much hesitation, I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Young.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The point here is so short that I am not disposed to make any lengthened remarks on your Lordships’ opinions, nor even to enter a formal dissent. My hesitation would have led me in another direction from your Lordships had I been left to myself. I read the codicil as referring to all the settlements made for his nephews, and that the testator meant by the first codicil to deduct £2000, and by the second to add it on again. Still I do not formally dissent, and agree in answering the question as your Lordships have suggested.

Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard.

Retention—Accountant's right to retain his employer's documents—Implied contract—Law-agent's lien.—A merchant placed certain documents in the hands of a firm of accountants to enable them to collect debts due to him. Shortly after he became insolvent, and granted a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of a trustee for behoof of his creditors. The trustee applied to the accountants for the documents, but they refused to give them up till their account for charges and outlay incurred in collecting the debts was paid. Held that they were entitled to retain the documents on the ground of implied contract.

Opinions that this was not a proper case of lien, but simply of right under a contract.

In January 1880, James Smith, merchant, Kirkliston, became insolvent, and upon 6th February he granted a trust-disposition omnium bonorum to James Pollard, chartered accountant, Edinburgh, for behoof of his creditors.

In January 1880, previous to executing this disposition, James Smith had gone to Messrs Meikle & Wilson, accountants and business agents, 10 Nicholson Street, Edinburgh, and consulted them as to outstanding accounts which were due to him, conform to a schedule which he produced. They accepted employment to recover these debts, and thereafter applied to the several debtors for payment. To enforce delivery of these debts two books and relative documents belonging to Smith containing the particulars of the several accounts were delivered to Meikle & Wilson.

Messrs Meikle & Wilson's account for work performed for Smith amounted to £16, 1s. 10d., for which decree was subsequently obtained in the Sheriff Court.

Shortly after the trust-disposition of 6th February was signed Mr Pollard applied to Messrs Meikle & Wilson requesting them to deliver up the papers, books, &c. left with them by Smith. This the defenders refused to do until their account was paid.

Thereupon Mr Pollard raised an action against them in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, praying the Court to ordain the defenders to deliver up the said documents.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The defenders having been instructed by Mr James Smith, baker and grocer, Kirkliston, to perform certain specific matters, and having accepted his employment and executed the business entrusted to them, they are justly entitled to payment of the charges for so doing. (2) The defenders having acquired actual possession of certain books or documents from the owner thereof to carry out his instructions to them as accountants and business agents, and having done so, they have lien or retention over them for their charges.

2D DIVISION.
I.

No. 26. On 26th May the Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) repelled the defenders' plea of retention.*

Nov. 6, 1880.
Maikle & Wilson v. Pollard.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Davidson), who, on 15th June 1880, adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The pursuer was exactly in the same position with regard to his claim for these documents as Smith himself would have been. The books were handed over to their custody to carry out a particular piece of business, and they were not bound to hand them back till they were paid for their work. Their right did not rest on any special lien, but simply upon contract. They were in exactly the same position as any artificer who was entitled to retain an article he has made or repaired until he had been paid his account.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Court had never extended the law-agent's lien over his client's writs to the case of an accountant (see cases in Sheriff-substitute's note). This plea of retention could not be held to fall under any of the liens enumerated in Erskine's Institutes. There was no implied obligation on the pursuer to leave these documents in the defenders' hands till the account was paid; they were put there for a definite purpose, and ought to be given back when that was carried through.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I have more than once intimated during the course of this debate I do not think that this is a proper case of lien or retention in the sense in which those words are used in the cases we were referred to. It certainly is not a question of law-agent's lien. The real question is whether, when documents or any other article are put into the hands of a professional man to enable him to do any particular piece of business, he is bound to part with those documents or other articles until he is paid for having done the work, and that in a question with the person who employed him. The possession is not passed, without doubt, but the articles or documents come under the terms of a special contract, and the obligation on the one party is as strong

* "NOTE.—The authorities to which the Sheriff-substitute was referred at the debate in support of the proposition that an accountant has the same lien over his employer's writs as a law-agent are not sufficient to support that plea. In Stewart v. Stevenson, 23d February 1828, 6 Shaw, 591, the accountant who successfully pleaded the lien was an officer of Court. In Bruce v. Irvine, 7th February 1835, 13 Shaw, 437, the point was reserved, although it is true that in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor there is an important observation on the case of Stewart. The case of Renny and Webster v. Myles and Murray, 8th February 1847, 9 Shaw and Dunlop, new series, p. 619, is not in point, except as illustrating the disinclination of the Court to extend the writer's lien beyond the limits assigned to it by previous authorities, Lord Mackenzie quoting the pithy maxim—quæ contra tenorem juris fiunt non sunt trahenda ad consequentias.

"If, therefore, the defenders' plea has any valid foundation it must be identical with that of the artificer who retains the article he has made or repaired in security of the sum due as remuneration for his work. The writs and papers of which delivery is sought in the present process are not in that position. On none of them have the defenders executed any operation which can be assimilated to an act of manufacture or repair. They are mere instruments handed over for a certain purpose, and of these, the petitioner, as trustee for the insolvent's creditors, now demands restitution.

"An order for delivery as prayed for would at once have been made, but it appears from the record that parties are not at one as to the precise list of papers and documents in question. That matter, therefore, remains over."

as that on the other. The question of property does not arise, the man was simply employed to do a piece of work, for which the possession of these documents was necessary, and we have to say whether, when he had done the work, he was bound to hand back those documents before he was paid for the work. These circumstances do not raise the general question of lien, but the general case of counter obligations under a contract, and on that consideration I am of opinion that there is no necessity for the man to give up the documents till the other party has performed his obligation under the contract.

No. 26.

Nov. 6, 1880.
Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur with your Lordship on the special ground on which your Lordship's opinion is rested. If I thought that by this decision we were extending directly or indirectly the legal right of law-agents and others, or extending the number of the old liens, I should require more argument and further consideration before I took part in it. But I agree that this is not a case of lien. It is simply a case of the retention of a subject put into a person's hands for a special purpose, and resolves itself into a case of the relative duties of parties under a contract. The one party to it is bound to perform his part of the contract just as much as the other. The counterpart here of the duty of the one party to do the piece of business is that the other shall pay the price, and I think that until the latter is done the party employed need not hand over articles which were put into his hands to enable him to fulfil his part of the contract. The effect of this judgment is not to extend general lien, and, in that view, all the law that has been quoted to us on the doctrine of retention and lien is irrelevant.

LORD YOUNG.—There is certainly here no case of general lien. If it is a lien at all it is a special one. All liens arise primarily from contract, and the name is not an inconvenient one to express the right of certain parties to keep articles belonging to a person with whom they have contracted, until he has fulfilled his part of the contract.

I confess that I cannot follow the views of the Sheriff; he appears to me to have proceeded upon an entire misapprehension. He says in his note,—“The defenders call themselves ‘accountants and business agents.’ They belong to no established or known body of authorised legal practitioners. That was admitted at the bar. If the defenders are entitled to claim the right of lien any person whatever who chooses to assume a designation to which he is not legally entitled might equally claim privileges belonging only to recognised bodies. But, further, there is no authority for holding that an accountant can plead the hypothec of a law-agent. That right is a special rule against the general rule of law, and for some years there has been a strong feeling against extending the privilege. It certainly cannot be extended to persons in the assumed position of the defenders.” It seems to me that the defenders are perfectly entitled to the designation the Sheriff objects to, but whether they have a right to retain what came into their hands under a contract does not depend upon their designation but on the contract. I am not disposed to speak sneeringly of accountants and business agents; they are carrying on a useful and legitimate business, and people may properly employ them, but then they must also pay them for what they do. A carrier or a stabler does not belong to any body of legal practitioners, but they are entitled to keep articles that have come into their hands under a contract until they are paid for their work—the stabler may keep a horse which he has been keeping until he is paid for its keep, or a coachbuilder may keep the carriage which he has stored until he is paid for storing it. All the people who carry on lawful businesses under which the property of others comes into their possession are not exceptionally privileged, but under the common law are entitled to retain possession of that property until the true proprietor performs his part of the contract. That is just the case here. These accountants were employed by a baker to do something which he thought would be useful to him. To that end his business books were handed over to them to enable them to collect the debts, and in the course of this employment the baker incurred debts to these accountants to the amount of £16, and the accountants got decree for that amount. On no exceptional rule, but on the ordinary rule of law, I think that these persons are not bound to part with these documents which came to them under a contract until their claim under the same contract is satisfied. There is a counterpart in every contract, and here it is that the man of business is not entitled to get his money until he gives up the books, and his employer is not entitled to get his books till he pays the money. These are obligations hinc inde prestable by both parties. I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships, and I think my opinion is rested substantially on the same grounds.

THE COURT sustained the appeal.

GRACE H. WILKINSON (Pursuer), Appellant.—Nevay.
PETER BAIN (Defender), Respondent.—A. J. Young.

Husband and Wife—Affiliation and aliment of illegitimate child—Wife suing without husband's concurrence—Title to sue.—A married woman raised an action in the Sheriff Court against a man not her husband, alleging that she had been deserted by her husband, and that three years after her desertion she had given birth to a child of which the defender was the father, and concluding for payment of aliment. The Sheriff assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had failed to prove that he was the father of the child. The Court adhered.

Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young), that the pursuer had no title to sue.

R.

GRACE HELEN STEWART OR WILKINSON, wife of George Wilkinson, London, on 22d May 1880 presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Stornoway praying the Court to grant a decree ordaining Peter Bain, preventive-man of Inland Revenue, residing at Stornoway, to pay to the pursuer inlying charges attending the birth of an illegitimate child of which she alleged he was the father, and the sum of £8 per annum for ten years for its aliment.

The pursuer alleged that she had lived with her husband in London from November 1871, the date of her marriage, till the spring of 1876, when he had deserted her; that in June 1876 she had returned to her father in Scotland, and that she had not seen or heard of her husband for four years; that on 1st November 1879 she had given birth to an illegitimate child, of which the defender was the father.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—The pursuer's husband being dead, or otherwise having deserted her, she is entitled to pursue this action in her own name, and grant a valid discharge for the sum sought to be recovered.

The defender denied the paternity.

On 3d July the Sheriff-substitute (Spittal) assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had failed to prove that he was the father of the child.

Wilkinson v.
Bain.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff.

On 12th August the Sheriff (Pettigrew Wilson) adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and maintained (1) that the proof of paternity was sufficient; and (2) that as she had tried to find her husband to get his concurrence, and had failed, she was entitled to sue the action in her own name.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After expressing his concurrence in the judgments of the Sheriffs on the merits)—There is a preliminary question in this case which was not founded on by the defender, but as it is of great importance I do not know that it is not our duty to give an opinion upon it. This is the case of a married woman pursuing an action without the concurrence of her husband, and without any evidence that the husband's consent cannot be obtained, and the doubt is whether she has any title to do so. Whether she could sue without that concurrence with a tutor ad litem is another question, but I am certainly not aware of any case where it has been held that a married woman can sue an action concluding for a money payment without the concurrence of her husband. I am not sure that there is not another greater question in the case, that is, whether the onus is not on the wife to prove that her husband could not have been the father of the child. On that I give no opinion, but I am not satisfied that there was any title to sue in this action.

LORD GIFFORD concurred on the merits, but gave no opinion on the legal question.

LORD YOUNG.—(After concurring on the merits)—The interesting and important point in this case is that to which your Lordship has adverted. My view goes deeper than the mere question of title to sue. The case regards the child of a married woman, and the child of a married woman prima facie belongs to her husband. He is entitled to have it if he so wishes, and is bound to support it. What he may be at liberty to establish to relieve himself of the burden it is not hujus loci to say, but he is not trying to relieve himself, and it certainly is a new proposition to me that if the husband were here, desiring to gain possession of this child, the offspring of his lawful wife, another man might come forward and say, "No, I have a right to the child, because I begot it;" or that a mother can hand over the child to another man than her husband, and say, "That is yours." As I have said, it is not hujus loci to say what the husband is entitled to establish to get rid of a disreputable wife, or of a child of which it is impossible that he should be the father. All I know is that this is the child of a married woman, and we have no reason for saying that the husband is trying to get rid of the burden of this child. I am clearly of opinion, that, irrespective of the merits, this action is not maintainable.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find that the appellant (pursuer) has failed to prove that the respondent (the defender) is the father of her child libelled: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment appealed against, and decern," &c.

Before the stock was realised the bank stopped payment, and having gone into liquidation large calls were made in respect of the stock far in excess of the whole estate left by the deceased. Held (1) that the fact that the stock turned out to be worthless did not entitle the executors to a repayment of inventory-duty, as the stock was properly valued in the inventory at the market price of the day; (2) that a repayment of inventory-duty fell to be made in respect of the calls paid by the executors, as these were payments of debts due by the deceased; (3) that the executors were entitled to no other return of inventory-duty either in respect of the assignation of the shares to the liquidators, when they were of no value, or in respect of the whole executry estate having been lost.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
C.

THIS was an action by John Wishart and others, as executors of the late David Galletly, against the Lord Advocate, for repayment of inventory-duty, under section 23 of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 79 (quoted in the opinion of the Lord President).

David Galletly died on 17th January 1878, and his executors gave up an inventory of his personal estate, amounting to £29,444, 16s. 4d. and in March 1878 paid £400 as inventory-duty to the Inland Revenue. This inventory included £2400 stock of the City of Glasgow Bank, which was entered at the value of £5738, being the selling price of the day. The bank having stopped payment in October 1878, and gone into liquidation, calls to the amount of £66,000 were made in respect of the stock held by the testator. After a litigation,¹ it was held that the executors were not personally liable for calls, and they paid £19,650 from the executry funds to the liquidators on account of calls, and admitted their liability to pay the whole of the remainder as soon as it was realised.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that according to the sound construction of the Joint Stock Companies Act of 1862, section 75,* the calls on the City of Glasgow Bank stock held by the deceased David Galletly were a debt accruing due from the said David Galletly from the time when he became a partner of the bank, and were payable by law out of his personal estate: Finds (2) that the calls already paid or accounted for to the liquidators of said bank by the pursuers as executors of the said deceased David Galletly greatly exceed the amount or value of the

* By the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1862, sec. 74, it is enacted "contributory" shall mean "every person liable to contribute to the assets of a company under this Act in the event of the same being wound up." By sec. 75 it was enacted that "the liability of any person to contribute to the assets of a company under this Act, in the event of the same being wound up, shall be deemed to create a debt accruing due from such person at the time when his liability commenced, but payable at the time or respective times when calls are made, as hereinafter mentioned, for enforcing such liability."

By the 76th section it was enacted that "if any contributory dies either before or after he has been placed on the list of contributories hereinafter mentioned his personal representatives, heirs, and devisees, shall be liable in a due course of administration to contribute to the assets of the company in discharge of the liability of such deceased contributory, and such personal representatives, heirs, and devisees, shall be deemed to be contributories accordingly."

No. 28.

Nov. 12, 1880.
Galletly's
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

* "NOTE.—The question raised in this action is whether the calls made by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank (which is being wound up under the Companies Act of 1862) upon the executors of David Galletly, a shareholder who died before the winding up commenced, or the calls were made, is to be held as a debt due by the deceased, or simply as a debt due by the executors.

"The question depends upon the construction which is to be put upon section 75 of the Companies Act of 1862, which is quoted on the record; but along with that section it is necessary to read sections 74 and 76. By section 74 the term 'contributory' is declared to mean 'every person liable to contribute to the assets of the company under this Act in the event of the same being wound up.' Now, as I read these words, they truly mean that a shareholder becomes a contributory by the very fact of his becoming a partner of the company, and that his liability commences as soon as he signs the contract, because from that moment he becomes liable to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up.

"Section 75 declares that 'the liability of any person to contribute to the assets of a company under this Act, in the event of the same being wound up, shall be deemed to create a debt (in England and Ireland of the nature of a specialty) accruing due from such person at the time when his liability commenced, but payable at the time or respective times when calls are made, as hereinafter mentioned, for enforcing such liability.' The effect of this section, when read in connection with section 74, is that the liability of the contributory, which commences at the time he becomes a shareholder, creates a debt due by him as from that time, although the amount of the debt may not be ascertained or enforced until long afterwards. That this is the sound construction of these clauses of the statute cannot, I think, be disputed after the cases of ex parte Harding in re Williams; ex parte Carsewell in re Vaughan, 33 L. J. Bankruptcy, p. 26, and Eng. and Ir. App. p. 9, (L. R.); and Wishart v. the City of Glasgow Bank, 6 Ret. 823.

"Then section 76 provides that 'if any contributory dies either before or after he has been placed on the list of contributories hereinafter mentioned, his personal representatives, heirs, and devisees shall be liable in a due course of administration to contribute to the assets of the company, in discharge of the liability of such deceased contributory, and such personal representatives, heirs, and devisees shall be deemed to be contributories accordingly.' The effect of this section, in the case of a contributory dying before a list of contributories is settled, and before a call is made, is not to extinguish the liability of the deceased contributory, but merely to declare that his personal representatives shall pay the calls out of his personal estate as a debt due by him, and shall for that purpose be themselves placed upon the list of contributories.

"In the present case David Galletly died on 17th January 1878, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of certain persons, of whom the pursuers are the acceptors and survivors, as trustees, and to whom he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, in trust for the purposes therein specified, and, inter alia, for payment of all his just and lawful debts, deathbed and funeral expenses. The pursuers gave up an inventory of the personal estate, which was recorded in the books of the Commissariat of the county of Edinburgh on 6th March 1878, the amount being given up at £29,444, 16s. 4d., and the inventory-duty corresponding thereto being £400, which was duly paid by the pursuers. The said sum of £29,444, 16s. 4d. included £2400 consolidated stock of the City of Glasgow Bank, as of the value of £5738 at the date of the oath to the inventory. On 8th March 1878 the agent of the trustees and executors, Mr John Galletly, who was himself one of their number, sent the confirmation, with the certificates of the stock, to the bank's manager in Edinburgh, and requested him to send new certificates in name of the executors, which request was complied with, and the names of the executors were entered as holders of said stock in the stock ledger which the bank kept as its register of members.

"The bank suspended payment on 2d October 1878, and went into liquidation on 22d October, and it is now in course of being wound up. The pursuers had not sold the stock before the bank failed, and the liquidators, on 7th November following, placed their names on the first part of the list of contributories as liable personally for calls. Various calls were from time to time made, the total amount being £66,000. Some time thereafter the First Division of the Court (on 19th July 1879) transferred the names of the pursuers (except John Galletly) from the first part of the list of contributories to the second part thereof, and directed their names to be entered on the second part as executors of the deceased David Galletly, liable as such to make his executory estate forthcoming in a due course of administration."

"It is admitted that almost the whole of the estate has been realised and paid over to the liquidators of the bank to account of the calls ; the amount so paid or accounted for being £19,650, and the remainder of the estate, including any sum which may be recovered in the present action, will as soon as possible be paid over to the liquidators. In any view, it is certain that a large part of the £66,000 of calls will remain unpaid, and that the estate is therefore insolvent. In this state of matters the pursuers have raised the present action for return of the sum of £400 paid by them as inventory-duty. Their demand is based upon the Act 5 and 6 Vict., cap. 79, section 23, which provides that 'when it shall be proved by oath and proper vouchers to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes that an executor hath paid debts due and owing from the deceased and payable by law out of his or her personal or moveable estate to such an amount, as being deducted from the amount or value of the estate and effects of the deceased which shall be included in an inventory duly exhibited and recorded after the 31st day of August 1815 in a Commissary Court in Scotland, shall reduce the same to a sum which, if it had been the whole gross amount or value of such estate and effects, would have occasioned a less stamp-duty to be paid on such inventory than shall have been actually paid thereon, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners, and they are hereby required, to return the difference, provided the same shall be claimed within three years after the date of recording such inventory as aforesaid.'

"Now, there is no doubt whatever that the calls paid by the pursuers out of the personal estate of the deceased have practically reduced that estate to nil, so that there is nothing upon which inventory-duty could be demanded, except the nominal value of the City of Glasgow Bank stock, which it is hardly necessary to say has realised, and can realise, nothing at all. And the only question is, whether these calls were debts due and owing from the deceased David Galletly's estate within the meaning of section 23 of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 79 ? The cases referred to in the early part of this note leave me no alternative but to return an affirmative answer to that question, and to hold that the pursuers are entitled to a return of inventory-duty. The defender, however, maintains that the whole duty claimed by the pursuers should not be returned, in respect that the whole estate has not been absorbed in paying these debts, and in particular that the value of the stock itself (£5738), which was included in the inventory, has not been applied to that purpose. It has undoubtedly been lost, and the estate has realised nothing from it, but still it remains in the inventory as of the value of £5738, and I therefore think it is subject to inventory-duty. It is no answer to the argument of the Crown for the pursuers to say that if they had sold the stock before the stoppage of the bank the price would have all been absorbed in paying the debts of the deceased in the form of calls. The fact is, that neither the stock, nor its inventory value, nor any part thereof, has been applied to any such purpose.

"The whole amount, therefore, of duty cannot be returned, and as there still ceased. No doubt under the 75th section of the Companies Act of 1862 the deceased was liable for the calls, but they never were due by him. Until a call was made there was only liability. The calls were therefore not "due and owing from the deceased," as required by the section of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 79.¹ (2) The stock was included in the inventory at its market value, and no repayment should be made for the depreciation in value.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) It had already been decided in the case of Wishart that calls fell under section 76 of the Companies Act, and that liability attached before the failure of the bank. Therefore they were debts of the deceased.² (2) The stock was valued at the market price in the inventory, but in point of fact was valueless, and a repayment should be allowed for it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The testator died on the 8th of January 1878, and the inventory of his personal estate was given up by the executors on the 6th of March of that year. The amount of the estate so given up was £29,444, 16s. 4d., and the inventory-duty corresponding to that amount was £400, which was paid by the executors to the Inland Revenue. That sum of £29,444, 16s. 4d. included, among other items, consolidated stock of the City of Glasgow Bank which belonged to the deceased—£2400 of that stock—and which in the inventory was valued at the then selling price in the market, £5738. In October 1878—that is, seven months afterwards—the City of Glasgow Bank stopped payment and went into liquidation, and in consequence calls were made by the liquidators upon the executors as holders of this stock, the amount of the calls being in all £66,000. The liquidators had placed the executors upon the first part of the list of contributories as partners in their own right and interest, but upon a petition being presented to the Court we ordained the liquidators to transfer their names from the first to the second part of the list of contributories, and to enter them as liable as executors to make the executry estate forthcoming in a due course of administration. The account between the executors and the liquidators has not yet been settled, but it appears that the liquidators have received £19,650 on account of those calls, and we are told that the executry estate has now been almost all realised, and as soon as this action is decided, and certain shares held by the deceased, which are at present unrealisable, can be disposed of, the remainder of the estate will be paid to the liquidators, but there will be a large part of the £66,000 of calls unpaid, the executry estate being insufficient to pay them.

Now, in these circumstances the executors demand repayment of the whole £400 of inventory-duty which they paid in March 1878. The Crown resist this demand in toto, and contend that the debt which has been paid by the executors was not a debt of the deceased David Galletly, but only a debt of his executry estate, and therefore they say the case is not within the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 79.

remains part of the estate to be realised and applied in payment of the calls the cause is ordered to the roll to have the precise amount of return ascertained."

No. 28.

Nov. 12, 1880.
Galletly's
Trustees v.
Lord Advocate.

The 23d section of that statute provides,—“When it shall be proved by oath and proper vouchers, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, that an executor hath paid debts due and owing from the deceased, and payable by law out of his or her personal or moveable estate, to such an amount as, being deducted from the amount or value of the estate and effects of the deceased, which shall be included in an inventory duly exhibited and recorded after the 31st day of August 1815 in a Commissary Court in Scotland, shall reduce the same to a sum which, if it had been the whole gross amount or value of such estate and effects, would have occasioned a less stamp-duty to be paid on such inventory than shall have been actually paid thereon, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners, and they are hereby required, to return the difference, provided the same shall be claimed within three years after the date of recording such inventory as aforesaid.”

Now, it is contended that this is not a debt which was due and owing from the deceased within the meaning of this clause. It is said that the debt arose only when the bank went into liquidation and calls were made, and therefore it is a debt due only by the executry estate. I think this contention is hopeless after the case of Wishart,¹ because it was there decided that a lady who possessed City of Glasgow Bank stock before her marriage, and was married before the liquidation of the bank, was indebted in the whole liabilities which came upon her in liquidation after her marriage; that that was, in the sense of a certain statute then in question, an antenuptial debt—that is to say, a debt contracted before marriage, although not enforced or enforceable till after the marriage. And so here I am of opinion, upon the same ground, that this was a debt which was due and owing from the deceased, although it was not enforced, and did not require to be enforced, till after his death.

But although that part of the case is, I think, abundantly clear, there is another question which raises greater doubt. The amount in the inventory is £29,444. The amount which has been actually paid is £19,650, and although there is still something more to be had from the executry estate, as we are given to understand, there appears to be no doubt that it will not amount to £29,444. Therefore, prima facie at least, the executors have not paid away the whole amount in the inventory in discharge of debts due and owing by the deceased, but have only paid away a certain portion of that. They have not been able to realise any more, and they have paid away certainly all that was realised. But there was one very important item in the inventory which has turned out entirely unproductive, and that was the £2400 of City of Glasgow Bank stock. But they contend that that has turned out to be of no value, and therefore it is not to be taken into account in this question—that it must in this question be struck out of the inventory as an item that should not be there. The stock, they say, although apparently of the value of £5000 odds, was in reality of no value at all, and therefore the amount of the executry estate, instead of being taken at the sum contained in the inventory, must be taken at that sum minus this item of the inventory which has turned out to be valueless.

Now, I cannot say I am prepared to adopt that view of the case. It is a mistake to say that that City of Glasgow Bank stock was in March 1878 of no value at all. It was of the value set down in the inventory, for that was its selling price at the time, and if the executors had sold that stock in the month of March 1878 they would have got that money for it. And the question there—fore comes to be, whether, under the clause of the statute with which we are dealing, we must not take the actual amount of the valuation in the inventory as fixing distinctly what the amount of the executry estate was for the purposes of this question? I think we must do so, unless it could be shewn that there was some mistaken valuation or estimate. There would be a remedy for that. If it could be shewn, for example, that there was an item in the inventory which had no ascertained value, and the value or estimate of which was therefore conjectural—that it turned out to be stated at a high value, when in reality as at that date it was of a less value than the sum embraced in the inventory—then I think there might be a great deal to be said for the contention of the pursuers, and that case would probably fall within the operation of the statute which the Dean of Faculty referred to—I mean the 40th section of the 55 Geo. III. c. 184. But that is a very different case from the present. One can quite understand that many things must enter an inventory the value of which is quite unascertained and very uncertain. We had a remarkable example of that in the case of the Lord Advocate v. Pringle, in which an expectancy was set down in the inventory as of the value of £20, and it turned out to be many thousands. That was a case the other way. There are many assets of an estate the value of which at a particular date it is quite impossible to take with anything like accuracy or in any way but conjecturally, and these conjectural estimates are to be set right when the facts are ascertained. But this was not a conjectural estimate. This was an asset of the estate which had a present market value, and it would never do to say that because the executors had not realised that asset and got the present market value for it, but had chosen to hold it until, it might be, years afterwards, when it comes to be depreciated in value, that is to affect the amount of the executry estate as at the date of the inventory. I think that would be against the meaning and spirit of this Act of Parliament.

I therefore think that we must take the inventory as it stands, and the question comes to be, what amount of that £29,444 the executors have paid away in extinction pro tanto of the debts of the deceased? And the answer to that comes to be, not £29,444, but £19,650 plus so much more as may hereafter be realised and paid over to the liquidators.

It was said, no doubt, that this stock is to be handed over to the liquidators as an asset of the executry estate, or rather that there is to be an assignation by the executors to the liquidators of any value that may attach to this stock hereafter in respect of the surplus assets of the bank—any claim which the executry estate may have to surplus assets after the whole creditors have been paid—and that therefore this stock has really been paid away or handed over in payment to a certain extent of the deceased's debt. The question is, not what has been done with this presently worthless stock, but how much of the £5738, which was its value in March 1878, has been paid away in extinction of debt? and the answer must be—not one farthing. No part of that asset of the executry estate has been paid away in extinction of the deceased's debt.

The conclusion, therefore, to which I come is substantially that which has been arrived at by the Lord Ordinary—that while the pursuers are entitled to succeed in obtaining repayment of inventory-duty corresponding to the amount that they have actually paid away in extinction of the deceased's debt, they are not entitled to any more, and particularly they are not entitled per aversionem to claim the return of the whole inventory-duty paid upon a total of £29,444, because that is much in excess of what they have actually paid in extinction of debt. The inventory-duty was quite accurately and correctly charged as at March 1878. The value of the estate was then £29,000, and consequently £400 was properly paid upon it, but the drawback must be, not the total amount of the lost executry estate, but the total amount of that portion of the estate which has been paid in extinction of the deceased's debts.

LORD DEAS.—I am very clearly of opinion that those calls were a debt due by the late Mr Galletly. That is clear, I think, both upon principle and upon the facts. That leads to this, that the executors are entitled to a return of the inventory-duty to the extent which has been stated by your Lordship. I am also of opinion, however, that they are not entitled to a return of the inventory-duty to any farther extent. We have no way of estimating it—no right to estimate it—except in the way in which it was estimated at the time, when it was quite rightly taken at the market value. I therefore entirely agree with your Lordship, both as to this being a debt of the late Mr Galletly, and likewise as to the result to which that leads, upon the amount to be returned to the executors.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion on both points. With regard to the large sum of £19,000 odds paid in respect of calls, it is to be observed that the payment made was in the ordinary course of executry administration by the executors. If the case had been one in which the executors had retained the stock over a period of years, and the result of their trading had been that large liabilities had been incurred which were not liabilities existing when the testator died, a very different question would have been raised. It would then, I think, have been fairly represented that the calls were not in any true sense debts due and owing by the testator, but debts due and owing by the executors, which had been the result of their trading, and were properly their debts only. The bank failed within nine months after the testator's death. The calls were made in respect of trading that had occurred during his life. They were made upon shares which the executors were, we must presume, in the course of realising, and they were therefore not debts due and owing by the executors from any actings of their own, but due and owing by the deceased in respect of the stock left by him. I have therefore no doubt that the Lord Ordinary is right on that point.

On the second question, whether the pursuers are entitled to receive back the inventory-duty paid upon the sum of £5738, there are two arguments urged. The first was that this stock, having been valued at £5738 at the date of the confirmation, had been subsequently handed over to the liquidators of the bank really in payment of debts due and owing by the testator to the bank—I mean towards the extinction of the calls that had accrued upon the shares. Now, in regard to that question, if it had appeared that at the time when the liquidators stipulated that this stock should be handed over to them, the stock, although for a time worthless, had again acquired a value in the market, and had been valued accordingly as between the executors and the liquidators at a certain sum, and given over as at that value in extinction of calls, I should have found it difficult to distinguish between that sum and the larger sum in dispute between the parties; for I think it might then have been very properly represented that this stock, taken as of the value of whatever the sum fixed might have been, had been given to the liquidators as a payment towards debt due and owing by the deceased at the time of his death, that debt being the calls which had accrued upon the shares. But the fact is not so. These shares were not, at the time when the liquidators demanded the surrender of this estate, treated as an asset of known value. The liquidators simply stipulated that taking them at what they might be worth they must be thrown in with the rest of the estate;—and it must be kept in view that the possessors of those shares might have been liable for future calls for aught that anybody knew at the time this surrender was demanded. I do not think the facts of this case as presented to the Court raise what is necessary to entitle the party to a return of the duty, viz., that the assets were of value, and were valued accordingly, and taken over at that value. Accordingly that argument fails.

Another point maintained by the pursuers was that at all events they are entitled to correct what was an erroneous value put upon those shares. They were valued at £5000 odds, whereas it appears by the result that they were worthless, and it is said the amount of the erroneous valuation must be deducted from the gross amount on which duty was paid. I agree with your Lordships in thinking that in questions of this kind, between executors and the Revenue, what must be looked at is the market value of shares of this description. The case is not like one in which a body of private trustees have to wind up a testator's business which he has been carrying on alone—where they put a high value upon it, and in the course of realisation it is found there is no such value, because it is swept away. That, I think, would present a very different question, because there you would have a valuation of a speculative character tested by the result, and the result would shew that it had no such value. But here, and in reference to a joint stock company, you have another criterion—the market value. The executors could have sold this stock at the value they put upon it in the inventory, and it appears to me that we cannot go back upon that market value to correct it by the result, in the same way as you could do in the case of a private estate and private business with an estimated valuation such as I have referred to. Accordingly, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary is right in reference to this branch of the case also.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the first finding in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Quoad ultra recall the said interlocutor: Find that the pursuers (respondents) are entitled to a return of so much of the inventory-duty paid by them in March 1878 as corresponds to the amount of executry funds which they have applied to payment of debt due by the deceased David Galletly, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either of the parties since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor."

The pursuer averred that he was the grandnephew of George Andrew Clark v. Melville.

The defender denied that the property 11 Davie Street belonged to George Andrew or John Andrew, but he admitted that he had the titles of the property in Davie Street. He averred,—“The pursuer has no interest therein, at least he has not yet shewn that he has any interest.” The defender did not state for whom he held the titles.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being entitled to succeed as heir to the property in question, the defender is bound to produce and exhibit the titles as concluded for. (2) Upon the pursuer satisfying the Court, by making up a title or otherwise, that he is the proprietor of the subject, he is entitled to decree in terms of the alternative conclusion of the summons.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The conclusions of the summons are incompetent. (3) The pursuer is not entitled to call for exhibition or delivery of the titles asked for until he establishes his alleged propinquity to the ancestor to whom he claims to be heir, and also that he is their heir. (4) The allegations of the pursuer being unfounded in fact, the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (5) In any event the defender is entitled to be satisfied by the pursuer producing a service or other habile title before exhibiting the titles called for. (6) Separatim, The heritable subjects mentioned not having been the property of either George Andrew or John Andrew, the pursuer, even supposing him to be their heir, is not entitled to exhibition or delivery of the titles. (7) The defender being barred from parting with said titles until an ex facie right thereto is exhibited by the pursuer, he is entitled to expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“In respect that though the defender admittedly held the titles of the property in question only for those who are in right of John Andrew, mentioned in the record, he will not even in his own presence exhibit the titles to the pursuer, or pursuer's agent, nor produce them to the clerk, that in the clerk's hands these may be examined by the pursuer or his agent, without formal proof, first, of the death of the said John Andrew, and, in the next place, of the propinquity and apparency of the pursuer, before further answer allows the pursuer a proof of his averments hinc inde, and to the defender a conjunct probation,” &c.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—He was entitled to exhibition without a proof. The defender admitted he had titles in his possession and did not say for whom he held them. He was not entitled to prevent the only person who alleged right from having access to them.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion is that if we are satisfied that the titles should be produced the regular and proper course is that they should be exhibited in the hands of the Clerk of Court. I do not mean that they should be put into process, or form a step of process.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Recall the said interlocutor, and ordain the defender to exhibit the title-deeds of the property in question, so far as in his possession, in the hands of the Clerk of Court, and decern : Quoad ultra continue the cause : Find the defender liable in expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c. No. 29.

Dewar or Milne v. Scott.

Succession—Cumulative provisions—Donation mortis causa.—A father bequeathed £400 to his daughter A, £400 to his daughter B, and directed his trustees to invest £400 for behoof of his daughter C in liferent allanarly, and of her children in fee. After the death of C's husband her father took her to live with him, and gave her from £40 to £50 a-year for her support. He subsequently lent £400 on the security of local rates, the destination in the bond being to C and her heirs. The bond was found in the father's repositories at his death. The Court, looking to the terms of the deeds and to the circumstances of the case, found that it was the testator's intention that his daughter C should receive both the provision under the will and that under the bond.

WILLIAM SCOTT, merchant, Strathaven, died on 13th May 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 7th December 1866, under which his son William was executor. His other children were Mrs Morton, Mrs Dykes, James Scott, and Mrs Dewar, the last of whom had in March 1866 entered into a marriage of which her father disapproved. By his settlement Mr Scott took his executor bound to pay a legacy of £400 to each of Mrs Morton and Mrs Dykes. In regard to Mrs Dewar he provided that his trustees should invest a sum of £400 "on good heritable security in Scotland in their own names as trustees foresaid, and apply the annual income and produce, deducting necessary expenses, for behoof of my daughter, Agnes Scott or Dewar, wife of Alexander Dewar, teacher, Strathaven, in liferent, for her liferent alimentary use allanarly; hereby providing and declaring that the said trustees shall be entitled to apply the whole or such part of the said principal sum of £400 as they may think proper, and of which they shall be sole judges, for the alimentary support and benefit of the said Agnes Scott or Dewar and her children after-mentioned; after the death of the said Agnes Scott or Dewar the said trustees shall realise said capital sum of £400, or such portion thereof as may then be remaining, and, after deducting necessary expenses, they shall divide the same among the children of the said Agnes Scott or Dewar in such proportions, at such terms, and subject to such conditions . . . as the said Agnes Scott may appoint by any writing under her hand, and failing such writing, then to the children of the said Agnes Scott or Dewar equally." Failing issue of Mrs Dewar the fund was at her death to be paid equally to Mrs Dykes and Mrs Morton. The residue of the estate of the testator amounted to about £2000.

Mrs Dewar's husband died in November 1867, without leaving any adequate provision for his wife. She subsequently lived partly with her father, and he supplied her with money and necessaries to the extent of from £40 to £50 a-year till his death. At his request she had given up a right to a share of a policy of insurance for £150 on her husband's life, and also to a share of his furniture.

In October 1868 Mr Scott handed £600 to his son James to be invested with the Local Authority of the Uddingston Special Drainage District. £200 was invested in his own name. The remaining £400 was taken in name of Mrs Dewar. The Local Authority bound themselves to repay it to Mrs Dewar or her heirs and assignees, and in security assigned to her in security the assessments authorised to be levied in their district. The two half-yearly interests on this bond falling due before Mr Scott's death were paid to him, and the bond was found in his repositories after his death. Thereafter the half-yearly interest was drawn by Mrs Dewar.

In December 1878 Mrs Dewar was married to Mr William Milne, and she subsequently, with consent of her husband, brought this action against Mr William Scott, her father's executor, for delivery of the above-mentioned bond by the Uddingston Local Authority which he had in his possession.

The pursuers pleaded;—(4) The bond in question being in effect a donatio mortis causa in favour of the pursuer, and the same having been held by the deceased as natural custodier or agent for the pursuer, must be held to have been delivered. (5) *Est*o that the bond in question was neither a donation inter vivos nor mortis causa, it must be held to be a legacy to the female pursuer which does not require delivery.

The defender pleaded;—(6) The deed in question not being a delivered deed, absolutor falls to be pronounced, with expenses. (7) On a true construction of the settlement referred to, the pursuer is only entitled to the sum of £400; and having received payment of that amount out of her father's estate, she cannot insist in the present action.

There were other defences, but to these it is not necessary to advert.

The Sheriff-substitute (Birnzie), after a proof, made findings in fact to the effect narrated above, and found further in law "that the bond was not delivered to the pursuer during the lifetime of her father, but that it was an additional provision by him to her, and did not require delivery," and he therefore ordained delivery of it.*

* "NOTE. . . .—2d, I do not think the bond was surrogatum for the £400 in the settlement. Provisions by a parent to a child are presumed to be in addition to, not in lieu of, each other—Menzies on Conveyancing, p. 441; Erskine, iii. 3, 93. The pursuer also was at the time a widow, dependent upon her father. She had given up at his request a right to a share of a policy of insurance for £150 on the life of her husband, and also to a share of her husband's furniture. She had received from her father, since her husband died, £40 to £50 each year, a sum larger than the interest which could be obtained from the two sums of £400. Her sisters were both married and in good circumstances, and her father's residue, it is admitted by the defender, exceeded £2000. It is also matter for observation that the pursuer, by her father's settlement, had only a liferent, whereas the bond was taken in her name absolutely.

"3d, I do not think the bond was a donation requiring delivery. There is no reason why her father should have given her a donation, and especially of such a sum. She had no present need for it, as he was supporting her, while, on the other hand, she might marry again and not require it.

"4th, I do not think the bond was delivered, but I think it was a provision by a father to a child, and did not require delivery. . . . But it seems to me the most probable reading of what took place was that he intended the bond as an additional provision to the pursuer on his death. Provisions by parents to children may be taken in the shape of bonds from third parties—Hamilton v. Hamilton, Jan. 9, 1741, M. 11,576; Munro v. Munro, Dec. 16, 1712, M. 5052; Spence v. Ross, Nov. 17, 1826, 5 S. 17; and whether they are or are not revocable, and the date on which they came into force, will depend on circumstances—Spence v. Ross, supra; Berry v. Henderson's Trustees, June 24, 1836, 14 S. 1008. They do not require delivery—Menzies on Conveyancing, p. 173; Munro v. Munro, supra."

Upon 10th June 1880 the Sheriff (Clark) adhered with a slight variation. No. 30.

The defender appealed, and argued ;—It could not be said that the bond in question was delivered.¹ In Scotland no doubt there was no presumption against double portions as there was in England.² But the will was here prior to the bond. It was thus more easily presumed that the fund thereby conveyed was in satisfaction of the bequest under the will than if the bond had preceded. The question was really one of intention. In arriving at that it must be taken into account (1) that the same sums had been given to the three daughters, and that that in the bond was of the same amount ; and (2) that though Mrs Dewar and her father had been living together, there was nothing to shew that the subject of the bond had been mentioned to her, as would have been expected.

The pursuers argued ;—If the provisions had been both testamentary they would have both been payable.³ Here the quality of the provisions was different. The one was testamentary, the other was immediate and inter vivos. In such cases as Kippen, where the settlement came first and the obligatory provision later, Lord Colonsay in this Court, and the House of Lords afterwards, held that the maxim debitor non presumitur donare did not apply. Here, reading the bond, what was the obligation which it could be held to satisfy ? The will was entirely latent, and only known to the testator and his agent. There was no foundation for the doctrine of satisfaction. There was no expectation in the daughter's mind by a promise having been made to her. If considerations were to be founded on the form of the gift there was no obligation on the father's part. The obligation was that of the Uddingstone Local Authority.

A father by inserting a child's name in a bond or conveyance made the child a grantee without delivery.⁴ The defender had failed to shew why Mrs Dewar should not have the bond, or that it was in satisfaction of a prior debt. Looking to the intention, the presumption was that both provisions should stand.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I am quite satisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute on all points. I think he has disposed of it in a most satisfactory way, and on very sound and solid reasoning.

The only question of importance or difficulty is what may be called the question on the merits, viz., as to whether the £400 bond which was taken by Mr Scott in favour of his daughter, Mrs Dewar, was intended to form an additional provision to her, or to be in substitution of the provision he had made for her and her children in his settlement. Such questions are always more or less difficult, and must be decided on a review of the whole circumstances of the testator and his family, and, in particular, of the situation of the person who would be favoured beyond others by the double portion.

The provision made by Mr Scott in his will, which was dated 7th December 1866, in favour of Mrs Dewar, is a different one from that in favour of his other

No. 30. daughters. The other daughters were each to get a similar sum of £400, but

Nov. 17, 1880. their provisions were given to them absolutely, whereas the £400 set aside for Dewar or Mrs Dewar is settled in this way, that it is to be paid to trustees and is to be Milne v. Scott. invested on heritable security, and the annual income paid to Mrs Dewar during her life for her liferent alimentary use alienably, the fee to be given after her death to her children, and, failing them, to her sisters. Now, there may have been various reasons for this difference in the terms of the two provisions, and it has been suggested that one reason was that the testator had a want of confidence in Mrs Dewar's husband, who was then alive, and that he arranged the terms of the bequest so that his rights should be excluded. That is not, I think, perfectly clear, and we are not entitled to assume it; the exclusion of the husband's rights is only one part of the conditions of the settlement. Another motive was to secure that the fee should go to the children independently of the husband and also of the wife, and the children's rights remain secure under the deed of settlement, unless a subsequent testamentary writing should deprive them of these rights.

Now, the other provision is in the form of a bond for money advanced by Mr Scott to the Local Authority of the Uddingston Special Drainage District, but though the money was advanced by him the bond is in the name of Mrs Dewar —the granters having “borrowed and received the sum of £400 sterling from Mrs Agnes Scott or Dewar,” bind themselves to repay to her, or her heirs and assignees, and they assign to her in security the special assessments which they are authorised to raise. Some parole evidence was referred to, as to conversations between the testator and his sons William and James Scott, but I attach no value to it; it is quite loose and imperfect as to what may have been Mr Scott's intention in taking the bond in this form.

In favour of the contention that the two provisions cannot stand together, and that the bond was intended to be substituted for the provision in the will, the most important consideration is that Mrs Dewar had received under her father's settlement a sum equal to that of each of her sisters, and that the sum in the bond is precisely the amount which is settled on her by the will. But these considerations, though undoubtedly of some weight, must yield to others which seem to me to counterbalance them. Mrs Dewar stood in a different position from her sisters; they were well married, and had husbands alive and prosperous.
Mrs Dewar after her husband's death was in a different position, living with her father and being dependent on him. At his desire she had given up her interest in a policy of insurance on her husband's life, and her interest also in his furniture, and Mr Scott maintained her in family with himself, and at an expense of about £40 or £50 per annum. The interest of the two sums—that under the will and that under the bond—would not be so much as he was actually paying for her. She was perfectly dependent on him, and if after his death she was to have nothing but the one sum of £400 by the will or under the bond, she would be in a state of extreme poverty; and so it seems reasonable, and consistent with the condition of affairs, that he should have provided for this daughter to a larger extent than for her sisters. These are very important considerations in reaching the intention of the testator in this matter. He was also possessed of quite sufficient means to make the larger provision for Mrs Dewar, if he so wished, besides fulfilling the other purposes of his will. Taking these circumstances into view, and the fact that the bond was taken in the terms in which it was, and was kept in his custody until his death, I think the natural inference is that it was meant to take effect independently of the provisions of the will. No. 30.

And there are two considerations beyond those I have named which strongly fortify this view. The first is that the gift in the will is to different persons from those in whose favour the bond is taken. The trustees under the will are to settle the £400 in fee upon the children of Mrs Dewar, and failing these, upon her sisters. She has only a liferent interest. Under the bond the gift is absolute to herself. The second is, that if Mr Scott's intention had been what it is assumed by the defender to have been, and if his purpose was to substitute an absolute gift for the provision in the will, it was certainly an odd method he took of effecting his purpose. It is said that in consequence of Mr Dewar's death it was no longer necessary to tie up the money in any way. If we assume that to be so, his natural course would have been to make a codicil to his will. I cannot help thinking that, if he really had the intention which is ascribed to him, he might have revoked that part of his will which deals with Mrs Scott's provision, and might have given her an absolute gift, putting her in the same position as her sisters. The form he used was sufficient to create great doubt even on the face of the documents themselves, apart from the surrounding circumstances to which I have adverted, whether he did not make a separate provision for her.

On the whole of this question I entirely agree with the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff.

LORD DEAS.—In regard to the question, whether Mr Scott intended to give a double portion to his daughter or not, there is a great deal of parole testimony bearing in both directions. I doubt the relevancy of some of it. But, to my mind, the terms of the formal written bond, as contrasted with the terms of the formal written will, are conclusive. It is quite clear, if we take the writings ex facie, that the one provision is not substituted for the other, but that they are quite separate provisions to separate and distinct parties. The provision in the will is limited to a liferent to Mrs Dewar, the fee is given to her children. By the bond the fee is vested in Mrs Dewar; it is payable to her and to no one else. It is no doubt possible that, notwithstanding the difference in the terms of the two documents, the intention may have been to satisfy the one provision by the other. But the second cannot be said to be a fulfilment of the first, the investment being, as I have stated, for behoof of a different party altogether. Whatever doubt there may be with regard to the matter of fact, I am quite clearly of opinion that, in point of law, the two provisions must be held to be separate.

LORD MURE.—I have not felt much difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the bond for £400, which is taken to Mrs Dewar or her heirs and assignees, is not to be held as operating a discharge of the provision for £400 in favour of Mrs Dewar and her children under the will. The sum in each is the same, but in other respects it appears to me that the terms of the documents are very different. The provision in the will is declared to be for Mrs Dewar's "liferent alimentary use allenary," and for the support of her children with a destination over, in the event of her having no children, in favour of the other daughters of Mr Scott. The trustees under the settlement are directed to invest this provision in their own names on good heritable security, in order that the money may be applied in terms of the settlement, which are clear and distinct. The terms of the bond are altogether different. It is taken to Mrs Dewar, her

No. 30. heirs and assignees. None of it is secured for the children, or even for Mrs Dewar herself, as against her creditors. In these circumstances the presumptions are, I think, against the supposition that the sum in the bond was given in substitution for that settled under the will, and I am not disposed to infer that Mr Scott meant so to act, in the absence of any clear evidence of his intention to do so. There are other strong reasons, moreover, for inducing one to hold that both provisions were to receive effect. Mrs Dewar was in poor circumstances as compared with the testator's other daughters. It is clear that at the date of her husband's death, which occurred after the execution of the will in question, she was in great pecuniary difficulties, and would not have been able to support herself and her children had it not been for the assistance she might receive from her father. The gift of the money in the bond was thus the more intelligible, and was, I think, intended to be distinct and separate from the provision made by the settlement, and cannot be held to be in substitution for it.

Dewar or Milne v. Scott.

LORD SHAND.—I have felt this question to be attended with considerable difficulty. One has to balance the considerations on both sides in arriving at a conclusion on the question of intention, and it is not without some doubt that I have come to agree with your Lordships. On the one hand, the sums in the testamentary disposition and in the bond are the same. Secondly, there is this to be said against the theory of a double portion, that exactly the same sum has been bequeathed under the will to the other two daughters. In the third place, it is remarkable that, although Mrs Dewar was living in the house with her father, nothing was said by him as to the additional provision he had made for her, or proposed to make for her, by the deed in question. On the other hand, however, there was a distinct change in Mrs Dewar's circumstances in life after her husband's death. The other sisters were comfortably married, and in a good position pecuniarily and otherwise, while Mrs Dewar had little or no means, and at her father's request had given up the claims she had on her husband's estate. There was thus an obvious and strong reason for treating her in an exceptional manner, and giving her a portion larger than her sisters. In the second place, the sum in the bond was settled on Mrs Dewar herself, and not upon her children, as was the case in the testamentary disposition. In the third place, the difference in the form of making the two provisions is not to be left out of view, though I do not attach so much importance to that consideration as I think your Lordships are inclined to do, for if the second provision had been contained in a codicil to the will, the case for the double provision would, I think, have been equally strong. Finally, the silence of Mrs Dewar's father appears to be accounted for by the fact that he was very reticent about his affairs, for he seems to have said nothing to any one about his testamentary arrangements. On the whole, I agree in thinking the sum in the bond was an additional provision in favour of Mrs Dewar.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in which, inter alia, they found "in law (2) that the bond was not delivered to the pursuer during the lifetime of her father, but that it was an additional provision by him to her, and did not require delivery."

Income-Tax—Deductions for Wear and Tear—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 100, schedule D, case i. rule iii.—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 12—Finality of Commissioners' decision on questions of fact.—Sec. 12 of the Customs and Revenue Act, 1878, provided that the Commissioners should, "in assessing the profits or gains of any trade . . . chargeable under schedule D, or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern." The Commissioners in assessing a railway company under schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, for income-tax, allowed a deduction from income of sums expended or set aside for renewal and repairs of plant during the year. The company demanded a further deduction under sec. 12 of the Act of 1878, of a sum representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear of new additional plant purchased within five years which had hitherto required no repairs. The Commissioners refused the additional deduction, holding that the deduction allowed to the railway company from year to year for actual renewal and repairs of the plant was all to which they were entitled.

In an appeal by the railway company, upon a special case stated by the Commissioners, the Court held that there was no ground for altering the determination of the Commissioners.

Observations on the form of Special Cases.

At a meeting of the Special Commissioners of Income-Tax, held at 2^d Division, Glasgow on the 26th February 1880, for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Income-Tax Acts against assessments for the year ending on the 5th April 1880, the Caledonian Railway Company appealed against an assessment in respect of the profits of the concern carried on by the said company. Exchequer Cause. I.

The Commissioners having heard parties, confirmed the assessment appealed against, whereupon an appeal was taken, and a case stated by the Commissioners on behalf of the railway company under sec. 9 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1874 (37 Vict. c. 16).

The case set forth:—

"(2) The Special Commissioners in estimating the amount of assessable profits for 1879-80 based their charge on the profits of the preceding year as shewn by the company's printed accounts for the two half years ended 31st July 1878 and 31st January 1879. . . .

"(6) The Special Commissioners found that in estimating the amount of profits chargeable the company have claimed and have been allowed the following sums as deductions:—

"(7) 'Renewals' means the substitution of new locomotives, carriages, and waggon for those worn out, and in the year ending 31st January 1879 24 new locomotives were supplied, also 38 carriages and 1028 waggon. These new locomotives, carriages, and waggon were of better quality and more expensive than those of which they were renewals.

"The 'repairs and renewals' under the heads 'locomotive power' and 'carriages and waggon' include a sum of £20,837 set aside out of profits for renewal of plant not yet applied for that purpose but at present at the credit of the rolling stock renewal fund. The sum now claimed by the company as a deduction from the profits for income-tax, to which the present case refers, is not deducted or set aside from profits in the printed accounts of the company.

"(8) By this expenditure of £253,389, according to the certificates of the company's locomotive superintendent, the company's property and plant have been maintained in good working condition and repair." . . .

The claim of the company was set forth in the following articles:—

"(12) The company claimed as a deduction from the assessable profits, in addition to the deductions claimed and allowed in bringing out the sum of assessable profits by virtue of section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, the sum of £185,391 on account of depreciation upon rolling stock, machinery, &c.

"(13) The mode in which the said sum of £185,391 was arrived at is as follows:—

On plant at 31st January 1878, £4,806,012,

5% on 75% thereof, £3,604,509 £180,225."

Other deductions on the same principle were stated, bringing out the sum of £185,391.

This claim was abandoned by the railway company at the bar.

"(14) Or at all events, the company made an alternative claim for deduction of the sum of £49,344, being 4½ per cent of the cost of additional new plant added during the last 5½ years. It was stated that the average life of their plant was about 22 years, and on this basis the Caledonian sum expended for the supply or repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes, according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made, nor on account of loss not connected with or arising out of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom, nor for any sum employed, or intended to be employed, as capital in such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern; nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern; nor on account or under pretence of any interest which might have been made on such sums if laid out at interest, nor for any debts except bad debts, proved to be such to the satisfaction of the Commissioners respectively, nor for any average loss beyond the actual amount of loss after adjustment, nor for any sum recoverable under an insurance or contract of indemnity."

Company submitted that a sum at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the cost would represent the annual depreciation. Whereas the sum allowed by the Commissioners therefor was only the amount charged in the company's accounts for plant worn out or renewed during the year, which only amounted to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the cost, and that this arose from the fact of the large amount of new plant having been added (not replaced), which new plant, although actually depreciating at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum, required little or no repair during the first $5\frac{1}{2}$ years of its existence. The whole plant is kept up to the standard of its being worth 75 per cent of its original cost, but until the new plant has depreciated to the extent of 25 per cent (that is, during the first $5\frac{1}{2}$ years of its life), it requires no substantial repairs. The cost of additional new plant during the $5\frac{1}{2}$ years prior to 31st January 1879 was £1,096,534, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of that sum amounts to £49,344.

"(15) The company contended that they were entitled to the deduction claimed under the 12th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1878,* it representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year."

The determination of the Commissioners was set forth in the following articles:—

"(18) The Special Commissioners having duly considered the company's claim, confirmed the assessment in the sum of £1,323,304.

"(19) They considered that, in arriving at the amount on which the assessment was to be made, by reference to the company's printed half-yearly accounts for the year preceding, the full sums stated in the accounts for the two half years ended 31st July 1878 and 31st January 1879, to have been expended in the maintenance, repair, renewal, and reconstruction of the company's machinery and plant, had been admitted as deductions therefrom, as well as a sum of £20,837 set aside from revenue on account of plant not yet renewed, carried to the credit of the rolling stock renewal fund, for value of plant not replaced at 31st January 1879.

"(20) That the whole of the sums stated to have been thus expended year by year in maintenance, repair, and renewals, have been duly allowed as deductions in estimating the profits liable to be assessed from year to year, as well as the full sum at the credit of the rolling stock renewal fund, and will hereafter continue to be yearly allowed in estimating the assessable profits.

"(21) That inasmuch as any diminution in value by reason of wear and tear during the year upon which the assessment was founded has been met by the allowances before detailed, it is not just or reasonable that any further deduction should be allowed by reference to the pro-

* "Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any Act relating to income-tax, the Commissioners for general or special purposes shall, in assessing the profits or gains of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade chargeable under schedule (D), or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable, as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern, and belonging to the person or company by whom the concern is carried on; and for the purpose of this provision, where machinery or plant is let to the person or company by whom the concern is carried on, upon such terms that the person or company is bound to maintain the machinery or plant, and deliver over the same in good condition at the end of the term of the lease, such machinery or plant shall be deemed to belong to such person or company."

Railway Co. v.

Special Commissioners of

Income-Tax.

"The assessments of railways are, according to the terms of No. III. schedule A, of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, by computation of the profits of the preceding year.

"It is the diminished value, by reason of wear and tear for the year, to which section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, relates. The year referred to in that section, so far as respects a concern assessable on the profits of the preceding year, must be the preceding year, and the comparison, in order to arrive at the diminished value of the machinery and plant, is between the value thereof in that year and the value in the year before it.

"(22) That the statement in the railway company's accounts of the value of the machinery and plant must be held as the company's estimate of the actual value of such as a going concern; that the effect of the allowance by the Commissioners for repairs and renewals is to keep up the value to the same amount; and this being so, diminished value by reason of wear and tear does not exist. If a percentage on the value were to be allowed as a deduction from the profits and gains as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear of the machinery and plant, then the deduction for repairs and renewals should not be allowed. To allow deduction of the cost of renewals and repairs as in this case, and also a percentage for diminished value by reason of wear and tear, would be to allow twice deduction for the same thing.

"Section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, allows such deduction as the Commissioners shall think just and reasonable, as representing the diminished value, by reason of wear and tear during the year, of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern. Diminished value would seem to be fact, and the judgment of what is a just and reasonable deduction in respect of it is committed to the Commissioners."

When the case came on for hearing in the Court the railway company did not ask a judgment on the first alternative claim.

Argued for the appellants (on second alternative claim);—Until the Act of 1878 was passed railways were assessed under schedule D of the Act of 1842. Under that Act no deduction was allowed for renewals of and repairs on rolling stock and machinery except in regard to sums actually so applied.¹ The Act of 1878 was passed to remedy this, and by the provisions of that statute deductions for depreciation by wear and tear were allowed. Now, in the present case, it was admitted as matter of fact that though stock for the first $5\frac{1}{2}$ years of its existence required no repair, still, during that time it was in fact deteriorating through wear and tear at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent each year. This was exactly the case contemplated in sec. 12 of the statute of 1878, and the deduction claimed, i.e., $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the cost of additional new plant added during the last $5\frac{1}{2}$ years, fell to be allowed under its provisions. Under the words of that section the Commissioners were bound to make such deduction as they thought "just and reasonable," but they had made none.

Argued for the respondents;—The Court had no jurisdiction to entertain this question, as the words of the statute of 1878, "the Commissioners . . . shall allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable" make the decision of the Commissioners final. Diminished value during the year, and the amount of deduction in respect thereof, were matters of fact. Assuming the jurisdiction of the Court—to let in the deduction now claimed it would be necessary to shew that the machinery and plant were of less value for the purpose of earning income at the end of the year than it was at the beginning.¹ This admittedly was not so, as the machinery and plant were always kept up by repairs and renewals for which deduction was allowed to the value of them in the year preceding, upon which year the income-tax assessment was computed. The case of Knowles (supra), was not an authority in this Court, as in the case of Miller v. Farie the Court had disregarded it, and followed the rule of *Addie v. Railway Co. v.

Special Commissioners of
Income-Tax.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income-tax in a question as to the assessment for income-tax of the Caledonian Railway. The Commissioners having confirmed the assessment, and the Caledonian Railway Company having demanded a case, the case now before your Lordships has been prepared and presented for that purpose. The kind of question that we have to decide in regard to the mode in which the income derived from carrying on a trading concern like the Caledonian Railway Company is to be estimated is one of course with which we are not generally familiar, and that fact has rendered the discussion and the consideration of it somewhat difficult. But I am sorry to say that the difficulty has been a great deal increased by the way in which this case has been presented. I think it would have been very desirable, and for the future I trust it will be so considered, to follow the injunctions of the statute in the stating of cases of this kind. The statute directs in the 9th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act (the 37th of the Queen), that immediately upon the determination of any appeal under the Acts relating to income-tax by the Commissioners for Special Purposes, or of any appeal under the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties, the appellant or the inspector or surveyor may, if dissatisfied with the determination as being erroneous in point of law, declare his dissatisfaction to the Commissioners; and then the Commissioners are to state and sign a case. The case is to set forth the facts and the determination; and the party receiving the same is to lay it before the Court. Then it is provided that the Court shall hear and determine the question or questions of law arising on the case transmitted under the Act; and the 3d sub-section is, that the Court shall have power, if they think fit, to cause the case to be sent back for amendment, and thereupon it shall be amended accordingly.

When I come to look at the case which is now before us I find that it states neither the law nor the facts. It neither states the facts as matter of fact, nor does it state the question of law in any shape whatever which we are required to decide; and if I had had more difficulty upon the substance of the question raised before us I think it would have been essential to send it back and have it put into a form consistent with the provisions of the statute. What the case does is to narrate at considerable length the process by which the Caledonian Railway Company have made up their accounts, and, secondly, the process by which the ultimate result is attained. But these matters are not stated as matter of fact, they are stated in the way of narrative. And then the conclusion at which the Commissioners have arrived is set out, and substantially, I

Now, I have made these observations because I must say the form of it has rendered the consideration of the case somewhat perplexing. But as it is, I am prepared to give my judgment upon it, finding in it sufficient matter of fact stated to enable us to consider the question, although it is not very easy to find the real question that is at issue between the parties.

The case stated by the Special Commissioners for our opinion, divested of arithmetical details, which do not affect the matter, raises a very simple issue. The object of the calculations explained in the case is to exhibit the process by which the amount of assessable income realised by the Caledonian Railway Company for the year 1879-80 has been ascertained. The principle which underlies the process is of course to ascertain the amount of clear profit realised by this commercial concern within the year, and to determine this (which really is at the very root of the matter) all the outgoings which are necessary to attain the sum of gross profit must of course be deducted from that sum before the clear or assessable value of the income for the year can be arrived at. The material appliances used by this trading company in order to create nett income or profits, which are the subjects of the tax, are (apart from the general expenses of management), first, permanent way, stations, and other fixed property, forming what is popularly called the line of railway; and secondly, the plant or rolling stock, consisting of locomotive engines, carriages, waggons, implements, and the like. The present case relates entirely to the mode of estimating the amount which ought year by year to be deducted from gross profits, as representing the outlay on plant necessary to enable the company as a trading concern to realise them. This was originally regulated by schedule D of the Income-Tax Act of 1842, which provided what deductions were, and what were not, to be allowed in the case of expenditure on plant. The clause of the statute is printed, and I need not read it at length. It was contained in the original Income-Tax Act of 1842, and provides in the 3d sub-section that in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, "no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains, on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises, &c., . . . nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade . . . beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made." That substantially is the principle upon which from 1842 down to 1878 this calculation was made.

The statement contained in the case exhibits in some detail the process by which the Commissioners of Income-Tax endeavoured to apply practically the statutory provisions. Railway profits cannot be realised without the constant use of the rolling stock, and as this use necessarily deteriorates the plant and diminishes its value as a means of producing profit it requires repair and renewal. The Commissioners have allowed deductions for repairs and renewal. The only complaint now made by the Caledonian Railway Company to which their claim is restricted relates to additional plant said to have been furnished during the five years prior to January 1879, and is founded on the provisions of the 12th section of the Income-Tax Act of 1878. What they now demand is that they shall be allowed the value of what they allege to be the wear and tear upon additional plant furnished by the railway company for No. 31. the five years prior to the year 1879. That, they say, has not been allowed for by an allowance for repairs or renewals, because there have been no repairs or re- Nov. 18, 1880. newals, but they say the plant is older than it was, and therefore its value must be depreciated by the use for the five years; and they found that upon the 12th clause of the statute of 1878—the 41st of the Queen, c. 15—which runs thus:—

“Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any Act relating to income-tax the Commissioners for General or Special Purposes shall, in assessing the profits or gains of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade chargeable under schedule D, or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern, and belonging to the person or company by whom the concern is carried on; and for the purpose of this provision, where machinery or plant is let to the person or company by whom the concern is carried on upon such terms that the person or company is bound to maintain the machinery or plant and deliver over the same in good condition at the end of the term of the lease, such machinery or plant shall be deemed to belong to such person or company.”

Unquestionably this was a clause intended to alter and to extend in favour of the person or company assessed the provisions of the Act of 1842, and of schedule D thereto annexed. About that there can be no doubt at all, because it allows and enjoins the Commissioners to make a deduction which certainly was not allowed by the original Income-Tax Act. It is, however, to be such a deduction as they may think just and reasonable, as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear. Now, that being the nature of the claim, which arises simply in this way, that neither repairs nor renewals of plant are the foundation for it, but additional plant contributed or furnished during the five years prior to January 1879, the question is, whether the Commissioners were bound to make allowances for the wear and tear on that plant. The railway company complain that as far as this plant is concerned, while its value has been diminished by wear and tear during the five years in question, no allowance has been made on this head by the Commissioners in terms of the statute. As a matter of fact, I take the last statement to be true. The Commissioners have made no allowance for the diminution of the value of this plant during the five years in question, while it cannot be disputed that after a period of use the engines and carriages are not and probably cannot be as valuable a commodity for sale as they were when new. There are some grounds to which the Commissioners have appealed as supporting their determination in the confirmation of the assessment to which I attach no importance at all, and I think it is unfortunate that they are stated as grounds for judgment—if they are so stated, about which I have some doubt. The first was, that a sum of £20,000, to which we were referred, was an equivalent allowance on this head; but it seems to me that that sum has no connection whatever with the question raised in this case. That sum of £20,000 was properly made a subject of deduction upon its own merits. It was a sum withdrawn from profits, and therefore not clear profits, and set apart to meet a prospective demand for renewal, and was not therefore an allowance for past wear and tear in any sense whatever. Neither do I think it could be successfully contended that this 12th section was sufficiently carried out by the allowance already referred to for renewals, if it appeared as matter of fact that there had been a diminution of value in regard to any part of the plant which these allowances did not cover ; for the clause in question certainly meant to go beyond the deductions allowed in the Act of 1842. But I am nevertheless unable under this case to give the Caledonian Railway Company the redress which they ask for. I think the Commissioners were entitled to hold, and that their judgment proceeds on that footing, that the value of the additional plant in question was not diminished by wear and tear during the five years in question, and they do so find in express terms in the words of their judgment, and I am not prepared to review or alter their decision on that question of fact. The ground on which the Special Commissioners seem to have proceeded is the alleged and assumed fact that during the first five years of the life of a railway locomotive or carriage it requires no repairs, and is therefore of the same value—that is, capable of earning the same amount of income as when it was new. That manifestly is a principle quite capable of being maintained, and, in my apprehension, it is sound. The view seems to be this—the whole expenditure in repairs and renewal of old plant has been allowed for, and as there is no diminution by wear and tear in the value of new additional plant for the first five years in the sense of producing profit, that is to say, the plant requires no repairs to enable it to produce the same amount of profit that it did at first, then it is clear that from first to last the plant has been in the position that it was at starting, and is capable therefore of producing the same amount of profit by the same outlay and no more. If the Commissioners assumed that the expression “diminished value” in the 12th section of the Act of 1878 signifies value for the purpose for which it was intended in a going concern, I cannot say they were wrong in so holding. I do not think that the words had any reference to the value of the plant as merchantable or marketable articles, because its capacity to earn income constitutes its sole value to the railway company, and is the only quality contemplated under the statutes relating to the taxation of income. I am the more confirmed in this impression by the terms of the second part of the first paragraph of the 12th section, relative to the valuation of plant in the hands of a tenant under an obligation to restore it to the owner in as good condition as it was when he received it. By the terms of the section, such plant is to be held to belong to the tenant, and is to be settled with for income-tax on precisely the same principles as it would have been if he had been the proprietor, but it is plain enough that if the plant is restored as it was by the tenant under such a contract within the first five years of its existence, assuming that no repairs or renewals are required during that period, his obligation is fulfilled, and he could have no possible interest in the marketable value of an article which he had no power to sell. But even if these things were not so, I must say that, looking to the terms of the 12th section of the Act of 1878 I should feel very great difficulty in interfering with the result at which the Commissioners have arrived. They have held, following out the wide discretion vested in them by the statute, that no wear and tear has taken place in this plant for which any allowance would be just and reasonable. I cannot see how we can review that conclusion. If, indeed, we were satisfied that the Commissioners had misread the statute, and had not applied their minds to the question, we might have sent the case back to them for consideration, obviously. But I am satisfied that they have applied their minds very directly to the question, and have come deliberately to the conclusion that the plant had suffered no diminution in value in the sense intended by the statute, but was of as much value to the company, and was capable of producing with the same outlay the same amount of profit as it had been at any former period. The plant, it will be observed, was not five and a half years old at the termination of the period.

I am therefore disposed to refuse the appeal, and confirm the judgment of the Commissionera. It may be asked, in this view, what is the real meaning and intendment of this 12th section of the statute? I do not know that I should be able to give a very clear response to that question without more practical knowledge than is disclosed or is to be derived from this case. But I can understand that there may be plant deteriorated after the five years by wear and tear, on which no sum has been expended for repairs or renewals within the period of assessment; and probably the Income-Tax Commissioners had felt themselves hampered before the passing of the statute by the very stringent words of schedule D of the Act of 1848. But that is more speculative than anything else. Meantime, I am not prepared to alter, and therefore I propose that we should confirm the judgment of the Commissioners.

Railway Co. v.
Special Commissioners of
Income-Tax.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur in the opinion which your Lordship has expressed, and will confine myself to a very few additional or supplementary observations.

This is an appeal against a determination of the Special Commissioners under the Income-Tax Acts assessing the profits of the Caledonian Railway Company for the year 1879–80 at the sum of £1,323,304. The appeal to this Court as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland is taken under the 9th and 10th sections of the statute 37 Vict. cap. 16, known as The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1874. By the 9th section of that Act it is made competent to the railway company or party assessed, “if dissatisfied with the determination of the Commissioners, as being erroneous in point of law, to declare” dissatisfaction therewith, and to require the Commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Court thereon. It is provided that the case shall set forth the facts “and the determination,” and that it shall be transmitted to this Court for decision.

From these provisions it appears that it is only on proper questions of law that there is any appeal to this Court as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland. All review upon questions of fact which are to be ascertained by evidence of any kind is excluded, review being allowed only upon pure and proper questions of law; and, in order that the law and the fact may be kept entirely separate, it is provided that the case to be stated by the Commissioners shall “set forth the facts”—that is, shall specify all the matters of fact upon which the legal determination proceeds—and shall also set forth “the determination”—that is, the decision in law—which the Commissioners have pronounced upon the facts proved or admitted before them; and it is this determination, so far as proceeding upon grounds of law, which alone is the subject of appeal to this Court.

I cannot say that I am quite satisfied with the manner in which the present case is framed. In many of the statements which it contains law and fact are mixed with the claims and statements of the railway company, and it is difficult to ascertain and to separate what is meant to be stated as matter of fact from what is decided or inferred as matter of law, and there is no precise statement anywhere in so many words of what the legal determination is against which the Caledonian Railway Company appeal. The short but very precise direction of the statute has not been implicitly followed—That the case shall set forth, first, the facts, and, second, the determination; and under the twenty-three heads or numbered paragraphs which the case contains I have difficulty in saying which of these numbered heads are statements of fact, and which of them embrace determinations in law.

I am aware of the difficulty of separating law and fact in cases like the present, and of the nicety which there must always be in setting forth categorically matters of fact which are not to be touched by the Court of review so as to bring to a point, precise and clear, the questions of law which the Court of review is to settle, so as finally to regulate all future practice, however extensive or far-reaching. But, however difficult the operation may be, the statute requires that it shall be attempted, and before any case of this kind can be satisfactorily disposed of the Court must have before it distinctly, on the one hand, the questions and matters of fact which it is to assume as finally ascertained, and, on the other hand, the question or questions of law which arise therefrom, and as to which the assessing authorities and the parties liable in the assessment have differed.

But, while I have thought it right to make these remarks, I agree with the view taken by your Lordship. I am not unwilling to gather, so far as possible, from the present case,—the true questions between the parties and what must be held to be the admitted facts out of which these questions arise. With the assistance of the statements at the bar I think this is possible, and if the real questions can be got at with sufficient clearness I think the parties are entitled to our judgment.

As explained at the bar, the whole legal question really turns upon the legal import and effect of the 12th section of the statute 41 Vict. cap. 15, known as "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878." This section 12 provides,—“Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any Act relating to income-tax, the Commissioners for general or special purposes shall, in assessing the profits or gains of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, chargeable under schedule (D), or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable, as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern and belonging to the person or company by whom the concern is carried on.” The statute goes on to provide for cases of machinery and plant being let on lease or otherwise, or held under condition of maintenance in good condition, but the substance of the enactment is that in estimating profits deduction shall be given for tear and wear of plant and machinery—that is, an allowance spread over a reasonable number of years, which will enable the trader to keep up his plant, and replace it when it is worn out.

Now, the complaint of the railway company is that they have not received allowance or deduction from profits, or have not received sufficient allowance or sufficient deduction from profits for what they call depreciation upon rolling-stock and machinery, and they claim as additional deductions from the estimated profits for the year in question either, first, a sum of £185,391 as the deterioration of their whole plant for the year in question, 1879–80—(no doubt this first claim was given up at the bar, but it is important to keep in view that in the case before us this claim stands on the same footing as the alternative claim, which is alternatively)—second, deduction of a sum of £49,344, being $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the cost of additional new plant added during the last five and a-half years. The question of law sought to be raised by the railway company is, whether they are entitled in point of law to deduction from the assessed amount of their income and profits of one or other of the above sums in respect (I take the words of the Act) "of the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of their machinery or plant." The statute requires that the diminished value shall be occasioned by reason of wear and tear, and it must be wear and tear "during the year" in question.

Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Special Commissioners of
Income-Tax.

Now, the first point to observe is that this special case does not state what the diminished value of the plant is by reason of wear and tear during the year in question. This is a question of fact, and was a question for the Commissioners, and not for this Court, and so, even if the railway company are entitled in law to an estimated deduction for wear and tear, there are no materials before the Court for fixing such deduction, and the reason of this is obvious. The Special Commissioners at the instance of the railway company, or at least with their consent, have fixed the deduction for wear and tear on a different principle altogether from that contemplated in the Act of 1878. Instead of attempting to fix "diminished value, by reason of wear and tear during the year," they have allowed the company deduction of the actual sums expended by them for repairs and renewals, amounting to £253,389, and, as it is stated and certified by the railway company themselves that by the expenditure of this sum the whole plant has been maintained in good working order and repair, this sum may fairly be taken as making up the whole deterioration which the wear and tear of the year has occasioned. The view taken by both parties seems to me to have been fair and reasonable. Instead of the Commissioners guessing at probable deterioration, by taking percentages or round sums, which is necessarily a rough mode of getting at the result, they have taken the company's own plan of calculating, namely, taking the actual sums expended in repairing and renewing the plant, and this although the renewed plant was better and more expensive than that which was worn out. This is perfectly fair, and the plan over a series of years will be perfectly equitable. The Caledonian Railway is a continuing company with perpetual duration, and if it receives deductions over a series of years for the actual expense of repairs and renewals, so as to keep up its plant in undiminished efficiency, this will be better than any mere guess or estimate which the Commissioners could make. The railway company will get deduction for their actual expenditure, instead of a mere estimate of what their expenditure would probably be. At all events, this is the view upon which the assessment has been made, and there are no materials for throwing this assessment aside and making it up of new upon another principle. The railway company themselves do not complain of this. They accept—indeed it appeared from the argument that they asked—deduction of the whole cost of repairing and renewing their plant, and this has been allowed, and they decline to go back upon this, but they ask an additional deduction on a different principle altogether, and they claim both deductions cumulatively.

It seems to be quite clear, as the Commissioners observe, that the railway company cannot get deduction for deterioration twice over—first, by deducting the actual expense of repair and renewal, and then by deducting an additional estimate sum for the same thing. Nor will it do, as the railway company urge, to make a distinction between old and new plant, and to deal with the old plant in one way and with the new in another. I think the same principle must be applied to both.

Still further, the assessment has been made in entire accordance with the railway company's own accounts. In striking their annual profits so as to fix

No. 31. the sum divisible as dividend, the railway company have gone upon actual expenditure, and not upon a mere estimate of probable wear and tear. I see no reason why the income-tax to Government should not be fixed upon the same principle as that which determines the dividend to the proprietors, and prima facie it seems very anomalous that the railway company should tell their shareholders that they have realised a certain sum as profit, which they propose to divide as dividend, and should yet maintain, as in a question of taxation, that their real profit is a much less sum. The contention of the railway company implies the admission that, for the year in question, they are paying dividend to some extent out of capital. Surely no complaint can be made if the railway company pay income-tax only upon what they themselves divide as dividend or net profit, and upon which they get back or retain from their shareholders precisely the income-tax which they have paid.

At all events, I am perfectly clear that this case does not contain the materials necessary to enable the Court to interfere with the determination of the Commissioners. For example, there is no finding in point of fact of what the average life of the plant is, but a mere statement by the railway company that it was about twenty-two years, but if a slump or estimated deterioration is to be taken, founded upon the life of the plant, this life of the plant must be found as a matter of fact by the Commissioners. Indeed, the Commissioners must themselves, in the case supposed, fix in figures the deduction for wear and tear for the year. This they have not done, and they were never asked to do so. Without such finding the Court cannot give effect to the claim.

The statute seems to regard deterioration from wear and tear during the year as the true criterion, and this answers another objection of the railway company, that upon new or added plant there is little deterioration during the first five and a-half years of its existence. If this be so, then the statute only allows little deduction. It is actual deterioration only that is to be taken into account.

On the whole, I am for affirming the determination of the Commissioners. If the railway company want the assessment made upon a different principle—that is, upon estimated wear and tear, and not upon actual wear and tear—they may be entitled to insist on this last. Counsel at the bar stated that they did not seek to open up the assessment altogether, but only claimed an additional deduction. If the principle of the statute of 1878 is sought to be applied I think the whole assessment must be reviewed, and the question raised in a different form. I would humbly suggest for the consideration of the railway company, however, whether the actual expenditure will not give a more equitable result than any mere estimate could, especially as the actual cost is the criterion adopted in their own accounts.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

Ritchie v.
Whish, &c.

Succession—Patent ambiguity—Testamentary writing.—An old lady executed a settlement with five codicils all on one sheet of paper. She disposed a property she had to a niece whom she named her executrix and residuary legatee. By the first of the codicils she bequeathed, inter alia, “to Edward Whish, son of my cousin Margaret Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, five hundred pounds.” The last codicil bore,—“I revoke the legacy of five hundred pounds to my cousin Mrs Whish” (there being no such legacy), “wife of Colonel Whish, and bequeath to her in place thereof the sum of £400, and I bequeathe the £100 to T. H.,” her husband’s nephew. Two other papers were found in the testator’s repositories giving directions to her executrix, and they shewed that she knew how much she possessed, and only meant to bequeath that amount, while if legacies were given to Edward Whish, Mrs Whish, and to T. H., the amount bequeathed would exceed by £500 the amount of the executry estate. A letter of a subsequent date written by the testatrix to Mrs Whish was produced; in which she stated that Edward Whish was still to be her chief legatee, “but not for so large a sum as I intended,” and then went on to bequeath her gold watch to him, and certain jewellery, &c., to other relations.

Held (1) that this letter, though not found in the testatrix’s repositories, was of a testamentary nature, and that the explanations contained in it might be read along with the will and codicils; and (2) that her intention was to revoke the legacy of £500 only to the extent of the £100, bequeathed to T. H., her husband’s nephew.

mentary writings left by Mrs Hutchison, who died at an advanced age without issue on 31st December 1879. B.

Mrs Hutchison left a settlement, dated 22d March 1879, by which she disposed a tenement belonging to her to Mrs Aiken or Ritchie, and appointed her executrix and residuary legatee under obligation to pay debts and any legacies or bequests which she might direct. On the same paper five codicils were written.

By the first of the codicils, dated 22d March 1879, Mrs Hutchison bequeathed special legacies to various legatees, and, inter alia, she thereby bequeathed “to Edward Whish, son of my cousin Mrs Margaret Black Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, five hundred pounds.” By the second, third, and fourth codicils, all dated 12th August 1879, Mrs Hutchison left additional legacies, and made certain modifications in her bequests. The fifth codicil, dated 1st December 1879, was expressed as follows:—“I, Mrs Catherine Anderson or Hutchison, before designed, do hereby evoke the legacy of five hundred pounds to my cousin Mrs Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, and bequeathe to her in place thereof the sum of four hundred pounds; and I bequeathe the hundred pounds to Thomas Hutchison, my late husband’s nephew, the sum of one hundred pounds, residing at Kirkcaldy, and with this alteration I confirm my name at 40 Palmerston Place.”

The legacies bequeathed by Mrs Hutchison, including the bequest of £500 in favour of Edward Whish, but not the bequests of £400 in favour of Mrs Whish, and £100 in favour of Thomas Hutchison, amounted to £1780, which exhausted the amount of her personal estate, after deduction of debts and expenses. If these legacies were to be added, the sum bequeathed would amount to £2280, being £500 in excess of the personal estate available for payment.

Mrs Hutchison left another codicil, holograph and signed by her, and dated 23d October 1879, written on a separate sheet of paper, which was not referred to in the present question. That codicil, along with the settlement and the five codicils written on it, were found in her repositories after her death, enclosed in an envelope, which was sealed, and which bore on the back thereof the following inscription or title holograph of Mrs Hutchison:—"Sole last will or testament of Mrs Catherine Anderson or Hutchison. To be opened by Mrs Grace Pratt Aiken or Ritchie, my sole executrix and residuary legatee. 1st December 1879."

Two other writings of Mrs Hutchison were found in her repositories attached together by a pin, one being dated 31st March, and the other 5th September 1879. The one informed her executrix where her money was invested, and the other explained the manner in which the legacies had been left.

The following excerpt from holograph letter by Mrs Hutchison to her cousin, Mrs Margaret Wemyss Black or Whish, was printed as an appendix to this case:—"40 Palmerston Place, 12 December /79. . . .—dear Teddy* is still to be my chief legatee, but not for so large a sum as I intended. I have been obliged to sink some of my money as the expense of boarding and keeping a nurse has been a heavy tax on me. Also I leave him my gold watch; To Dear Mae† her Grand-Papa's locket his hair, which I hope she will wear and prize, for he was an upright man, seldom to be met with on earth. Yr. mama's old cup and saucer is at Mrs Black's, Darnaway Street, keeping for you. The vase I got at yr. mama's death you can get from Mrs Ritchie, who is to have charge, when required. I am able to write no more, farewell. Many happy days we spent together. I got dear Teddy's likeness. I like the one you sent Mrs Thomson best. It was kind of the Clayton Blacks to a lone stranger. God will reward. They have been like sisters to me, the Smiths of late have been very kind and got my old Minister to come and see me. Give my best love to dear Mae and darling Teddy and trusting that you will have a happy meeting with yr. husband I am yr. affectt. Cousin, Mrs Ritchie, the executrix and residuary legatee, was the first party to the special case, and she maintained that the sum of £500 only was effectually bequeathed to Edward Whish, Mrs Whish, and Thomas Hutchison between them, and that the legacy to Edward Whish had been revoked, or alternatively, that the revocation thereof was a condition of the legacies of £400 to Mrs Whish and £100 to Mr Hutchison being effectual, and that if it should be held not to have been revoked these latter legacies must be held to have failed; and further, that if all the legacies should be held effectually bequeathed, they must suffer an abatement along with the other legacies corresponding to the deficiency of the personal estate.

Edward Whish was the party of the second part, and maintained that the legacy bequeathed to him by the first codicil, dated 22d March 1879, had not been revoked by the codicil dated 1st December, and fell to be paid to him; or otherwise, if revoked, had been revoked only to the extent of £100.

Mrs Whish was the party of the third part, and maintained that she was entitled to a bequest of £400 under the codicil of 1st December.

Thomas Hutchison was the party of the fourth part, and maintained that he was entitled to a legacy of £100 under the same codicil.

No. 32.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The testatrix, Mrs Catherine Hutchison, executed a general disposition and settlement, dated 22d March 1879, by which she constituted the first party, Mrs Ritchie, her executrix and residuary legatee ; but she added a number of codicils which had the effect very much of annulling the residuary bequest to Mrs Ritchie, and disposing of the whole estate of the testatrix. The codicils are five in number, as far as they are printed for us, and there was another which was mentioned in the discussion, with which we are not concerned, and these codicils, together with the trust-disposition, were all written on one sheet of paper, which was found in the testatrix's repositories with an endorsement in her writing in these terms—"Sole last will or testament of Mrs Catherine Anderson or Hutchison. To be opened by Mrs Grace Pratt Aiken or Ritchie, my sole executrix and residuary legatee. 1st December 1879." That date is the date of the last codicil.

But although no other papers were put up along with the disposition, there is another paper which it is impossible not to regard as in some measure a testamentary document, because it conveys certain instructions to the executrix. That is a paper in which Mrs Hutchison estimates her means and estate, and gives directions as to the way in which she expects them to be administered by her executrix ; therefore it is necessary to go beyond the other papers which she herself had indorsed and described as her "sole last will or testament ;" because these memoranda as to the constituent parts of her estate, and the way she expected them to be realised and apportioned, are documents which may be legitimately taken into account in ascertaining the purpose of the testatrix in the case of any ambiguities arising as to the construction of the codicils. It is undoubtedly an important fact that she estimates the amount of her estate very correctly, and by the codicils disposes of the whole of it, and apparently takes pains to avoid exceeding the amount of her estate in the total of the legacies bequeathed by her.

The codicil which has principally to be considered is the last—that of 1st December 1879—and as it professes to deal with a legacy left by a previous codicil, we must look back to that legacy, which was given in these terms—"To Edward Whish, son of my cousin Mrs Margaret Black Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, five hundred pounds." Now, the legacy thus given to her cousin's son is the largest legacy bequeathed to anyone by her, and therefore at the time that codicil was executed—in March 1879—this Edward Whish was certainly persona predilecta. The other codicil which subsequently deals with the same legacy is thus expressed :—"I, Mrs Catherine Anderson or Hutchison, before designed, do hereby evoke the legacy of five hundred pounds to my cousin Mrs Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, and bequeathe to her in place thereof the sum of four hundred pounds ; and I bequeathe the hundred pounds to Thomas Hutchison, my late husband's nephew, the sum of one hundred pounds, residing at Kirkcaldy, and with this alteration I confirm my name at 40 Palmerston Place ;" and then she signs her name. Now, no doubt this codicil causes a good deal of embarrassment. That she intended to deal in one way or another with the legacy of £500 to Edward Whish, it seems difficult to dispute, for there is no other legacy of £500 in the whole of her will ; and she distinctly revokes, or professes to revoke, the legacy of £500. But then it is plain that she did not completely understand what this legacy was, or else she has written what she did not intend—one or other of these conclusions is inevitable. Either she mistook what was the legacy in the previous codicil, or else she did not express herself in the latter codicil as she intended to do. The original legacy was left to Edward Whish, who was a boy at the time, and then she says she revokes the legacy to her cousin Mrs Whish, and in place thereof bequeathes £400 to her. The effect of this codicil, if it is to receive effect as a revocation of the legacy to Edward Whish and a bestowal of £400 on his mother, is this—Edward Whish, her favourite in March preceding, is left without a shilling, and £400 goes to his mother, that is, in fact, to his father jure mariti. Now, the husband was no relation to the testatrix at all, and there is no mention of him in her settlements; therefore it is difficult to believe that such could possibly have been her intention. If she had expressed herself unambiguously to that effect of course her intention would have been given effect to; but I think we should hesitate to do so here, as it seems extremely unlikely that such was the intention, when she expressed herself in terms which denote confusion of mind in writing the codicil of 1st December. She was an old woman, and did not long survive the date of that codicil; and therefore, so far as its terms are founded on for the purpose of transferring £400 from Edward Whish to his father, I hesitate to give effect to that construction. I am persuaded that she did not intend to do anything of the kind. But as to the odd £100, she has made use of terms so distinct that I think we cannot refuse to give it to Thomas Hutchison. She says distinctly that she reduces the £500 to £400, and that for the purpose of giving him the £100. On that matter I feel no doubt; but on the other point, as to the remaining £400, I think it would be a strange result if we were bound to give effect to the contention of Mrs Whish and her husband, and therefore one turns with considerable anxiety to a piece of evidence founded on by Edward Whish as shewing that he was not intended to be deprived of the £400.

That piece of evidence is the letter of 12th December 1879. If that letter is to be looked on as extrinsic evidence, and not as a testamentary document, I think we can give no effect to it at all; we cannot look at it, for the ambiguity here is unquestionably a patent ambiguity, and, therefore, to be solved only by looking at the will or other testamentary papers. Now, is it a testamentary document or not? It is not addressed to her executrix, and was not put up along with her will. That goes against the view that it is a testamentary document, unless there is in the paper itself sufficient internal evidence that it is testamentary in whole or in part. It is so in part, undoubtedly, for it is addressed to Mrs Whish, telling her she is to have a specific legacy, and to that extent it is an effectual testamentary deed, and sufficient to convey to her the legacy in question. But it may be so far testamentary, and not so quoad ultra. The important question is, Whether it is testamentary to any effect as regards Edward Whish, the “Teddy” of the letter? It is testamentary as regards him to a certain extent, for it contains these words—“Also I leave him my gold watch.” But I think it may also be viewed as testamentary as regards the words preceding these, for it seems to me the gold watch was left to him because of something she says just before. The words are these—“Dear Teddy is still to be my chief legatee, but not for so large a sum as I intended. I have been obliged to sink some of my money, as the expense of boarding and keeping a nurse has been a heavy tax on me. Also I leave him my gold watch.” Now, that means—“I am obliged to reduce my legacy to dear Teddy,” and explains why; and then to make up to him she leaves the watch. If that is so, this letter is testamentary throughout as regards Teddy, for the important words at the beginning are expressive of the inductive cause or motive of leaving him the watch. If this letter can be received as testamentary, and as explanatory of the intention of the testatrix, I come to the same conclusion as to the probable meaning of the codicil of 1st December. The statement that "dear Teddy is still to be my chief legatee, but not for so large a sum as I intended," seems consistent with the construction of the codicil as leaving £400 to him and the odd £100 to Thomas Hutchison. That conclusion I have accordingly adopted.

Ritchie v.

LORD DEAS.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I confess I have no difficulty in giving effect to the letter of 12th December 1879 as the expression of a will or the explanation of it. I have no doubt that the letter is on its face a testamentary letter to some effects in favour of Teddy himself. Now, I know of no rule of law or of common sense to prevent a testator while bequeathing certain legacies to take the opportunity in the same writing to explain what he or she meant in a former testamentary writing. It is all very well to say that the explanation itself must be testamentary. But here the testatrix has made the explanation in a letter which is of a testamentary nature, and that is enough. I have not, therefore, the same difficulty as your Lordship seems to have in regard to the result.

LORD MURE.—The question appears to me to be one of considerable difficulty on account of the contradictory nature of the writings relating to the legacy of £500 which is bequeathed by the codicil of 22d March, and is again dealt with in that of 1st December 1879. Nothing could be more distinct than the bequest to Edward Whish in the codicil of 22d March by which £500 is made over to him as a persona predilecta. But the testatrix, in the codicil of 1st December, revokes a bequest of £500, and describes it as having been left to Mrs Whish, and not, as it had been, to Mrs Whish's son Edward, and she then bequeaths £400 to Mrs Whish, and £100 to Thomas Hutchison. There seems to have been here some confusion of names in the mind of the testatrix, and dealing with the two codicils by themselves it is difficult to say what the testatrix really intended to do. But having regard to the fact that in the first codicil the bequest to Edward Whish is express, and that he was evidently the person whom the testatrix intended to benefit, I am disposed to think that this discrepancy should be ascribed to a mistake, or want of recollection, as to the name of the person to whom she had left the £500, and that what she really means was to restrict that legacy to £400, leaving the £400 to the same person to whom she had left the £500, and to give the remaining £100 to Thomas Hutchison.

That is the construction I should have been disposed to put upon these documents taken by themselves, as it is a safer construction than the other, which, as your Lordship has pointed out, would leave Edward Whish without any pecuniary legacy. But then the letter of 12th December, if we can hold it to be a testamentary document, seems to remove all difficulty, for it explains what she had done. In it she says, "dear Teddy is still to be my chief legatee, but not for so large a sum as I intended;" and that is exactly what she did by the codicil of 1st December. The letter then goes on to make some bequests, and in particular she gives her gold watch to Edward. In these circumstances, I am disposed to think that this letter, although it does not bear to be testamen-

No. 32. tary, and was not found put up with her settlement, is a testamentary document in its nature, and may be read in explanation of her settlement, and so reading it I have come to concur with your Lordships.

Nov. 19, 1880.
Ritchie v.
Whish, &c.

LORD SHAND.—I have come to the same conclusion. On one point which was the subject of argument I am very clear, viz., that on no reasonable construction of the settlement can it be maintained that there is a legacy of £500 to Edward Whish, and in addition to that a legacy of £400 to his mother, and another of £100 to Thomas Hutchison. It was explained that if you substitute £500 as left by the later codicil for the £500 left by the earlier one, you precisely exhaust the estate of the testatrix, and if any additional legacies were to be paid an abatement of all the legacies would be necessary. The testatrix had, I think, made it clear that she did not intend the legacies I have referred to to be double, or in her settlement to exceed the amount of her estate, for with reference to the state of her affairs she says expressly that the sums she has willed away will exhaust the amount of her estate, and her accounts of her estate under her own hands, which are correct, correspond with this.

As to the other question, whether the legacy of £500 to Edward Whish stands good on the first codicil, or whether in lieu of this £400 is left to him or his mother and £100 to Thomas Hutchison, I think there is some difficulty. If we come to the conclusion that the final letter could not be taken into account I should have great difficulty in holding that any legacy was finally given to Edward Whish. My impression would rather have been that there was a good revocation of the original legacy given to him, and a substitution of £400 as a legacy to his mother by the words of the codicil of 1st December. The legacy revoked is, I think, sufficiently identified, and the new words of bequest seem if taken alone to give the legacy of £400 to Mrs Whish. But the confusion is cleared away when we look at her latest testamentary writing, if testamentary it can be held to be, for there she reverts to Edward Whish as her chief legatee. And I am of opinion that the document is testamentary. If the words "dear Teddy is still to be my chief legatee" had occurred in a letter by the testatrix addressed to a third party merely in the course of an ordinary correspondence they could not have been regarded in the present question. But looking at the document as a whole, and to the direct bequests it contains, I think it must be accepted as a testamentary paper. It contains a specific bequest of a gold watch to Edward Whish, and I think the preceding part of the letter referring to him must also be taken as testamentary. In this view I concur in the judgment to be pronounced.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the legacy of £500 bequeathed to the party of the second part by codicil of 22d March is revoked to the extent of £100, but subsists unrevoked in favour of the party of the second part to the extent of £400: Find and declare that the legacy of £100 in favour of the party of the fourth part is effectual."

v. Smith.

Superior and Vassal—Payment of feu-duty—Claim by original vassal to assignation of superior's rights against insolvent disponees of former.—Held (disc. Lord Shand) that a vassal in tendering payment of his feu-duty is not entitled to require from his superior an assignation of his rights to enable him (the vassal) to recover the proportion of feu-duty applicable to part of the feu he had disposed, although the assignation were qualified with a declaration that it should not prejudice the rights of the superior.

By feu-contract, dated December 1875 and January 1876, Mrs Susan E. P. Smith feued to David Guthrie, wright and builder in Glasgow, certain subjects, being part of her lands of Whiteinch, in the parish of Govan, containing 9411 square yards in measure. There was to be a yearly feu-duty of £235, 5s. 6d., and the feuar was taken bound in the feu-contract to erect tenements of a specified description along the whole extent of the north, east, south, and west building lines of the feu, and there was a declaration that, in case the feuar "shall sell or dispose parts or portions of the said piece of ground, then the annual feu-duty of such parts or portions shall correspond and bear the same proportion to the total feu-duty after stipulated that the portion of ground so sold or disposed bears to the whole of said piece of ground hereby feued." There was a further provision that the superior "shall not be bound to admit of the said subdivision of the feu-duty until there shall be built upon each separate portion of the said piece of ground sold, as well as upon that retained, buildings of the description above mentioned, and yielding a yearly rent equal to at least double of the feu-duty, and augmented feu-duty, effeiring to such portion of the said piece of ground sold and that retained;" and also that, in the event of the feuar "selling or disposing the piece of ground above disposed, or any part or portion thereof, the foregoing personal obligation for payment of the feu-duty, interest, and penalties, shall only subsist against him and his heirs and executors until buildings shall be erected on the said piece of ground, or the part or parts thereof so sold or disposed, and on that retained, in terms of the obligation and conditions to that effect before written, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding."

By contract of ground-annual, dated 10th May 1876, Guthrie disposed to Messrs Peter Rae and John Clark, the partners of Rae & Clark, wrights in Whiteinch, a portion of the subjects feued as above, with a declaration that the proportion of the feu-duty payable by them was £140, 13s., and under the real burden of a ground-annual of £42, 3s. 10d. The proportion of the feu-duty was not made a real burden. The disponees erected two tenements upon their portion of the ground, and thereafter granted three bonds and dispositions in security over them. Rae & Clark subsequently became insolvent, and the holders of the two bonds entered into possession of the buildings in 1878 by decree of maills and duties. Rae & Clark failed to pay the proportion of feu-duty due by them during 1879, and Guthrie was unable to get payment from the heritable creditors. Guthrie did not build upon the ground which he retained, "the state of trade having been such that it would have been injudicious to do so."

Guthrie did not pay the feu-duty due to the superior at the two terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas 1879, and he was thereupon charged to do so.

This was a suspension of the charge by him and James M'Connachy, joiner in Port-Glasgow, in which they averred (statement 3) that M'Con-

The said David Guthrie is willing to be a party to such an assignation in token of his consent thereto."

The respondent answered that M'Connachy had no title or interest to insist in the application, and also that she was not bound to grant the assignation demanded on payment of the feu-duties.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the charge orderly proceeded, referring for his reasons to his note in the similar case of Hinshelwood's Trustees v. Watson, July 17, 1877.*

* NOTE BY LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK (Ordinary) in Hinshelwood's Trustees v. Watson.—(This was an action by Hinshelwood's trustees, as superiors, concluding for declarator that John Watson, the vassal, had incurred an irritancy ob non sol. can., in which defences were lodged by Mrs Imrie, a heritable creditor, who offered to purge the irritancy, but pleaded—(2) This defender is entitled, upon purging the irritancy, to receive from the pursuers an assignation in terms of the draft, No. 11 of process; at all events, she is entitled, upon purging the irritancy, to receive from them such an assignation as will give her, in regard to the property in question, a preferable claim over the ordinary creditors of John Watson for the amount paid by her to the pursuers).—"The question in this case is whether the defender, on paying the feu-duty which is in arrear, is entitled to an assignation of the pursuer's rights as superior, but on the footing that the rights of the assignee should be postponed to all rights competent to the cedent. The pursuers are willing to assign the personal debt, but they refuse to do anything more.

"In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary the pursuers are right. They are entitled to payment of the feu-duties, and, if these were paid by the vassal, they could not be required to do more than discharge them. If the vassal could not pay them, but found any other person who was willing to pay them for him, the result, it is thought, would be the same, except that the superiors might be bound to assign the personal debt. The pursuers could not, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, be required to allow the feu-duties to remain as a charge on the feu, which would be the consequence of assigning them. They are entitled to have the subject clear of all past duties. This, indeed, seems to be a consequence of their right to irritate the feu. If the duties are not paid, to allow them to remain as a burden on the feu, even under the declaration that the rights of the creditors are to be postponed to theirs, is not to clear the subject, and is not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, equivalent to payment of the feu-duties; and however the assignation may be expressed, it might prejudicially affect the pursuers in recovering the feu-duties that might hereafter become due in any future action which they may be forced to bring for tinsel of the feu. The superiors who are entitled to payment, which means that the feu is to be cleared of the debitum fundi created by the arrears of feu-duty, cannot, it is thought, be embarrassed by any question which might arise by allowing the burden to continue.

"The defender has an equitable right to purge the irritancy which has been

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) There was a distinction between the case of Guthrie and M'Connachy, the latter being a complete stranger. Payment by Guthrie in his own name might operate as a total extinction of the debt confusione. But, in offering payment, both were in the position of cautioners, and therefore entitled to an assignation apart from the question of prejudice.¹ For instance, a cautioner paying for a tenant was entitled to the landlord's right of hypothec—Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, ii. 159. In using the landlord's hypothec there was necessarily prejudice to the landlord by the sale of the invecta et illata. What was asked was an assignation to the superior's rights over the land disposed to Rae & Clark only. The debt was truly one paid by Guthrie, for Rae & Clark, the owners of the ground. The superior could instruct no prejudice. The Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4, sub-sec. 2, recognised the right claimed.

v. Smith.

Argued for the respondent;—What was asked was an assignation to the whole amount of the feu-duty. A poiding of the ground would follow if such a right were given, and the superior would be prejudiced thereby;² at least, the granting of the assignation would cause confusion, which was enough to throw a heavy onus on the complainers to shew no prejudice. On the feu-contract, the original vassal remained the proper debtor on his part of the feu, which was also liable for the whole feu-duty. He was bound, until he obtained the benefit of sec. 8 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. Sec. 4, sub-sec. 2, merely dispensed with previous formalities; it did not alter the right. This was not a case of a cautioner; it was that of a co-obligant.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this suspension is one of some novelty and importance in the law of superior and vassal. One of the suspenders, Mr Guthrie, has been charged to make payment of certain arrears of feu-duty, under a feu-contract executed in 1875, by which a certain urban subject was feued to him by the respondent, Mrs Smith, and he seeks suspension upon the ground that payment of this feu-duty has been tendered to the superior, by a third party on his behalf, accompanied, however, with a demand for an assignation in favour of that third party, not only of the personal debt due by the vassal, but also of the security which the superior has for enforcing that debt, under certain qualifications to the effect that the superior's rights are to be preferable to the rights of the assignee. The superior has refused to grant the special assignation, or to receive payment of the feu-duty upon condition of granting such an assignation.

The feu-contract among other provisions declares that the feuar and his fore-saids are to be obliged to erect along the whole extent of the north, east, south incurred, but, for the reasons before stated, she cannot, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, require an assignation of the feu-duties.

"The defender endeavoured to assimilate the case to that of a cautioner who pays rent, and who has right to an assignation of the landlord's hypothec. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary the cases are not parallel. As a general rule the cautioner is entitled to an assignation of all the securities which the creditor holds for the debt, and in obtaining an assignation he obtains no more than an assignation to a security which the landlord would himself exhaust in recovering payment of the rent."

and west building lines of the piece of ground thereby feued, tenements of dwelling-houses of a certain specified description, and then there comes a declaration that in case the feuar or his foresaids "shall sell or dispone parts or portions of the said piece of ground, then the annual feu-duty of such parts or portions shall correspond and bear the same proportion to the total feu-duty after stipulated that the portion of ground so sold or disposed bears to the whole of said piece of ground hereby feued." And it provides that "the said first party," that is, the superior, "shall not be bound to admit of the said subdivision of the feu-duty until there shall be built upon each separate portion of the said piece of ground sold, as well as upon that retained, buildings of the description above mentioned, and yielding a yearly rent equal to at least double of the feu-duty effeiring to such portion of the said piece of ground sold and that retained." And farther on there is this declaration, that in the event of the feuar "selling or disposing the piece of ground above disposed, or any part or portion thereof, the foregoing personal obligation for payment of the feu-duty, interest, and penalties, shall only subsist against him, and his heirs and executors, until buildings shall be erected on the said piece of ground, or the part or parts thereof so sold or disposed, and on that retained, in terms of the obligation and conditions to that effect before written."

Now, the effect of these provisions, taken together, seems to me to be simply this: If the feuar sells off a portion of the ground, then he is to have the feu-duty apportioned by the superior, so that each portion of the ground held by a separate proprietor shall bear its share of the feu-duty. But that is subject to this condition, that there is to be no such division, and no relief of the feuar from his personal obligation to pay the entire feu-duty stipulated for in this contract until buildings shall be erected of the requisite value and character, not only upon the part of the ground sold off, but also upon the part retained by the feuar. And it is admitted, in point of fact, that upon the part retained by the complainer, Mr Guthrie, no such buildings have been erected, and plainly there can be no division or apportionment of the feu-duty, and no relief in favour of Mr Guthrie, of the personal obligation for the whole feu-duty.

Now, in these circumstances, we must look at what the complainer says in his third statement of facts—[quoted above.]

The question is whether the complainers are entitled to make a demand for the assignation asked for in that statement as a condition of paying this money. A distinction was at first attempted to be made between the position of M'Connachy and the position of Guthrie, the vassal in the feu-contract, but I rather understood at the close of the argument that any attempt at such a distinction was abandoned, and that the case must be taken very much in the same way as if the vassal himself were making this demand upon condition of paying his feu-duty to the superior. I cannot understand for myself how any interposed person like M'Connachy could be in any better situation in that respect than the debtor would have been in to make a demand like this, and the question is whether the superior is bound to grant the assignation thus demanded. The effect of the assignation undoubtedly would be that in so far as regards the amount of the feu-duties paid to the superior under this arrangement they would continue to be a debitum fundi upon the lands of the feuar instead of being discharged and extinguished. That, I think, would be the inevitable consequence in ordinary circumstances, and certainly the vassal under a feu-contract is not entitled to demand anything in return for payment of his feu-duty except a simple discharge. The vassal in this case has placed himself in a very awkward position, because he has sold off portions of the feu in such circumstances as disentitle him in terms of the feu-contract from obtaining any division or apportionment of the feu-duty between the portion retained and the portion sold, that is, by reason of his being unable to fulfil his obligation under the feu-contract to build upon the whole ground feued. The consequence of this is that his disponees in the portion sold have conveyed the subject in security of debt, and the vassal, Mr Guthrie, is not in a condition to obtain relief from these insolvent persons, or from their heritable creditors, of any portion of the entire feu-duty which he is bound to pay to the superior. It does not appear to me that the embarrassment in which the feuar has placed himself by his own fault should be visited in any degree upon the superior. She has nothing to do with that sale, and is not bound to give effect to it by apportioning the feu-duty until the condition of the feu-contract is fulfilled.

Now, regarding the building there is no fault on the part of the superior. The fault is entirely on the part of the vassal; and it is in these circumstances that he makes this anomalous demand, for certainly it is anomalous, and, so far as I know, perfectly unprecedented, that a superior in discharge of a feu-duty shall grant an assignation to the vassal of his rights and remedies against the lands. I think the plain answer that the superior makes to that, and the one that carries conviction with it to my mind, is that it is an obvious disadvantage to the superior that any debitum fundi shall subsist upon the ground, and I have not heard it answered.

There have been various speculations as to how that would work practically hereafter. It has been said that the complainers are willing to insert in the assignation a clause that it is granted without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the superior for future feu-duties. That may be, but the superior says, with great cogency and force—I got this feu-contract which is the constitution of the rights and liabilities of two parties, superior and vassal, in relation to one another, and that, and that only, is the deed which regulates our rights and liabilities, and fixes them. The only debitum fundi in this feu was to be a debitum fundi belonging to the superior, and she refuses her consent to the creation of any other debitum fundi, or the reservation of a debitum fundi, and in so far as she is concerned she is entitled to have her feu-duty paid by her vassal in terms of the obligations in the feu-contract, and discharged, not kept up as a debitum fundi in the subject by an assignation. That, I think, is a final and conclusive answer to any such demand as is here made by the complainers.

No doubt a party paying a debt in ordinary circumstances is entitled to ask for an assignation to the creditor's rights and remedies against the debtor, provided it can be shewn clearly that no prejudice of any kind can be done to the rights of the creditor granting the assignation; and it always lies upon the party asking that assignation to shew that such prejudice will not and cannot be done, and that, I think, he has entirely failed to shew in the present case, and therefore I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAS.—I do not think it necessary to say more than this: From my early study of authoritative writers on the feudal law I derived it as a principle more than fifty years ago that a superior getting payment of his feu-duty from a third party, a party not in possession of the lands, is not bound to grant an assignation. I do not mean to travel over the grounds of that opinion. No case or authority has been referred to to shake me in it. This may not be enough for others, but is enough for me. It is said the party here offers to bind himself not to use the assignation in competition with the superior. But who is to judge whether the use made of it is in competition with the superior or not? That question might of itself lead to a law-suit or repeated law-suits. The superior is not bound to submit to the risk of such inconvenient questions. Must there be a list of actions to which the usual rule shall not apply, that an assignee may pursue in name of his cedent? In short, the contention of the proposed assignee is full of embarrassment. I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. I have no hesitation in applying the law as I have stated it to the circumstances of this case.

LORD MURE.—It appears to me that the Lord Ordinary's judgment in this case proceeds upon sound views of the law. The grounds of his Lordship's judgment are not fully stated in his note, but parties have been referred to a note appended to his interlocutor in another case in which he decided the same question, and in which the grounds on which he proceeded are thus stated—The pursuers (that is, the superior) cannot "be required to allow the feu-duties to remain as a charge on the feu, which would be the consequence of assigning them. They are entitled to have the subject clear of all past duties. This indeed seems to be a consequence of their right to irritate the feu. If the duties are not paid, to allow them to remain as a burden on the feu, even under the declaration that the rights of the creditors are to be postponed to theirs, is not to clear the subject, and is not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, equivalent to payment of the feu-duties; and however the assignation may be expressed, it might prejudicially affect the pursuers in recovering the feu-duties that might hereafter become due in any future action which they may be forced to bring for tinsel of the feus. The superiors who are entitled to payment, which means that the feu is to be cleared of the debitum fundi created by the arrears of feu-duty, cannot, it is thought, be embarrassed by any question which might arise by allowing the burden to continue."

This reasoning appears to be based upon the law as laid down by the institutional writers, and in decided cases. Mr Erskine says (iii. 5, 11), "that no creditor can be compelled to assign a right to his own prejudice. Hence though a creditor who has got a pledge from his debtor in security of his debt may be forced to transmit his right of pledge to the cautioner upon payment made by him of the debt; yet if the creditor hath the same individual subject impignorated to him in security also of another debt, in which the cautioner is not bound, equity will not compel him to transfer it, and thereby run the hazard of losing the other debt, unless the cautioner shall likewise pay off that debt for which he did not interpose his credit."

That doctrine is, I think, applicable to the present case, and we have here only to consider whether there would be any hazard to the superior by his granting this assignation. The Lord Ordinary has explained that by so doing he will run the risk of bringing in another creditor in competition with himself in a question of recovering the feu-duties that may hereafter become due. The rule to that effect seems to have been applied in many cases, although, as Lord Deas has remarked, there may have been no actual judgment upon the point in a question with a superior. But there have been cases of a third party paying rent to a landlord and claiming an assignation of the landlord's right of hypothec.

There is an old case of A v. B, decided in 1744, M. 6228, where it was held that a landlord was not in such a case bound to assign, but only to discharge on payment; and in the case of Graham v. Gordon, March 9, 1842, 4 D. 903, this Court held that it had been decided by the House of Lords in a previous branch of the same case (3d May 1841, 2 Robinson, 251), that a landlord was not bound to assign a sequestration of his tenant's crop and stock to a third party paying the rent. I therefore concur with the views your Lordships have expressed.

v. Smith.

LORD SHAND.—I take a different view of this question, and am unable to agree with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary in the decision arrived at. I think that in the circumstances in which the vassal, Mr Guthrie, was placed, he was entitled to the assignation he asked, guarded, as it was, by the offer to accept it "always under reservation of and without prejudice to the superior's rights, remedies, and securities for making effectual and recovering all other feu-duties due and to become due to her."

It is admitted that the complainer, M'Connachy, interposed merely as a friend or nominee of the complainer Guthrie. It was explained that M'Connachy's name was put forward as that of a third party by way of precaution in case a payment by Guthrie in his own name on an assignation by the superior might operate as a total extinction of the debt confusione, so that no part of it could be recovered from Guthrie's disponees, or by diligence against the rents due to them. This view appears to be unsound. I take the case on the footing on which it has been presented and argued by the suspenders' counsel, viz., that while the complainer Guthrie is willing to pay the total feu-duty of £235, 5s. 6d., thereby discharging the debt in a question with the respondent, he maintains his right to an assignation of the superior's rights and remedies for recovery of the sum of £140, 13s., being the proportion of the cumulo feu-duty for which his disponees are liable, and which is properly chargeable against the property belonging to them.

The matter in dispute is one of some general importance, for although in this case the controversy arises under the special provisions of the deed, the same question may frequently arise in cases where an original feuar having no express power to allocate a feu-duty has conveyed away part of the property, and is afterwards obliged to pay the total feu-duty, or in other cases where a feuar having for a time failed to avail himself of the provisions of section 8 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 has been required to pay the total feu-duty to the superior.

The complainer Guthrie has an obvious and material interest to obtain the assignation he demands. His disponees are bankrupt, and a mere personal claim for payment of the feu-duty is of little value. The property is in the possession of heritable creditors who have obtained decree of mails and duties in virtue of heritable securities granted by the bankrupts. The right of the superior to the feu-duty is of course preferable to the heritable securities granted by the bankrupts, and should the complainer obtain the assignation he claims he may by diligence secure payment out of the first rents. If, however, the assignation be not granted, the complainer will not only be deprived of the means of making his claim for relief of the feu-duty effectual, but the benefit will accrue to the heritable creditors, who will draw the rents of the property, getting rid of the feu-duty to the superior, which in ordinary circumstances is a charge prior to all other securities, and which, in this instance, they must have known to be a burden to be met in ordinary course before the rents could be available to them, and payment of which could be enforced by the superior by means of diligence against the subjects.

The original feu-disposition granted in this case was one for building purposes, and in its terms recognised the right of the vassal in the execution of these purposes to grant rights by conveyances to others who, by virtue of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, must, by the act of registering the conveyance in their favour in the Register of Sasines, become entered vassals of the superior. There is a provision in the original feu-right directly to the effect that in case the feuar shall sell parts or portions of the ground, then the annual feu-duty of such parts or portions shall correspond and bear the same proportion to the total feu-duty stipulated that the portion of ground sold bears to the whole of the ground thereby feued. It is admitted that in the conveyance which the vassal Guthrie granted in favour of the parties now bankrupt the correct proportion of feu-duty was allocated on the part of the property conveyed. The total feu-duty being £235 odds, the feu-duty on the part conveyed was fixed at £140, leaving the original vassal debtor, so far as his own property was concerned, in £94 only. It is quite true that the original vassal, in a question between him and the superior, still remains liable for the whole feu-duty, and will do so until he erects buildings on the part of the property he retains, and it may be also till he records a memorandum of allocation in terms of section 8 of the statute. But while he is primary obligant for the whole, he has a right of relief for the greater part of the feu-duty against those who have taken a disposition from him, and who are now to all effects the owners of that part of the property conveyed. The superior has a co-obligant for his feu-duty. He has the original vassal bound to him for the whole, and he has also the disponees who took the conveyance bound for the whole feu-duty, or at least for the annual sum of £140, for immediately upon infestment being taken on the conveyance there was an entry creating the relation of superior and vassal between these parties. He is entitled to make good his feu-duty from the rents of any part of the property feued. That being so, it appears to me that the case is one in which the complainer Guthrie has right, on payment of the whole feu-duty, to an assignation of the superior's remedies for recovery of that part of the feu-duty which is the proper burden of the part of the property no longer belonging to him, provided always, I quite admit, that the superior shall not be thereby prejudiced.

It has been said that the law is that a superior is never bound to assign a right to his feu-duty. I know of no authority to warrant that statement, and I do not agree in thinking that the practice of granting assignations in circumstances like the present has not been followed. In the ordinary case where a vassal simply pays his own debt, without having a right of relief of a proportion of the feu-duty, I agree that an assignation cannot be demanded, and that as in the case of a sequestration for rent, even if a third party should interpose and pay the debt, the superior is not bound to grant an assignation which would keep up the real security on the property. In such cases I agree also that there could be no practice of granting assignations. But on a principle of general application I think the case is different and the rule is different, where, as here, the debtor has a right of relief, and is one of two obligants liable for the debt. There is nothing in the relation of a superior which places him in an exceptional position, and exempts him from the operation of the ordinary rules of law which apply between creditors and their debtors bound as co-obligants, or as principal and surety.

The ordinary rule is stated in Bell's Principles, section 552, "Payment made by one interested in the debt (as co-obligant or surety) will take away the right of the creditor, but will not extinguish the debt of the principal obligant. The person so paying is entitled to an assignation to the effect of operating his relief." The right to an assignation which will carry the creditor's rights and remedies is based on equity, but is effectual and has always been recognised by the law. The creditor getting payment of his debt has no farther interest, while the surety or co-obligant may be in the position, as in the present case, that unless he acquires the creditor's rights and remedies his right of relief would be of little or no value. The right is always qualified by this (as stated by Bell, section 557), that the assignation demanded shall not prejudice the creditor, or, as it is expressed by Professor Bell, that it "shall not interfere with any other interest of the creditor."

I take it, therefore, that the respondent, as superior, is bound to grant the assignation in this case, unless it can be shewn that the deed, qualified by the broad reservation proposed as part of it, would in some way be to her prejudice, and indeed I rather understand that your Lordships, or at least a majority of your Lordships, do not differ from this view.

Now, for my part, I see no possible prejudice the superior can suffer by this assignation, and this is my ground of judgment. What is the prejudice? It is said to be that the assignation which is asked only to the extent of the portion of the feu-duty payable by the disponees of the original vassal may prejudicially affect the superior in the recovery of feu-duties to become due hereafter. It is explained, on the other hand, that this assignation is simply to enable the complainer by real diligence, which shall be preferable to the bondholders in possession, to obtain relief of the amount due by the vassal's disponee, and it is conceded that no such diligence would be competent or could be used which it could be shewn would in any way compete with the superior in following out his remedies for payment of future feu-duties. It is said that unless this feu-duty is entirely extinguished the part of it assigned will remain as a debitum fundi. I fail to understand what prejudice the superior will suffer, for, while a debitum fundi in a question between the complainer and his disponees, it will not remain a debitum fundi in a question with the superior. If it can be represented as remaining a debitum fundi at all in a question with the superior, it must be in name only and not in substance, for the assignation asked is always under reservation and "without prejudice to the superior's rights, remedies, and securities for making effectual and recovering all other feu-duties due and to become due" to her. The effect of this provision certainly is that if diligence of any kind done by authority of the assignation should in any way come into competition with proceedings by the superior for recovery of future feu-duties, it must undoubtedly be stopped.

The Lord Ordinary has explained what appears to him would be the prejudice which the superior would suffer. He says—"However the assignation may be expressed it might prejudicially affect the pursuers in recovering the feu-duties that might hereafter become due in any future action which they may be forced to bring for tinsel of the feu." It appears to me that that is not so. If any future action were brought for tinsel of the feu it would be because the future feu-duties had got into arrear for two years. In such an action the superior would be entitled to decree of forfeiture of the feu, which would be the remedy he asked, unless payment of the arrears were at once made, and the proposed assignation could not in any way interfere with that remedy. The real diligence to which the superior might resort is to enter on possession by an action of mails and duties, and there again the assignation could not possibly be a bar to the superior's proceedings. The only other remedy would be by personal action against the disponees, and it cannot be disputed that even without the assignation the complainer has the same remedy for recovery of the part of the feu-duty for which these disponees are liable. The Lord Ordinary says farther, after the passage I have already read—"The superiors, who are entitled to payment, which means that the feu is to be cleared of the debitum fundi created by the arrears of feu-duty, cannot, it is thought, be embarrassed by any question which might arise by allowing the burden to continue." As I have already said, the debitum fundi would have no real existence in a question with the superior; and as to any embarrassment which might arise, I can only say that I do not understand what is here referred to. I do not see what embarrassment could arise with an assignation in the terms asked, and the counsel for the respondent were, I think, unable to suggest any embarrassment which could arise to the prejudice of their client. It therefore appears to me that the complainer, Mr Guthrie, on payment of the total feu-duty, is entitled to have an assignation in the terms asked.

I am fortified in the view I take of the question in dispute by the provisions of sub-section 2 of section 4 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. By that sub-section it is provided that if a party in right of a property held in feu conveys the property to another, the disponee by taking infestment upon his disposition becomes liable for the feu-duty payable for the property. But there is a provision at the same time that until the original vassal gives notice of the conveyance to the superior he shall remain liable also for the feu-duty. That is substantially the position of the parties in this case. The statute provides that the superior's remedies against the former vassal shall be "without prejudice to the superior having all his remedies against the entered proprietor under the entry implied by this Act, and without prejudice also to the right of the proprietor last entered in the lands and his foreshaids to recover from the entered proprietor of the lands all feu-duties which such proprietor last entered in the lands or his foreshaids may have had to pay in consequence of any failure or omission to give such notice; and for this purpose all the remedies competent to the superior for recovery of the feu-duties shall by virtue of this Act be held to be assigned to the proprietor last entered in the lands, and his foreshaids, to the effect of enabling them to recover payment of any sums so paid by them as aforesaid, but that always under reservation of and without prejudice to the superior's rights, remedies, and securities for making effectual and recovering all other feu-duties due and to become due to him." Now, it appears to me that the statute recognises the existence of a right in equity to an assignation such as is here demanded in circumstances substantially the same. It not only recognises that right, but gives effect to it in a remarkable way, for it renders any deed of assignation by the superior unnecessary. Assuming the existence of the right to an assignation in circumstances like those which occur in this case, by the force of the statute an assignation is implied in favour of the party paying the feu-duty, which will enable him to use all the superior's remedies, but that under reservation of and without prejudice to the superior's rights and remedies for future feu-duties in the very terms proposed by the complainer in this case. This provision appears to me simply to give effect to the principles of common law, with this difference only, that it provides that a deed of assignation shall not be necessary now, as the statute itself operates as an assignation. No. 33.

I have only to add that the case of Graham v. Gordon, and the other authorities of that class referred to, appear to me to have no application, because there the payment was offered, not by a co-obligant or surety having a right of relief giving him an equitable right to an assignation. The only object for which the assignation was asked in the case of Graham v. Gordon was to keep up the whole debt, so that it might still come into competition with the landlord's future claims and diligence, and there was no reservation offered as in this case which would secure the landlord against injury or prejudice. Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Mode of voting for winding up by deed of arrangement—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 35, 38, and 101.—In a sequestration the claimants who vote at a meeting under the 35th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, for a winding up by deed of arrangement must support their claims by affidavits and vouchers, as in the election of a trustee, and no one is entitled to have his vote reckoned in number whose claim does not amount to £20.

THE estates of the deceased William Ireland, hardware merchant, Dundee, were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire on 29th April 1880. 1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
C.

At the meeting appointed to be held for the election of a trustee, upon 8th May following, it was resolved by a majority in number and four-fifths in value of the creditors present or represented at such meeting that the estate should be wound up under a deed of arrangement, and that an application should be presented to the Sheriff to sist proceedings in the sequestration for a period not exceeding two months, in terms of sec. 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.* The sist was accordingly granted, there being no opposition.

After intimation of the production of the deed of arrangement to the non-concurring creditors, several of them, including the North of Scotland Banking Company, lodged objections, stating that the proposed deed was not "reasonable" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, sec. 38, and that the claims of some of the creditors who had voted at the first meeting were unvouched, and their grounds of debt invalid.

Objections were taken to these claims:—(1) For £43, 7s. 6d. by William Thoms, mason, for cash advanced in loan on 26th May 1871, with interest; (2) for £53, 10s. 3d. by John Ireland for cash lent on same day, with interest; and (3) for £53, 0s. 1d. by John Duff, for cash advanced on 23d

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 35, provides,—“At a meeting for the election of the trustee, or at any subsequent meeting to be called for the purpose, a majority in number and four-fifths in value of the creditors present or represented at such meeting may resolve that the estate ought to be wound up under a deed of arrangement, and that an application should be presented to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff to sist procedure in the sequestration for a period not exceeding two months, and on such resolution being carried it shall not be necessary to elect a trustee.”

No. 34 September 1873, with interest. No vouchers for these were produced, and the petitioners contended that they fell to be disallowed. If that were
 Nov. 20, 1880. so, it would bring the majority in number of the creditors below four-fifths, which was required by section 38 of the statute for subscription to North of Scotland Banking Co. v. Ireland. such a deed of arrangement.*

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) refused to approve of the deed of arrangement, and appointed a meeting for election of a trustee.†

John Ireland appealed to the Court of Session, and argued that as the claimants in question had lodged affidavits they were entitled to vote without question at the meeting for the election of a trustee. Further, claims under £20 ought to be taken into account in estimating the number of creditors for voting purposes.‡

The respondents were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Two points are raised in this appeal. The first is, that in computing the number of creditors who have signed the deed of arrangement the claims of John Duff, John Ireland, and William Thoms have been disallowed, and that that having been done the number is under the four-fifths in number and value required by the statute. Now, as I understand the contention of the appellant, it amounts to this, that any one who lodges an affidavit, and whose name is given up by the bankrupt, is entitled to vote under the 35th section of the statute and to sign the deed of arrangement—at any rate to do the latter. That seems a very extravagant contention. The meeting at which such a resolution to wind up under a deed of arrangement may be brought forward is that for the election of a trustee, and the creditors assembled for that purpose may, if they see fit, resolve to wind up by a deed of arrangement. The procedure must surely be the same in the one case as in the other.

* Sec. 38.—“If the sequestration shall be sisted, the creditors may at any time within the period of such sist produce to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff a deed of arrangement subscribed by or by authority of four-fifths in number and value of the creditors of the bankrupt, and the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff may consider the same and make such intimation thereof as he may think proper, and hear parties having interest, and make any inquiry he may think necessary. . . .”

† “NOTE.—The objection which I have found it impossible to get over relates to the claims of John Duff, John Ireland, and William Thoms. These claims were all for loans of money, alleged to have been made to the bankrupt years before his death, but it was conceded that in none of the cases was there any writing, either of the bankrupt or of the executrix, tending to instruct the loan, and also that in none of them has any interest ever been paid. It may be that on fuller investigation the trustee may see his way to admit them as good claims against the estate, but in the circumstances above stated I am not satisfied as to their validity, and I must therefore strike them out of the computation; but the result of doing so is to bring the majority, so far as the creditors entitled to be reckoned in number are concerned, below the statutory four-fifths, for the remanent subscribers of such creditors (i.e. creditors having debts above £20) are only ten out of fourteen; and this being so, it follows—assuming that I am right in throwing the claims in question out of view—that I must decline to approve the deed of arrangement, and allow the sequestration to take its natural course.”

‡ The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 101, provides,—“All questions at any meeting of creditors shall be determined by the majority in value of those present and entitled to vote, unless in the cases herein otherwise provided for; and when, for the purpose of voting, the creditors are required to be counted in number, no creditor whose debt is under £20 shall be reckoned in number, but his debt shall be computed in value.”

Those who are entitled to vote at the election of a trustee are certainly not creditors who merely lodge their affidavits, but those who accompany these affidavits with the grounds of their respective claims. The claims in this case are as thoroughly unvouched as it is possible to imagine. They are claims for borrowed money, borrowed too at a period long before the death of the bankrupt, on which no interest has been paid, and of which no vouchers have been produced. It is settled law that a loan of money cannot be proved without writing, and if there had been any writing it surely would have been produced. It is clear that these gentlemen cannot vote, and cannot rank upon the estate,—in short that they have no interest in the sequestration unless they produce proof in support of these alleged loans. To allow such creditors to take part in the proceedings as belonging to the general body of creditors would just be to give to the bankrupt the power of regulating his own sequestration.

With regard to the other point which has been raised, I am equally clear. The 101st section of the Act of 1856 enacts that only those creditors whose debts are not under £20 shall be entitled to vote, when for the purpose of voting the creditors are required to be counted in number. Under the interpretation clause "vote" means not only voting at a meeting but includes a "consent to any offer of composition and to a discharge of the debtor, and also a dissent from such offer or discharge." Now, confessedly, this proposed deed of arrangement is a contract of composition; it is an offer upon the one side and an acceptance upon the other in the form of a deed of arrangement. That is "voting" within the meaning of the Act.

I think this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—It appears to me that the procedure here applicable is to be gathered without difficulty from sections 35 and 38 of the statute. Section 35 provides—(reads as above). By that section the creditors present or represented at the meeting who are entitled to vote, with the result of sisting proceedings in view of the preparation of a deed of arrangement, must be duly qualified to vote by having claims on the estate supported by affidavit and by the necessary vouchers. The right to vote at this meeting depends on the same considerations as the right to vote in the election of a trustee.

But assuming that creditors to the requisite extent in number and value have procured a sist, the next matter is the deed of arrangement. There is no meeting of creditors necessary for the purpose of sanctioning or adopting such a deed. The creditors sign the deed severally, and then it is produced to the Sheriff. When that takes place, the Sheriff has very wide powers as to what may be done. Section 38 provides—(reads as above). Now, I do not say or think that in the ordinary case it is necessary to produce with the deed of arrangement affidavits and claims by the persons signing it. When the Sheriff, on the evidence before him, including the bankrupt's state of affairs, shewing who are, according to his statement, the creditors, is satisfied, and there is no opposition, I think there would be no need of affidavits and claims. But it was obviously intended by the Legislature, and it is, I believe, the present practice, that the Sheriff shall order intimation to non-concurring creditors, and if they enter appearance, and opposition is made, inquiry is necessary, and the production of the affidavits and claims and vouchers, so far as necessary, may be required.

Assuming that to be the course of procedure, what is the case here? The creditors, whose concurrence in the deed of arrangement is objected to, after having had an opportunity, cannot shew that they have the necessary vouchers or other evidence requisite to support their alleged claims, and accordingly their votes have been disallowed. If they were in a position to produce satisfactory evidence in support of their claims they would still be in time to maintain the validity of their concurrence in the deed of arrangement; but it is admitted that they are not in a position to instruct their claims by the evidence which is necessary to give them a voice in the question, or, indeed, in any matter to be determined by the votes of the creditors in the sequestration.

Then the appellant contends that creditors under £20 in value are to be counted in the number of the votes. That is an extraordinary view with reference to the acceptance of a composition, which this arrangement really is. The spirit and the letter of the statute alike shew that in order to a person having his vote counted his debt must be greater than £20.

I think the Sheriff-substitute's judgment was quite right.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—
Lord-Adv. M'Laren—Rutherford.

Revenue—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 97)—Discharge (on redemption) of feu-duty.—By feu-contract, which had been duly stamped with the ad valorem duty chargeable at its date in respect of the feu-duty, the vassal was bound to pay an annual feu-duty of £500, but it was provided that it should be in his power at any time to redeem the said feu-duty, or any part thereof, at the rate of twenty years' purchase, and that he should be bound, if required, to redeem the feu-duty at the said rate to the extent of at least £200, £100 within five years and another £100 within ten years from the term of entry under the feu-contract.

Held that the discharge granted by the superior in respect of the redemption of the feu-duty to the extent of £100 under the above obligation was chargeable with the duty imposed in the schedule appended to the Stamp Act, 1870, upon a "Release or Renunciation" of any right or interest in any property in any other case than "upon a sale," or "by way of security," viz, 10s., and not with the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty.

2D DIVISION.

I.

By feu-contract dated 14th, 15th, and 17th January 1870, William Gibb acquired from Francis Edmond, trustee on the sequestrated estate of Sir Alexander Anderson of Blelack, certain lands in consideration of a yearly feu-duty of £500 per annum.

The feu-contract was stamped with the leading duty of £30, being the amount of the ad valorem duty chargeable under the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 83 (the Stamp Act then in force), in respect of a Charter, Disposition, or Contract containing the first original constitution of a Feu Right in Scotland.

There was contained in the feu-contract the following provision:—

"And it is hereby expressly provided and declared that it shall be in the power of the said William Gibb and his foresaids at any time to redeem the said feu-duty, or any part thereof, at the rate of twenty years' purchase, but the said William Gibb hereby binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, within five years from the said term of entry, if so required, to redeem the said feu-duty to the extent of at least £100 sterling of feu-duty at the said rate, and within ten years from the said term of entry to redeem the said feu-duty to the extent of at least another £100 of feu-duty, making together £200 of feu-duty at the said rate, which feu-duty of £500 and which conditions as to the redemption thereof to the extent of at least £200 within the respective periods above mentioned shall be real burdens affecting the said piece of ground hereby disposed.

Gibb v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

In virtue of this provision William Gibb was called on in 1875 to redeem the first £100 of feu-duty, and did so by payment of the capital sum of £2000. In 1880 he was called upon to redeem the feu-duty to the extent of at least another £100, and accordingly made payment of the further sum of £2000, being the redemption price of the said feu-duty to that extent. Thereupon the superiors granted him a discharge of the feu-duty to the extent of £100, and declared the lands to be disburdened to that extent of the real burden created by the feu-contract.

When this discharge was presented to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to have the stamp-duty chargeable adjudicated upon, the Commissioners assessed the stamp-duty at £10, being the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty payable under the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 97) (the Stamp Act then in force), in respect of the sum of £2000, being the redemption price of the feu-duty to the extent of £100.

William Gibb thereupon paid the stamp-duty so assessed, and having declared himself dissatisfied with the determination of the Commissioners on the ground that the duty payable was not the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty, but the duty payable in terms of the schedule appended to the Stamp Act, 1870, either (1) under the head "MORTGAGE," &c., sub-section 4, "Reconveyance, Release," &c., viz., at 6d. for every £100, . . . 10s. or (2) under the head "RELEASE OR RENUNCIATION of any property," &c. in any other case than upon a sale or by way of security, . . . 10s. or (3) under the head "DEED of any kind whatsoever, not described in this schedule," . . . 10s.

he required the Commissioners to state a case for appeal to the Court of Exchequer under the 19th section of the Stamp Act, 1870.

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether the said instrument is liable to be assessed and charged with the said ad valorem conveyance on sale stamp-duty, in terms of the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97; or, if not, what other stamp-duty it is liable to be assessed and charged with."*

* The Stamp Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 97, contains the following provisions bearing on the question submitted in this case:—

Section 3. "From and after the commencement of this Act, and subject to the exemptions contained in the schedule to this Act, and in any other Acts for the time being in force, there shall be charged for the use of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, upon the several instruments specified in the schedule to this Act, the several duties in the said schedule specified, and no other duties."

Section 70. "The term 'Conveyance on Sale' includes every instrument and every decree or order of any Court or of any Commissioners, whereby any property upon the sale thereof is legally or equitably transferred to or vested in the purchaser or any other person on his behalf or by his direction."

Section 73. "Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, such debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the

Inland Revenue.

It was maintained on behalf of the appellant that the judgment of the Court in the case of Belch v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Feb. 24, 1877, ante, vol. iv. p. 592, with reference to the discharge on redemption of a ground-annual under a power to redeem ruled the present case of a discharge on redemption of a feu-duty, under an obligation as well as a power to redeem.

It was argued for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that there was a distinction between the present case and that of Belch, in respect that here there was a separation of the feudal estate, and that the effect of the discharge in question was really the conveyance of an estate of superiority to the value of £100 a-year from the superior to the vassal for a price paid, and that it was therefore as much a conveyance on sale as if it had been a conveyance of the same subject to a singular successor in the superiority.

LORD GIFFORD.—This is a case bringing up a general point of some practical importance which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue wish to have determined. It was contended that there was a distinction between the present case and that of Belch, and that the decision in the case of Belch does not apply to the circumstances of the present case. It was urged that this is a case of redeeming a feu-duty, and that different principles rule the cases of ground-annuals and of proper feu-duties, which last constitute a separate feudal estate. Now, I am not able to draw any distinction between this case and the case of Belch. No doubt, feudally speaking, in the case of a feu, there is a dominium directum and a dominium utile—there is a proper separation of estates, which does not occur in the case of a ground-annual, which is more of the nature of a burden. But in reality this does not affect the present question as to the proper stamp required for the instrument. The release of a ground-annual is, so far as it goes, the release of a burden, and the release of a feu-duty or of part thereof (the two estates remaining as before) is no more. In the one case the feu-duty is restricted or taken away altogether, in the other a burden is restricted or taken away. I think they both fall under the same principle; and the reason of the rule is the same. It is quite plain that this piece of ground, laid out for feuing purposes, was sold for a price; and it does not make any difference whether the price was to be paid down or stated as a feu-duty calculated at a percentage of what would otherwise have been the price. Here the superior stipulates that he shall get part of the price in money within a certain number of years. £100 of the feu-duty is to be redeemed in five years, and another £100 within other five years. That in substance is just a stipulation for payment of the price, and though the vassal pays the price instead of continuing to pay the interest or feu-duty the transaction is not a transaction of sale properly so called. It is all embraced in and provided for, and is really a part of the original transaction (as your Lordship observed in Belch's case), and it is solely in virtue of the original agreement that the vassal now redeems the feu-duty, which is just the interest of the price, by paying off a part of the capital. I think that is a proper case for Release, Renunciation, or Discharge, not upon a sale or by way of security, but that it falls under the heading in the schedule, "in any other case, ten shillings."

In the present case the superior expressly stipulated that part of the feu-duty should be redeemed by the vassal at the dates specified. This just means that part of the original price, instead of constituting and remaining an annual burden, that is, an annual feu-duty, over the property, should be paid up and discharged at the stipulated and specified terms. The original deed or feu-contract is duly stamped with an ad valorem duty applicable to the full price or full feu-duty. Now, I think it is clear that when, in terms of the contract itself, payment is made of the price or of part thereof at a postponed term or terms, such payment is not a payment as on a sale, and does not require a new ad valorem stamp as on a price. To exact this would be to exact two ad valorem duties on the same transaction. The principle of the case of Belch clearly applies to the case before us.

I think the appeal should be sustained, and the duty fixed at ten shillings.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords of the Second Division of the Court of Session, acting as Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, having heard counsel on the case, are of opinion and find that the stamp-duty payable on the instrument in question is 10s.: Therefore ordain the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to repay to the appellant, William Gibb, the sum of £9, 10s. sterling, being the sum paid by him in excess of the said duty of 10s., and decern: Find the said Commissioners liable in payment to the appellant of the costs incurred by him in relation to the appeal, and remit to the Auditor," &c.

THE MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF FORTROSE AND OTHERS, Complainers.—Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.

JAMES MACLENNAN (Collector for the Heritors of Rosemarkie Parish).—
Kinnear—Low.

Church—Union of Parishes—Effect of Decree of Teind Commissioners in 1670 uniting “Kirks.”—In 1455 Chanonry was erected into a burgh and united with the burgh of Rosemarkie, the two being called in combination the burgh of Fortrose. There was a church in each, the cathedral church of the diocese being in Chanonry, and the parish church in Rosemarkie.

In a proceeding by “the Bishop of Ross v. the Parishioners of Rosemarkie,” the Commissioners of Teinds, after opposition, pronounced the following decree, dated 2d February 1670:—“The Lords unites the Kirks of Chanonrie and Rosemarkie, and appoints the minister of Rosemarkie and his successors to serve the cure at both kirks Sunday day about. The Lords, of consent of the Bp. of Rosse, declares the parishioners of Rosemarkie free of the support of the kirk of Chanonrie et e contra.”

In an action seeking to enforce liability upon the heritors of Chanonry for repairs of the church, manse, and other ecclesiastical buildings of Rosemarkie, held that the meaning of the decree was that, while uniting the two kirks, the heritors of the two districts were to be separately liable each for the support of their own church, viz., the heritors of Chanonry for support of the cathedral church, and the heritors within Rosemarkie district for support of the parish church, and that looking to the decree and what followed upon it the heritors of Chanonry were exempt from assessment for the repairs to the church of Rosemarkie, although liable in so far as regarded the manse and other buildings.

Church—Stat. 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, sec. 8—Liability of heritors of quoad sacra parish.—Held by Lord Curriehill (Ordinary) that lands and heritages disjoined from a parish quoad sacra are not thereby freed from liability for the parochial burdens to which they were previously liable.

ST DIVISION.
d. Curriehill.
M.

THIS was a suspension of a charge given to the Magistrates and Town-Council of Fortrose and others, as owners of lands and heritages in the burgh of Fortrose or Chanonry, for payment of an assessment according to their real rents for repairs upon the church, churchyard wall, manse, and offices of the parish of Rosemarkie. They objected, on the grounds (1) that their lands were situated in the ancient parish of Chanonry, and that by a decree of the Commissioners of Teinds in 1670, by which Chanonry or Fortrose and Rosemarkie were united, the parishioners of each were exempted from the burden of supporting the church or any of the ecclesiastical buildings of the other;* (2) that assuming them to be liable with the heritors of Rosemarkie proper, the assessments had been improperly imposed upon the real rents instead of upon the valued rents of their lands; and (3) that in 1873 a quoad sacra parish of Fortrose was formed, and a separate church built in it, which fact relieved the lands and heritages thereby disjoined from the liability now sought to be imposed upon them. No. 36.

Mr Maclellan, the collector, answered that there never were two separate parishes of Chanonrie and Rosemarkie, "that the kirk of Chanonry (which was the cathedral church of the diocese of Ross, and was served personally by the bishop) was never a proper parish church, and was united with the kirk of Rosemarkie solely to the effect of ordaining the minister of Rosemarkie to officiate on alternate Sundays at the two kirks; that the decree of 1670, containing the exemption founded on, had never been acted upon to the effect of exempting the heritors of Chanonry from the proper parochial burdens effeiring to them as heritors of Rosemarkie; that the assessments on the present occasion had been properly imposed according to the real rents; and that in any view they were liable for the expenses charged for other than the portion thereof incurred in repairing the church."

They pleaded;—(1) The complainers not being heritors within the parish of Rosemarkie, or liable for the assessment made upon them as aforesaid, have been wrongously and unjustly charged, or threatened to be charged as aforesaid, and the said charges and threatened charges, as well as said decree, ought to be suspended as craved. (2) Separatim, The foresaid assessment having been improperly made, according to the real rents of the heritors instead of according to valued rent, and the same being therefore unjust, the said charges and threatened charges, as well as said decree, ought to be suspended as craved.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The complainers, being heritors within the parish of Rosemarkie, were and are liable to assessment for the expenses in question; and the parish being partly burghal and partly landward the assessment fell to be imposed in respect of the real rent. (4) The respondent being entitled to charge for the sums libelled, the note should be refused, with expenses. (5) Separatim, At least the complainers are liable for the expenses charged for other than the portion thereof incurred in repairing the church.

The burghs of Fortrose or Chanonry and Rosemarkie were situated about a mile apart, near the shore of the Moray Firth. They were united by royal charter of King James II. in 1444 under the common name of Fortrose, and that charter was afterwards confirmed by King James VI. in 1592, and again in 1612. Fortrose was often termed Chanonry, owing to the fact that the cathedral church of the bishopric of Ross, the bishop's palace, &c., were situated within its bounds. There was another church at Rosemarkie. The bishops were in use to serve the cure of the cathedral church, and to serve Rosemarkie by means of a vicar.

After a proof, the evidence in which was entirely documentary, and the purport of which sufficiently appears below, the Lord Ordinary, on 14th October 1879, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary . . . Finds (1) that the complainers have failed to prove that, before, at, or since the date of the decree of 2d February 1670, . . . there existed a parish of Chanonrie separate and distinct from the parish of Rosemarkie: Finds (2) that by the said decree whereby the kirks of Chanonrie and Rosemarkie were united, the parishioners of Rosemarkie were exempted from the support of the kirk of Chanonrie, et e contra: Finds (3) that the term 'the parishioners of Rosemarkie' in said decree included all the parishioners of the parish of Rosemarkie, except those residing or owning lands and heritages within a district immediately adjoining the old kirk of Chanonrie, including the old burgh of Fortrose, as distinguished from the old burgh of Rosemarkie, and that the persons referred to by implication in said decree as the 'parishioners of Chanonrie,' were the said old burgh of Fortrose and the owners of lands and heritages within said burgh, and the district adjoining the said old kirk as aforesaid: Finds (4) that no evidence has been adduced to shew what were the boundaries of said district in 1670: Finds (5) that in 1820, when a new church was erected at Rosemarkie, the heritors of the parish of Rosemarkie agreed that the district delineated within red lines on the plan No. 44 of process should be held to be the district exempted by the said decree of 1670 from the support of the kirk of Rosemarkie: Finds (6) that the lands of the complainers all lie within the said district, and that from 1670 to the present time no assessment in connection with the church of Rosemarkie has been exacted from the burgh of Fortrose or from the proprietors of the subjects now belonging to the complainers in respect of any lands within said district: Finds (7) that for the purposes of this action the exemption in the decree of 1670 must be held to extend to and include all the complainers in respect of lands and heritages belonging to them within the limits of said district: Therefore finds (8) that the complainers are entitled to have the charge for the present assessment, in so far as the same is imposed in respect of repairs upon the church of Rosemarkie, suspended; and before further answer as to the remainder of the assessment, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be further heard on the points specified in the latter part of the note appended hereto: Reserves all questions of expenses."*

* "NOTE.—. . . The first and most important question is, was there ever a parish of Chanonrie (or Fortrose) distinct from the parish of Rosemarkie? The complainers consider the decree of the Commissioners of Teinds of 2d February 1670 to be conclusive in favour of their contention that the parishes were distinct. The decree was pronounced in a proceeding at the instance of 'the Bishop of Ross against the parishioners of Rosemarkie.' After opposition by these parishioners, 'the Lords unites the kirks of Chanonrie and Rosemarkie, and appoints the minister of Rosemarkie and his successors to serve the cure at both kirks Sunday day about. The Lords, of consent of the Bp. of Ross, declares the parishioners of Rosemarkie free of the support of the kirk of Chanonrie, et e contra.' The complainers found upon the use of the word 'parishioners' in this decree as establishing conclusively the fact that prior to the date of the decree there were two distinct parishes, and that this was a union of parishes as well as kirks. It appears to me that the language of the decree is not inconsistent with the plea of the respondent, that there never was a separate parish of Chanonrie, and that the kirk of Chanonrie was within the parish of Rosemarkie, and was merely united with the kirk of Rosemarkie to the effect of placing both congregations under the same pastoral superintendence. It is therefore necessary to investigate the previous history of this district in order to arrive at the sound construction of the decree."

(After quoting the evidence afforded by the Origines Parochiales Scotiæ, the Scots Acts for 1639 and 1649, &c.)— "On the whole, therefore, on this branch of the case, I am of opinion that the complainers have failed to establish the existence of a separate parish of Chanonrie prior to 1670. They have not attempted to say that since that date there has been any disjunction or erection of such a parish, but they refer to sundry title-deeds between 1690 and the present time, in which lands lying both within and without the boundaries of the alleged parish of Chanonrie are described as within 'parochias de Chanonrie et Rosemarkie,' or the parish of Chanonry and Rosemarkie. But I need hardly say that such words occurring in titles granted recently after 1670 must be held as referring to the union by the decree of that year, and must be interpreted according to the true meaning of the decree.

The next question is, what is the legal effect of the decree of 1670? and

On 29th December 1879, after a further hearing, the Lord Ordinary No. 36. found that the complainers, "who are heritors of lands originally in the

with that question is closely involved this other, viz., what effect has been given to the decree in actual practice? I can see no anomaly in the union of two kirks (only one of which is a true parish church) to the effect of making both available to the whole parish, and placing them under one pastoral superintendence. It cannot now be ascertained whether during the twenty years which elapsed between the date of the decree and the final suppression of Episcopacy the decree was implemented by the minister of Rosemarkie conducting divine service in each of the united kirks on alternate Sundays. I am inclined to think that during these twenty years the duties were divided by the bishop and the minister of Rosemarkie officiating alternately in each church." (His Lordship then quoted (1) a deed of mortification by the provost of Fortrose in 1692; (2) a petition by the burgh of Fortrose in 1695 for an allocation of the rents of the bishopric of Ross to repair their kirk; (3) certain minutes of the town-council of Fortrose in 1720 and 1723, according to which the town-council appeared to have provided temporary accommodation for religious ordinances in various parts of the municipal buildings). "The magistrates of Fortrose thus clearly recognised the duty incumbent on them of supplying a suitable place of worship for the inhabitants, and to that extent, and so far as they were concerned, the decree of 1670 was fully acted upon. And this leads me to remark that I cannot but think that in point of fact the minister of Rosemarkie must have continued to supply divine ordinances on stated days, and that the piteous language of the petition to Parliament in 1695 was prompted (1) by the desire to relieve the burgh of the burden of repairing the kirk, and (2) by a feeling of wounded pride in being placed under the same pastoral superintendence as the rival though twin burgh of Rosemarkie.

"Whether or not the heritors of Rosemarkie proper had lost sight of the decree between 1730 and 1820 is not very clear. During that period various repairs on the church and manse of Rosemarkie were executed, and the expense was defrayed by an assessment upon the heritors according to their valued rent as appearing in the cess-book of Ross-shire. Several of the lands assessed lay within the bounds assigned by the complainers to the alleged old parish of Chanonrie, but none of the lands now belonging to the complainers were so assessed, and for the obvious reason that none of them were entered in the cess-book of the county. The fact, however, that no attempt was made to impose any part of the assessment upon the 'burgh of Fortrose' as a community would point to this, that the heritors were aware that whatever may have been the extent of the district exempted by the decree of 1670 the burgh was certainly included within the exemption.

"In 1820, however, a new church was erected in Rosemarkie, the assessment being imposed upon all the heritors in the whole parish according to their real rents; among the heritors assessed were sundry 'minor heritors,' as they are called, in the old burgh of Fortrose, in other words, proprietors of tenements and small subjects within the burgh, upon each of which the proportion of the assessment was comparatively small. These minor 'heritors' objected to be assessed as upon real rent, and maintained that the assessment could only legally be imposed upon the valued rent, and in the course of the discussion the old decree of 1670 came to the knowledge of the parties, after having been lost sight of for a long time. The 'minor heritors' then claimed entire exemption, the opinion of Sir John Connell was taken, and the result was that the landward heritors conceded that a certain portion of the land within the parish was entitled to exemption from assessment. The idea then was that the decree of 1670 had effected an union of parishes, not, as I think, a mere union of kirks, and the question was, what were the boundaries of the two parishes? That a certain portion of the district was exempted from assessment was undoubted; the difficulty was to decide which portion was exempted. I confess that, had the question now parish of Rosemarkie, and now disjoined from this parish, and erected into the church and parish of Fortrose quoad sacra, are liable pro rata, along with the heritors of the lands of Rosemarkie not so disjoined and erected, for the expense of repairing the manse of Rosemarkie, and the offices and garden-wall connected with the manse," &c.*

occurred for the first time, I should have been inclined to limit the exempted district to the bounds of the old burgh of Fortrose proper. But in my opinion the area of exemption was, in 1820, fixed by the parties interested, and has ever since, until the present question arose, been held to have been so fixed. That area includes all the subjects now belonging to the complainers. . . . The original boundaries of the exempted area were, in 1820, and are now, merely matters for conjecture, but I think that, after these were deliberately fixed by the main body of heritors in 1820, nearly sixty years ago, it is too late now for these heritors to attempt to curtail these limits by a process which must be as conjectural as that of 1820. I therefore think that the complainers are entitled to prevail in so far as they seek relief from the assessment for the repair of the church.

"Their claim for relief as to the churchyard wall, manse, and offices, stands in a different position. As regards the churchyard wall, I think it would be important to know whether, as matter of fact, there is a churchyard annexed to the old kirk of Chanonrie, and used and kept in order by the inhabitants of that burgh? If there be such a cemetery, then much might be said in support of the claim for exemption, in respect both of kirk and kirkyard wall.

"But as regards the assessment for manse and offices the case appears to me to be a very much more difficult one. I think it is impossible to extend the exemption to such buildings. From and after 1670, the whole parish was placed under the pastoral superintendence of one and the same minister; only one manse with offices therefore was required, and the burden of supplying these falls, in my opinion, upon the whole parishioners, i.e., heritors. It is true that hitherto the expenses have been borne by the larger heritors in proportion to their valued rents, and thus no part was thrown upon the complainers or their ancestors who had no valued rent. But as the burden is one legally effeiring to all owners of land in the parish, according to the real rents, there is a prima facie liability attaching to the complainers. As regards those of them whose properties are within the burgh it may be that not they as individuals, but the burgh as a community, is the proper party to be assessed, as was held in the case of Lockhart v. The Magistrates of Lanark, 10 Sh. 243. That, however, is a matter which will admit of easy adjustment after that which appears to me to be the real difficulty in the case is settled.

"It appears that in 1873 a district nearly though not altogether coinciding with the alleged old parish of Chanonrie was erected by the Teind Court into the church and parish of Fortrose quoad sacra; and the question thus arises purely for decision, viz., whether the proprietors of lands within such a quoad sacra parish are liable for the maintenance and support of the manse and offices of the parish from which their district has been disjoined. In the recent Jedburgh case (D. of Roxburghe, 3 Ret. 728, H. L., 4 Ret. 76), an analogous question regarding the church of the old parish was expressly left open, and before deciding it I should like to be favoured with a fuller argument than that which was submitted towards the close of last session, and which was directed mainly to the existence or non-existence of two ancient parishes."

of the liability of the heritors of lands so disjoined for building, maintaining, and repairing the church of the original parish was reserved ; but opinions in favour of the continuing liability of the heritors were indicated by more than one Judge, and were decidedly expressed by Lord Deas, who entered very fully into the whole question. v. MacLennan.

“ The case of Drummond, M. 7920, which at first sight appears to be an authority the other way, so far as regards the maintenance of the church by the heritors of lands annexed to another parish quoad sacra, was, I think, very satisfactorily shewn by Lord Deas to have been an entirely exceptional case (as regards the church), and to have been decided on the very peculiar circumstances which there occurred. But although the heritors of the disjoined lands were there found liable to repair the church of the parish to which these had been annexed, and to be free from the repairs to the church of the parish to which they had originally belonged, the Court expressly declared that these heritors must remain liable for all other parochial burdens in their original parish. The final interlocutor of the Court was,—‘ The Lords find that the heritors of lands annexed quoad sacra are liable in their proportion of upholding the fabrics of the kirks to which they are annexed, and in no other parochial burdens : Find that they are not liable to contribute for upholding the fabric of the parish kirks from which they were disjoined ; but that they remain liable in all other parochial burdens in these parishes.’

“ This decision is entirely in accordance with the judgment in the earlier case of Park, M. 8503, which is referred to by Erskine (ii. 10, sec. 64) as an authority on this branch of the law. Speaking of annexations quoad sacra which were in use to be made by the Teind Court long before the Act of 1844, he says,—‘ Such annexation affects only the inhabitants ; the lands continue in all civil respects part of the old parish, and therefore they remain burdened with the payment of the stipend to that church from which the inhabitants were disjoined, and it was adjudged that the owners of those lands do not by the annexation become liable in any part of the expense necessary for upholding the manse or even the church of the parish to which they are annexed, and which the inhabitants constantly resort to for divine service, but that they continue even in that respect to be accounted part of the old parish.’

“ Now, such being the law prior to the passing of the Act 7 and 8 Victoria, c. 44, the question arises, whether that statute has made any change upon the liabilities of the heritors of lands disjoined and erected into a parish quoad sacra ? I confess that I am unable to discover in the statute any indication that any such change was intended. On the contrary, I think it was intended that the rights and liabilities of the heritors of the lands disjoined and erected should remain unaffected by the disjunction and erection quoad sacra. It is quite clear that the burden of maintaining the manse, &c., is not inter sacra but inter civilia, quite as much so as the payment of stipend, which in all such cases continues to be paid by the heritors of the lands disjoined quoad sacra to the minister of the parish from which they have been so disjoined. It is true that before the lands can be disjoined and erected quoad sacra the statute requires a church to be erected or provided for the district, and provision to be made for a sufficient stipend to the clergyman, and for a suitable manse, or for an addition to the stipend in lieu thereof, and for the maintenance of the fabric of the various buildings. The stipend, however, is not payable out of the teinds, and the church and manse are not to be provided at the expense of the heritors of the disjoined and erected lands. All these things are to be done or provided by the parties promoting the disjunction and erection, not one of whom may be the owner of any of the disjoined lands ; nay more, the 8th section of the statute expressly provides that the proceedings may take place without any concurrence of the heritors, and the result of sustaining the present contention of the complainers as to their non-liability for parochial burdens in the original parish would simply be to exempt them from all the parochial burdens in connection to the repairs of the manse, offices, and garden wall, and, to the extent of one-fourth, to those of the church, and the Lord Ordinary, on 22d May 1880, sustained the reasons of suspension to the extent of one-fourth, and, quoad ultra, repelled them.

The respondent reclaimed.

The arguments on both sides sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord President.¹ No argument was submitted against the interlocutor of 29th December 1879, which dealt with the liability of the heritors of the disjoined lands.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has held that the heritors of Chanonry are not liable for repairs on the church of Rosemarkie, but that the assessment complained of must stand good as to the other ecclesiastical buildings. The ground upon which the complainers claim exemption from the ordinary liability of heritors as respects the church is that when the two parishes of Rosemarkie and Chanonry were united in the year 1670 by decree of the Commissioners of Teinds, it was provided in the decree that the heritors in the Rosemarkie district of the parish should maintain the church of Rosemarkie, and that the heritors in the district of Chanonry should maintain the church which then existed there. Now, that assumes that there was a union of parishes effected by the decree of the Commissioners of Teinds in 1670, and in that respect I think that the contention of the complainers is not well founded, and that the Lord Ordinary has rightly held that there were not two parishes existing prior to that decree which were united by virtue of it.

The burgh of Rosemarkie is a very ancient burgh. We have the authority of with that parish, without imposing upon them any corresponding burden in the newly erected parish. In short, they would, without any equivalent on their part, be entirely exempted from a parochial burden which attaches to every other owner of land in Scotland. I cannot think that that result was contemplated by the Legislature; and, so far as I can see, there is nothing in the language of the statute to give any countenance to the contentions of the complainers; indeed, it is in my opinion impossible to read the whole statute without observing the marked contrast which is exhibited between the 8th and 14th sections on the one hand, which deal with 'disjunctions' and erections quoad sacra, and the 4th and 15th sections, on the other hand, which deal with disjunctions and erections quoad omnia. In the latter the heritors of the disjoined lands are assumed or declared to be liable to provide and maintain the churches and manses of the new parish; in the former it is assumed that they are not liable in any such burdens, and the inference to my mind is clear that in the latter case they still remain liable for the parochial burdens of the original parish.

"If I am right in these views, it follows that the complainers are not entitled to be relieved of the assessments for repairing the manse, manse offices, and garden wall of Rosemarkie. . . .

"A subordinate question may also arise, viz., whether as regards the disjoined and erected lands, in so far as situated within the boundary of the burgh of Fortrose (or Chanonry), the assessment is to be imposed on the magistrates, as representing the community, or on the individual owners of the lands. This also is a matter for the parties themselves to adjust.

"I should add that the churchyard is not noticed in the foregoing remarks, because I was informed during the last debate that no part of the expense assessed for had been incurred in connection with that wall."

Bishop Leslie for saying that Rosemarkie is the oldest town in what he calls "the province of Ross," and we see from a charter (of which we have a translation) in 1455, that Rosemarkie must have been a royal burgh so far back as the thirteenth century, because it is stated in that charter, which is by James II., that it had been erected into a burgh by King Alexander. Which of the Alexanders is meant we cannot of course ascertain, but even supposing it to be the last (Alexander III.), it must have been as early as the thirteenth century, for he died in 1285. But by the charter of King James II. in 1455, Chanonry, as it was then called, was erected into a burgh and united with Rosemarkie, and from that date downward there has been but one burgh, the burgh of Rosemarkie and Chanonry, or, as they are called in combination, the burgh of Fortrose. Now, it would certainly be something very singular if at that early period there had been two parishes within so small a burgh as the burgh of Fortrose. The ordinary case is that a burgh forms a parish of itself, although it very often combines a landward district with it in one parish. The notion of a small royal burgh at such an early date having within itself two parishes is a novelty altogether. But it is needless to pursue this part of the case further, because it seems to me that the whole evidence is against the notion that there ever was a separate parish of Fortrose or Chanonry. The Lord Ordinary has gone over very fully the evidence which leads to that result, and I do not repeat it.

But although there were not two parishes anterior to 1670 there is no doubt there was some kind of a union effected by the operation of that decree, and it is necessary that we should understand, if possible, what the Commissioners of Teinds intended to do, both as regards the matter of the union, and also as regards the arrangement for the maintenance of the two churches with which they were dealing. We have an extract-decree which is extracted from the minute-book of the Teind Commissioners under date 2d February 1670; and all that we learn from that is that the Bishop of Ross pursued a summons against the parishioners of Rosemarkie, and that the object of that summons was to procure a union of the kirks of Chanonry and Rosemarkie, and the decree which appears to have been pronounced according to the minute was this:—"The Lords unite the kirks of Chanonry and Rosemarkie, and appoint the minister of Rosemarkie and his successors to serve the cure at both kirks Sunday day about." And then follows this further declaration:—"The Lords, of consent of the Bishop of Rosse, declairs the parishionairs of Rosemarkie frie of the support of the kirk of Chanonrie, et e contra."

Now, there were two churches in existence at that time. There was a church in Rosemarkie, which was the parish church of the whole parish of Rosemarkie, including Chanonry, but then in Chanonry there was another church, which was the cathedral church of the diocese of Ross, and in which of course the bishop was specially interested. These are the two kirks that are united, and with reference to which it is ordered that the minister of Rosemarkie is to conduct service at each of these churches "Sunday day about,"—i.e., the service at one church one Sunday, and the service at the other on the next. It is also declared that the "parishioners of Rosemarkie are to be free of the support of the kirk of Chanonry, et e contra." This is undoubtedly a very ambiguous sentence, and at first sight it is not very easy to give it any meaning but this, that the parishioners of Rosemarkie, by which we must understand the parishioners of the whole parish of Rosemarkie, including the parishioners in the district of Chanonry, are to be free of the support of the kirk of Chanonry. That would not be very surprising, because such was the state of matters at that date. Parishioners could be liable for the support of a cathedral church which was supported out of the revenues of the bishop or of the chapter, and this provision, therefore, conferred no favour. But there follows "et c contra," which would seem to mean that the persons who are liable for the support of the kirk of Chanonry shall not be liable for the support of the kirk of Rosemarkie. But who would be liable for support of the kirk of Chanonry? The bishop or the chapter,—not the parishioners; and therefore the conclusion would be that there are no parishioners freed from the obligations which then lay upon them of supporting the parish church of Rosemarkie, but only that the parishioners were not to support the cathedral church, and the bishop and chapter were not to support the parish church. That is one reading, and it is a reading which at first sight commends itself to me as not improbable.

But I see very well that the words are susceptible of another meaning, and looking to what the Commissioners were doing—uniting two churches in one parish, but at the same time dealing with that parish as consisting of two districts—it may very well have been the intention of the Commissioners to say, that, although we thus make a parish to have two churches, the district in which the one church is situated shall support that church, and the old parish church of Rosemarkie shall be supported by those who are not of the Chanonry district, but in Rosemarkie. That is the other reading. And between these two readings I think it is not very easy to decide unless we can get light elsewhere.

But there is some light thrown upon this question by an ancient MS., if we are entitled to take that MS. as good evidence in a question of this kind. It is light so important as to be in my mind perfectly conclusive if we are entitled to avail ourselves of it. But it is proper to make sure that in referring to the MS., which is printed by Sir John Connel in the appendix of his book on Tithes, we are appealing to an authentic historical document, and we must see what is the account which the learned writer gives of the MS., which he uses very freely in the course of his work. In his preface, after mentioning a number of other MSS., he says—"The only other MS. of which it seems necessary to give any account consists of papers (to some of which I have already alluded) collected by the late Lord Swinton when Solicitor of Tithes, and most obligingly communicated to me by his Lordship's son, Mr Archibald Swinton, one of the Clerks to the Signet. This book contains many valuable writings said to have been copied from old manuscripts, some of which must themselves have been taken at one time or other from the sederunt books B and C. There are also several of the papers in this collection which are duplicates of the manuscript in the Advocates' Library. But there is one of them which is to be found nowhere else, and is much deserving of regard. It is entitled 'An Abbreviate of what is remarkable in the Decrees pronounced by the Lords of Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds from 1661 till November 1673, extracted from the Records of that Court,' and is said to be taken 'from an MS. collection of R. Mills, in the hands of Mr Charles Hamilton Gordon, 1758.'"

Sir John Connel goes on to say further, that "it appears from the preface to Mr Forbes' Treatise that he had in his possession a copy of this paper, and a number of decisions which he quotes are evidently taken from it." What he means there obviously is, that Mr Forbes had in his possession the MS. collection of R. Mills, and that that MS. collection was in the hands of Mr Charles

Gordon in 1758. But if the MS. collection was in the hands of Mr Forbes, that proves that it was in existence at a time very nearly contemporary with the decree with which we are dealing, for Mr Forbes' work was published in 1705, and it must have been the result of continued study for a number of years. So that Mr Forbes' work may very well be said to be a contemporary, or almost a contemporary, of that decree of 1670. The reference in Mr Forbes' preface to this MS. is certainly not very distinct, although, upon the whole, I am disposed to agree with Sir John Connel that he probably was dealing with the very same MS. that we are now considering. He says—"I was put to more trouble in perfecting this work through the loss of the commission registers, but yet dare say that few material occurrences before that judicature have escaped my observation. For I had an abstract of all that passed till November 1673. And any decret of moment since that time hath been friendly communicated to me by the parties or their doers."

v. MacLennan.

Now, this MS. terminates in November 1673, and is an abbreviate, or as Mr Forbes calls it, "an abstract" of all that passed in the Commission Court. So that it is fair to conclude, as Sir John Connel does, that he had access to this very MS., and used it as an authentic historical document; and this is confirmed by what Sir John Connel further says that it appears in the body of his work that he must have taken a number of the cases that he comments on from that MS., because they are not to be found elsewhere.

That being the state of the historical evidence, I am disposed to think that we may very fairly hold the MS. in question to be an authentic account of what passed in the Commission of Teinds from 1661, i.e., from the Restoration, down to the end of 1673, and if that be so, that we may take as an account of the proceedings of the Commissioners of Teinds what we find under date 2d February 1670, being the same date with the extract from the minute-book that we have in process. Now, the account which the writer of that MS. gives of the case of Rosemarkie is this,—“John, bishop of Ross, pursues a summons bearing that Chanery being a burgh royal and the bishop's seat, where there was considerable resort of noblemen and gentlemen, and the conveniency of a kirk, yet the same was not erected into a parochial church, and that the kirk of Rosemarkie was near and might be united and annexed to the said kirk of Chanery, and a competent stipend settled to both.” Then there follows an account of the proceeding, and this affords pretty distinct internal evidence that the writer of this document was really acquainted with what passed on the occasion, because there is a minuteness and precision which shew that this is not an imaginary contention that is set out. The result is thus stated at the end,—“The Lords united the two kirks, and appointed the minister of Rosemarkie to serve the cure at both per vices”—one Sabbath at Chanonry and the other at Rosemarkie—“and of consent of the bishop, declared the heritors free of the reparation of one another's churches.”

If that is an accurate account, it puts an end to all contention as to the meaning of the decree, and particularly as to “et c contra.” It means simply that although there was no separate parish of Chanonry yet in uniting the two kirks the Commissioners dealt with the church of Chanonry as a cathedral church, but as having a district surrounding it appropriated to it, as it were, before this decree was pronounced, the inhabitants of that district resorting to the cathedral church as their only church; and the result to which they came was that they united the churches—made them both churches of the same parish of Rosemarkie—but provided that the heritors of the two districts should be separately liable each for the support of their own church, i.e., the heritors of the district of Chanonry for the support of the cathedral church, which had fallen into disrepair in consequence of the unfavourable position in which bishops were then placed from the loss of the capitular revenues, and that the other church should be supported by the heritors within the district of Rosemarkie.

Now, if this is the true construction of the decree it seems to be conclusive of the whole matter. But there is a great deal of evidence as to what has been done in practice with reference to the church of Rosemarkie. As to the maintenance of the church of Chanonry that is a thing which does not seem ever to have been seriously thought of. That church became ruinous—being “a great fabric,” nobody would care to support such a church as that, especially after the Revolution, when it ceased to have any reverence or sanctity attached to it as the cathedral church or seat of a bishop. But there certainly were repairs made on the church of Rosemarkie from time to time. For a considerable period I do not think these throw much light on the matter or help us in understanding it one way or another, because the district of Chanonry was a district not containing heritors who were liable to be assessed on their valued rent, and the repair of the church was by law laid entirely on heritors of that character. Consequently, the repairs on the church of Rosemarkie being laid upon the heritors in the valuation-roll only, the complainants and parties in their position never could have been assessed, because they were not among those heritors. Therefore that cannot be taken as shewing usage one way or the other.

But there is an occurrence in 1820 which has a great bearing on this question, and seems to me pretty conclusive, if any further evidence is wanted, as to what was the obligation in the decree of 1670. The church of Rosemarkie in 1820 had become irreparable, and it was necessary to build a new church. There was then an assessment laid upon the heritors of the whole parish according to their real rents, including the county heritors and the burghal heritors also, and those who were at that time the predecessors of the complainants. A dispute arose about this, and the minor heritors, as they called themselves, maintained that they should not be assessed, and in the course of this discussion the decree of 1670, which appears to have fallen aside or been forgotten for a very considerable period, was discovered or came to the knowledge of the parties somehow, and when this turned up the minor heritors availed themselves of the discovery and claimed exemption in virtue of the decree. The parties agreed to take the opinion of Sir John Connel. It is quite clear what his opinion must have been, unless he had very suddenly changed it, for in his work on Parishes he deals with the case of Rosemarkie, and he says that the effect of the decree of 1670 was just what is expressed in the ancient MS. already referred to, and therefore we may fairly conclude that the advice they received was that the heritors in the district of Chanonry were not bound to contribute to the church of Rosemarkie. Now, what did they do? They proceeded to define the districts, and they drew a line between the proper parish of Rosemarkie and the district of Chanonry—the burghal district—which certainly goes beyond the proper limits of the burgh so far as we can see. But it seems to have been done after full consideration and inquiry—done by the whole heritors, the whole parties assessed, as an arrangement for the distribution of this liability. The heritors of the burghal district were exempted, and exempted after full consideration, and apparently after an arrangement had been made which was intended to operate in all time coming. I think it would be a very extraordinary thing to allow the heritors of Rosemarkie, as I call them by way of distinction, to go back upon this, unless they could shew very plainly that that arrangement proceeded upon some misconception of the decree of 1670. But so far from that being the case, it appears to me that the arrangement which they then made was quite in accordance with what we have ascertained to be the true meaning of that decree. Therefore, without going further, I come without any hesitation to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, that the complainers are entitled to be exempt from the assessment for the repairs of the church. But, with his Lordship, I am also very clearly of opinion that it cannot go further than that, because it is the church, and nothing but the church, which is dealt with in the decree. Of the two churches, I should rather say one is to be supported by the heritors of the burgh or by the parishioners of the burgh and the burghal district, the other by the heritors of the Rosemarkie district. As to the manse and other ecclesiastical buildings of Rosemarkie, I do not see how the complainers can be exempt from them, because there never was imposed on them any corresponding obligation to maintain a manse and buildings at Chanonry. The two things, the obligation to uphold Chanonry church, and the exemption from upholding Rosemarkie church, were intended to be equivalents. Therefore, on the whole matter, I am of the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I entirely concur in what your Lordship has said, and it is unnecessary for me to say anything after the full and instructive opinion given by your Lordship. I shall only add that it appears to me that the elements which ought to weigh, and which in my mind do weigh, as decisive, are not so much what was done in 1820 or subsequent to 1820 as the contemporaneous writings of about 1670 which have been laid before us. I felt that there was a great deal of force in the argument that the actings in 1820 and subsequently could scarcely give much light on the proceedings of two centuries before. In 1820 the parties were just thrown back upon the legal question of what was the effect of the decree in 1670. I think the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a sound conclusion upon the effect of the decree, even if we had not the light of the MS. quoted by Sir John Connel. But, my Lords, while I think that is so, there can be no doubt that the MS. is conclusive on the subject, and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that that document is entitled to weight.

Observations upon the meaning of "compromise" as applied to such an agreement.

1st Division.

IN October 1878 the City of Glasgow Bank, a joint stock company, stopped payment and went into liquidation under supervision of the Court. Dr Alexander Mitchell, of the North Church, Dunfermline, held (1) in his own name £1000 stock, and (2) as executor, along with his brother James, upon the estate of William Mitchell, £600 stock. In respect of both holdings he was placed on the first part of the list of contributories.

He paid the two calls made upon him as executor (being the half of £16,553, 12s. 6d.) He was unable to meet in full the second call upon his own £1000 stock, amounting to £22,500. The liquidators accordingly furnished him with the schedule of queries for such cases which was appended to an excerpt from the minutes of the liquidators.*

Dr Mitchell filled up the schedule, giving a statement of his assets and liabilities, accompanied by valuations. He offered £3000 "for a discharge in full of all claims by the liquidators against him as a shareholder." The liquidators thereupon made inquiries, and Mr Haldane, one of their number, communicated the result of them in this letter to Dr Mitchell's agent,—“Edinburgh, 25th June 1879.—Dear Sir,—We have now considered this case, and, taking the whole circumstances into account, we agree (subject to the sanction of the Court and all necessary consents) to discharge Dr Mitchell of his obligations in respect of the £1000 of stock belonging to him (in his own right), provided he pays the sum of £4400, and grants an assignation in favour of the liquidators of any claims of relief he may have against the trust-estate of the late William Mitchell, or against his co-trustee in that trust.—Yours truly, JAMES HALDANE, Liqr.” Subsequently the £4400 was modified to £3800. The £3800 was paid, and Dr Mitchell was asked to assign to the liquidators any claim of relief against William Mitchell's estate, but such an assignation was afterwards dispensed with. Dr Mitchell's case was, at a later date, submitted to the Court in a list of complete surrenders, and sanctioned by them in terms of the Act.

A difference then arose between the liquidators and Dr Mitchell upon the terms of the mutual deed which fell to be executed. The former maintained that the clause of assignation should include any claims he might have (if there was a surplus of the assets of the bank, or of the calls) in both capacities, as holder of the £1000 and of the £600 stock, or otherwise. Dr Mitchell maintained that the discharge applied only to

That parties who apply for a present discharge in full of all claims at the instance of the liquidators shall be required, in addition to the payment which may be agreed upon, to assign all claims competent to them for participation in any future surplus of the assets of the bank, and all claims of relief and damages at their instance against the bank, or the directors or officials thereof, or their fellow-shareholders in the bank.”

the £1000 stock, and that he was not bound to assign his rights in respect of the £600. No. 37.

This case was therefore submitted to the Court under the Companies Act, 1862, and these questions were put,—“1. Whether the Reverend Dr Alexander Mitchell is bound to assign to the liquidators all claims competent to him in respect of the said £600 stock on any eventual surplus of the assets of the said bank, or of the calls made or to be made by the liquidators; and all claims competent to him in respect of the said £600 stock against the directors of the bank and others? or, 2. Whether the assignation to be granted by Dr Mitchell should in these respects be limited to the holding of £1000 stock?”

Liquidators of
gow Bank v.
Mitchell.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case arising in the course of the liquidation of the City of Glasgow Bank in respect of a compromise between the liquidators and Dr Alexander Mitchell, which compromise was sanctioned by the Court.

In the course of the argument the liquidators took some exception to the word “compromise” as applied to such an arrangement as that before us; but I think there is no foundation for that objection. No doubt, part of the arrangement between the liquidators and the contributory is that he shall surrender his whole estate, and, in so far as that is concerned, that is not a compromise, but it partakes of the nature of a compromise in this respect, that in arranging for the surrender of the estate a certain sum of money has to be fixed, which is to be presently paid, or paid by instalments, and which is held, for the purposes of the arrangement, as representing the full liability of the party paying the money. But, although it is a compromise in this respect, the liquidators are quite right in saying that the arrangement also embodies a complete surrender of the estate, and, therefore, though the contributory may not be able to pay more than a certain amount, he is bound under such an arrangement as this to give them an assignation to all the prospective and possible assets of his estate. That is the general nature of such an arrangement.

Now, it must be kept in view that this arrangement can receive no effect at all without the sanction of the Court, because it was a condition of the supervision order pronounced on the 27th of November 1878, under which the whole of this liquidation has been conducted, that unless and until it shall be otherwise directed and ordained by the Court the liquidators shall not accept any compromise with any contributory except with the leave of the Court. And, therefore, the true question for our consideration is, what was the arrangement between the contributory and the liquidators to which the sanction of the Court was given? It appears that Dr Mitchell was, along with his brother James, as executor of another brother who died some time ago, proprietor of £600 stock of the bank, and was registered as a partner, and consequently put upon the list of contributories for that amount. In regard to that stock the two brothers, Dr Alexander Mitchell and Mr James Mitchell, paid up the first and second calls in full, the total amount being £16,553, 12s. 6d. All their liability in respect of that £600 stock was therefore extinguished. But, notwithstanding, they were still on the contributory list for that £600, and it depended entirely upon whether or not any further calls might be necessary in the course of liquidation whether they should become liable for any further sum in respect of that particular stock. They were not discharged of their liability for that stock, but only discharged of their liability on those two calls.

gow Bank v.
Mitchell.

Then, in addition to that stock, Dr Alexander Mitchell was a partner on his own account to the extent of £1000 stock, and for that sum was placed on the list of contributories. He intimated to the liquidators that he was unable to meet the second call upon this stock, and that therefore he desired to enter into an arrangement with the liquidators to surrender his estate, and accordingly the liquidators sent to him, as they were in the habit of doing to all persons so situated, a certain schedule containing a number of particulars which the contributory was required to answer as the basis of the arrangement to be entered into. Now, that schedule has affixed to it an excerpt from a minute of the liquidators, dated the 18th of November 1878, containing resolutions which advertise parties who undertake to make answer to the queries contained in the schedule that the following is the basis of the arrangement which is to follow upon those answers. They are to receive a discharge in full on the one hand of all claims at the instance of the liquidators, and they are to pay such a sum as may be agreed upon, and assign all claims competent to them to participate in any future surplus of the bank. In short, there is to be, on the one hand, a complete discharge of the contributory, so as to put an end to all connection between him and the bank and its liquidators,—there is to be no liability of any kind in the future on any ground whatever,—and, on the other hand, there is to be an entire surrender of the estate, a present payment in money, the amount to be arranged, and a surrender of all claims competent to the contributory against the bank and its surplus assets, or any of its office-bearers and contributories.

Now, that being so, without going into the details of the answers which are given to this schedule, the question arises whether Dr Mitchell is not now bound to assign to the liquidators, in terms of a draft deed of discharge which is before us, all claims which he can have in any capacity for participation in the future surplus assets of the bank, if there shall be any. That the liquidators intended that this should be so cannot admit of any dispute, because we know that the compromise or arrangement between them and Dr Mitchell, which they submitted for the sanction of the Court, did involve such an assignation—an assignation of every claim which he could have in any capacity—and there was brought under the notice of the Court at that time by the liquidators the circumstance that he was a shareholder of the bank not only as an individual, but also in the capacity of one of the executors, and that was the compromise and arrangement which the Court sanctioned. There is therefore no other compromise or arrangement binding upon either party, and none which could receive effect in the liquidation, except that compromise and arrangement which was sanctioned by the Court. It is very true that in some of the correspondence between the parties as to the amount of money that was to be paid there are some expressions which look very like an adoption of the view which Dr Mitchell now contends for, and particularly a letter by Mr Haldane, one of the liquidators, dated 25th June 1879. The expression, “a discharge of his obligations in respect of the £1000 stock belonging to him,” is undoubtedly an inaccurate expression with reference to the compromise which was in course of being submitted or about to be submitted to the Court. But then, on the other hand, it must be observed that this same letter stipulates for an assignation which has nothing to do with the £1000 stock, but is an assignation of the claim of relief which he may have against the trust-estate of William Mitchell,—that is to say, an assignation of any right he may have in respect of his being a holder of £600 stock belonging to the executry estate, and against his co-trustee in that trust. That assignation is not now insisted upon, because the liquidators have become satisfied, on the one hand, that it could not be of any value, and, in the second place, that Dr Mitchell very strongly objected to grant such an assignation as a matter of feeling. The liquidators very properly, I think, in the circumstances, yielded that point. But this part of the letter is not on that account of the less value as shewing what was in the mind of the liquidators at the time,—that the discharge to be granted, and the surrender by Dr Mitchell, were to have reference not only to the £1000 stock which he held in his own name, but also to the £600 of the executry stock.

gow Bank v.
Mitchell.

But be that as it may, I think there can be no doubt, as I said before, that the arrangement which was sanctioned by the Court is the arrangement which the liquidators now contend must receive effect, and that any correspondence of this character which takes place in the interval cannot, I think, interfere with what is the proper arrangement between the parties; and I am therefore of opinion that Dr Mitchell is bound to assign to the liquidators all claims competent to him, in respect of the £600 stock, on any future surplus of the assets of the bank, or of the calls made or to be made by the liquidators, and all claims competent to him, in respect of the said £600 stock, against the contributories of the bank and others,—that is to say, the first question submitted to us must be answered in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. There is certainly some little difficulty created by the terms of the letter of 25th June, because there is a stipulation in it that the assignation shall be of a special claim of relief, and not of all claims competent to Dr Mitchell, or to become competent to him. It is contended that by that letter the liquidators conceded any claim of the nature of that here in question. Now, as your Lordship has remarked, there is no doubt something in the expression used in the letter which is calculated to give rise to the argument that the question is foreclosed, and that it is not now open to inquire into the true nature of the transaction by way of compromise of which the Court approved in November 1879. But I agree with your Lordships that the terms of the letter are not sufficient in the circumstances to prevent the question from being raised as it now is, and assuming the question to be open, I am of opinion that the liquidators are right in their present contention. It appears to me, having regard to the minute and relative declarations upon which all the settlements by way of compromise proceed, that it is quite plain that those settlements are made upon the distinct understanding that there is to be a complete surrender of the estate of the contributories, actual and contingent, when a discharge is given for a much smaller sum than that actually due. The contributory is to surrender his whole estate. That, I think, is the condition which the terms of the minute and declaration import, and the papers which were laid before us when the compromise was approved of seem to me to imply that there was to be an assignation granted of everything to which Dr Mitchell might have a right or claim in relation to the bank shares here in question. I am therefore of opinion that the questions should be answered in the way proposed by your Lordship.

Liquidators of
gow Bank v.
Mitchell.

LORD SHAND.—I am also satisfied that this question must be answered in the way contended for by the liquidators. It must be kept in view that Dr Mitchell, when called upon to meet the second call upon the £1000 stock held by him, was only able to meet the claim on the footing of a complete surrender of his estate by offering £3800. The debt that he was due was £22,500, so that to the extent of £18,700 he was unable to meet the demand. It would, I think, be very extraordinary that in these circumstances, being unable to pay his debt to the extent of £18,700 to the bank, it should have been part of the arrangement under which he was giving only £3800 that he should have a claim against the bank for the reversion upon other stock that belonged to him, if there should be any such reversion. That view of the case would come to this, that he was getting a discharge to the extent of £18,700, paying nothing for it, and yet reserving a claim against the liquidators for, it might be, £2000 or £3000, payable at a future date by them. Now, such a thing might be done by mistake, but it is quite plain that it could only be by a mistake on the part of the liquidators that any such agreement should have been come to. It must further be observed, as your Lordship has pointed out, that any compromise which proceeded on the footing of surrender must always be under the sanction of this Court. Indeed, Mr Haldane, in the letter which has been already referred to, explains that the sanction of the Court must be given to the arrangement; and I am satisfied, as your Lordship is, that the Court did not sanction an arrangement in the terms contended for by Dr Mitchell.

On the question itself, it is quite clear that the parties must have regarded the claim to a possible reversion upon the shares as of some value. It appears very clearly that the parties had before them claims which might arise in respect of this very executry stock, for Mr Haldane stipulated that the bank should have assigned to them any right of relief that Dr Mitchell had in respect of that stock, and it was only because it was made clear that there were no such claims of relief that the assignation was not taken from him. Then, farther, as has been pointed out—and this really is at the basis of the decision of this question—in the memorandum issued to him with a view to his giving a relative declaration and answers, it is expressly said in the most explicit terms that persons who are taking advantage by way of surrender must assign all claims competent to them for participation in any future assets of the bank, and all claims of relief and damages against the directors and officials. These circumstances seem to me to make it conclusive that any claims by Dr Mitchell in respect of this stock must have been included.

The only matter that raises any difficulty is the letter of Mr Haldane, to which your Lordship has referred. That, it is true, no doubt referred only to a discharge of Dr Mitchell in respect of the £1000 of stock, without making special reference to his being also discharged of liability on the £600 stock; but I think this is quite explained by the circumstance that all parties dealt upon the footing that they were satisfied, in the state to which the liquidation had advanced, there would be no further calls on the shareholders,—all parties were satisfied by this time that funds enough to meet the liabilities in respect of the £600 of stock had been received.

It appears to me, then, that, taking the arrangement as a whole, it was this, that on the one hand Dr Mitchell should surrender all that he had,—and one of those assets was his possible claim in respect of this stock—and on the other hand that he should be discharged of all his liability to the bank, for I hold that even if the liquidators had found it necessary after this date to make a further call upon the shareholders, they would not have been entitled to require Dr Mitchell to pay any further sum upon this £600 of stock. The footing of the arrangement was that he should give up everything he had, and, on the other hand, I hold that the liquidators bound themselves to discharge him of every possible liability in regard to all of the stock. Though one parcel of this stock may have been held by him as executry in a question between him and others, it must be borne in mind that in a question with the bank that did not alter his position. He was in the position of a shareholder personally liable in respect of that stock just as much as in respect of the £1000 of stock, though it was marked as executry stock in a question between him and the beneficiaries, if there were any beneficiaries besides himself. And so, even taking the matter upon Mr Haldane's letter as part of the arrangement as concluded with the liquidators, I think that the bank is right.

City of Glasgow Bank v.
Mitchell.

But let us look now to what alone the Court have sanctioned. I have the papers before me. Dr Mitchell was no party, of course, to those proceedings, but he knew that the liquidators must get the sanction of the Court to any arrangement they should make. I find that the note was boxed on 18th November 1879. There is a title, "Complete Surrender," and "there is hereto appended a list of the contributories, marked list A, now proposed to be discharged on making a complete surrender, and paying the value of their estates, or paying a portion thereof, and surrendering the remainder;" and again the list is headed in this way, "List of contributories referred to in the foregoing note who have applied for discharge on making a complete surrender of their estates." Among the persons who so make surrender appears the name of the "Reverend Alexander Mitchell, North Church, Dunfermline," and again the "Reverend Alexander Mitchell, North Church, Dunfermline, as one of the executors of William Mitchell," and in the relative papers shewing the money payments to be made Dr Mitchell's name occurs both as an individual and in the executry character. It is, therefore, perfectly plain that the only compromise by way of surrender which this Court sanctioned was one in which both parcels of stock were treated together, and in which there was a complete surrender of Dr Mitchell's estate, and a complete surrender of that estate implied an assignation of any claims he might have against the bank, as much in regard to the £600 of stock as in regard to the £1000 of stock.

Upon these grounds, therefore, first, that the arrangement in its substance was an arrangement of the character contended for by the bank, and, secondly and separately, because the only arrangement which the Court have sanctioned is an arrangement of that kind, I am of opinion that the liquidators are entitled to succeed.

THE COURT accordingly answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

ANN CLARK AND OTHERS, of the Fourth Part.—Kinnear—C. S. Dickson.

Succession—Vesting—Conveyance to Trustees—Interposed Liferent—Destination over.—A trustor directed his trustees to pay to his wife a liferent of his whole estate, so long as she remained a widow, and “within twelve months after the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be,” to convey certain heritable subjects to his wife’s nephew, “A, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to B,” A’s brother, “whom failing,” &c. A predeceased the trustor’s widow, who had not married again. Held that as the deed conferred no right upon A, apart from the direction to convey to him, no right vested in him prior to the date when the conveyance fell to be made.

Succession—Trustee—Direction to sell.—A trustor directed his trustees “twelve months after the death of my said wife and myself,” to convey certain heritable subjects “if not sold as after-mentioned,” to a certain series of heirs. The subjects were burdened with a bond for £2000. He then directed his trustees that should the holders of the bond “resolve to call up their money, and intimate such resolution prior to the expiry of twelve months from the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me,” the property should be sold and the price divided, after payment of the bond, among a slightly different set of heirs. Prior to the death of the testator’s widow a person who had right to one half of the bond gave notice to the trustees that he wished payment. The trustees arranged for payment to this creditor on his granting an assignation to another lender, and the property was not sold. Held that the calling up of a part of the bond was not in the circumstances the event contemplated by the testator, and that the trustees were not then bound to sell the property.

M.

A special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon two questions arising on the construction of the settlement of the late John Bryson, Bainsford, who died on 22d October 1851.

The settlement conveyed to trustees the testator’s whole heritable and moveable estate, and particularly eight properties, which were specially described, with a declaration that the subjects were conveyed in trust for the following purposes:—“First, for payment of all my just and lawful debts and expenses . . . Secondly, I appoint my said trustees to pay to the said Margaret Campbell, my wife, during her survivance and viduity after my death, the free rents, profits, and produce of my said estates, heritable and moveable . . . Fourthly, within twelve months after the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be, I appoint my said trustees, at the expense of the disponees respectively, to dispoise and convey the several remaining subjects before described, with houses and pertinents thereon, as follows, viz.:—The subjects first above disposed” . . . (certain heritable subjects in Abbotsford Place, Glasgow): “Item, the third and seventh above disposed to be conveyed to the said John Bryson Clark and the heirs of his body; whom failing, to the said William Clark; whom failing, to the said George Clark; whom failing, to the said Mary, Ann, and Margaret Bryson Clark and their heirs.”

John Bryson Clark died on 21st January 1870, without leaving heirs of his body, during the survivance of Mrs Margaret Campbell or Bryson, the testator’s widow, in whose favour he left a settlement conveying to her his whole interest in her husband’s estate. Mrs Margaret Campbell or Bryson died on 19th April 1879, leaving a settlement, under which Mrs Mary Clark or Boyd and others (the third parties) were the residuary legatees.

William Clark (the second party) called upon the trustees of the testator (the first parties) to convey to him the subjects above referred to, third and seventh disposed in Mr Bryson's settlement, as having right to the properties, in consequence of the death of the said John Bryson Clark, without heirs of his body, previously to the death of the said Mrs Margaret Campbell or Bryson. The third parties objected to said conveyance being granted, and maintained that the said properties were carried by the foresaid disposition and assignation and testament of the said John Bryson Clark, and formed part of the estate of the said Mrs Margaret Campbell or Bryson, and as such fell under her settlement.

Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,

A different question arose as to other subjects, as to which the following direction was given in the fourth purpose,—“ Within twelve months after the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be, I appoint my said trustees, at the expense of the disponees respectively, to dispose and convey the several remaining subjects before described, with houses and pertinents thereon as follows, viz. :—The subjects first above disposed ” (certain heritable subjects in Abbotsford Place, Glasgow), “ if not sold as after-mentioned, to be conveyed under the burden of said security (a bond for £2000) to John Bryson, my nephew, residing with me, and the heirs of his body ; whom failing, to William Bryson, his brother ; whom failing, to John Bryson Clark, my wife's nephew, residing with me ; whom failing, to William Clark, his brother ; whom failing, to George Clark, his brother ; whom failing, to his three sisters, Mary, Ann, and Margaret Bryson Clark, all residing in Bainsford, and their heirs. . . . Fifthly, In case the holders of the bond ” (a heritable security for £2000) “ affecting the subjects first above disposed resolve to call up their money, and intimate such resolution prior to the expiry of twelve months from the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me, I appoint my trustees to complete all necessary titles to these subjects, and sell the same in such manner as they shall deem proper, and after paying the debt which affects the same to divide the free proceeds of the price into four equal parts or shares and to pay to the said John Bryson, my nephew, and his heirs one such share, the said William Bryson, my nephew, and his heirs one such share, the said John Bryson Clark and his heirs one such share, and the remaining share to be paid to the said Margaret Campbell ; whom failing, the said John Bryson Clark ; whom failing, his brother William ; whom failing, his brother George ; whom failing, his three sisters, Mary, Ann, and Margaret Bryson Clark and their heirs.”

At the date of the death of the testator in 1851 the bond for £2000 over the Abbotsford Place property, referred to in the fifth purpose of the deceased's trust-disposition and settlement, was held by and vested in John Smith, writer, Falkirk, to the extent of £1000, and John Wilson, of South Bantaskine, Falkirk, to the extent of the remaining £1000. In November 1853 Mr Wilson, by letter addressed to the said John Smith, who was agent for the trustees of the testator, gave notice that he wished payment, and in February 1854 he received payment of his part of the bond, granting assignation of the same in favour of Alexander Macvey, Carron, and Mr Smith's part of the bond was, in July 1854, assigned to Mrs Foord Brackenless, a sister of Mrs Bryson and of Mrs Macvey, wife of the said Mr Alexander Macvey. The trustees under Mr Bryson's trust-disposition and settlement did not sell the Abbotsford Place property when the bond was assigned, as above mentioned, in 1854 ; but the holders having by notarial intimation called up the same on 3d February 1875, the trustees sold the property on 27th February 1875 at the price of £3000 sterling, thus leaving a reversion of £950, after deducting £50 for expense of realising.

Nov. 26, 1880.
Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,
&c.

The question then arose whether it had been the duty of the trustees in 1853 to sell the property, and divide the proceeds among John Bryson, William Bryson, John Bryson Clark, and Mrs Bryson, the testator's widow, who were all then alive, or whether the division fell to be made as at 1875, by which time John Bryson Clark had died, and his heirs had become entitled to his share under the deed, his right having lapsed.

On the assumption that the right to John Bryson Clark's share had vested in himself in 1853, the third parties were entitled thereto, as residuary legatees of the late Mrs Bryson, to whom John Bryson Clark had bequeathed his interest. His share was also claimed by Ann Clark, and others (the fourth parties), his next of kin, as beneficiaries entitled to it in their own right under the deed.

Argued for third parties;—The subjects third and seventh disposed vested a morte testatoris, and John Bryson Clark took a fee in them during his life. They were therefore carried by his disposition and assignation. If these subjects had been moveable it could not have been maintained that the fee had vested in John Bryson Clark, but in the case of heritable subjects, where the trustees were directed to insert a destination such as this, the presumption was for substitution, not conditional institution.¹ There was a vested right notwithstanding these substitutions.²

(2) It was conceded that no right in the Abbotsford Place property could vest in John Bryson Clark until the bondholders called up their bond. But the fact that one of the bondholders called up his part of the bond was enough to satisfy the condition in purpose five of the trust-deed.

Argued for the second and fourth parties;—(1) The subjects third and seventh disposed had not vested in John Bryson Clark at his death. The conveyance under purpose four was not to be made until both of the spouses were dead. There was a conveyance to trustees, and there was a destination over. All this shewed that the vesting was not a morte testatoris.³ (2) On the question as to the Abbotsford Place property: The Court was dealing with a very peculiar clause. The period of vesting was to be determined by what certain strangers, the bondholders, did. That being so, great strictness was required in the interpretation. What the testator contemplated was, that if the whole bond were called up, the trustees would be hampered in their duties, and would have had to effect a new loan to enable them to pay the bond.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question which we have here to determine in the construction of the settlements of the late Mr John Bryson, has regard to certain subjects which are generally mentioned as the subjects "3d and 7th disposed." The scheme of the settlement is to convey to trustees by special conveyance a number of different subjects, and also to convey generally any other lands of which the testator was possessed, and his whole moveable estate. The conveyance to trustees is controlled by the purposes of the trust, but there is nothing but what is contained in the purposes of the trust that can be held to give a beneficial right or interest to any one here concerned.

As regards the subjects 3d and 7th disposed, the declaration of the testator's intention is embodied in the 4th purpose or direction, for it is rather a direction, and contains provisions as to a number of different subjects. Taking the words which apply to the subjects in question it reads thus:—"Fourthly, within twelve months after the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be, I appoint my said trustees, at the expense of the disponees respectively, to dispose and convey the several remaining subjects before described, with houses and pertinents thereon as follows, viz.— . . . Item, the subjects 3d and 7th above disposed to be conveyed to the said John Bryson Clark and the heirs of his body; whom failing, to the said William Clark; whom failing, to the said George Clark; whom failing, to the said Mary, Ann, and Margaret Bryson Clark and their heirs." So far as regards John Bryson Clark and his right and interest in the subjects 3d and 7th disposed, it depends on this direction to convey. There are no other words of gift in his favour in this settlement as regards these subjects, and no other direction to the trustees to hold them for his behoof. The only provision in his favour is, that in a certain event the trustees are directed to convey to him and his heirs, whom failing, as above. Now, John Bryson Clark predeceased the term at which this conveyance was to be made. He survived the testator, but predeceased the widow, and the question is, did the fee of these subjects vest in him before that period arrived? I am clearly of opinion that it did not. It is in vain to review the authorities in a question of this kind, but I think they amount to this, that when nothing is expressed in favour of a beneficiary except a direction to trustees to convey to him on the occurrence of a certain event, and not sooner, and failing him, to certain other persons as substitutes or conditional institutes to him, then, if he does not survive the period he takes no right under the settlement. I think that is settled law, and applicable to this case, and I am therefore of opinion that John Bryson Clark having died without heirs of his body, the duty of the trustees under the fourth head of the settlement is to convey the subjects in question to William Clark.

No. 38.
Nov. 26, 1880.
Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,
&c.

The other question involves considerations of an entirely different kind. The trustees are directed in a certain event to sell a certain subject, and to divide it in a particular way. The subject was that known as the Abbotsford Place subject, and is described in the settlement as the subject first conveyed. Now, in this same 4th head the trustees are directed within twelve months after the death of the longest liver of the testator and his wife, as follows:—"The subjects first above disposed, if not sold as after-mentioned, to be conveyed under the burden of said security" (that was a certain bond for £2000) "to John Bryson, my nephew, residing with me, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to William Bryson, his brother, whom failing, to John Bryson Clark, my wife's nephew, residing with me, whom failing, to William Clark, his brother, whom failing, to George Clark, his brother, whom failing, to his three sisters, Mary, Ann, and Margaret Bryson Clark, and their heirs." Now, the reservation "if not sold as after-mentioned" refers to a provision in the fifth head of the settlement, that "in case the holders of the bond affecting the subjects first above disposed resolve to call up their money, and intimate such resolution prior to the expiry of twelve months from the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me," the trustees are to complete titles to the subjects and sell the same, and, after paying the debt on them, to divide the proceeds into four equal parts, and to "pay to the said John Bryson, my nephew, and his heirs, one such share, the said William Bryson, my nephew, tees v. Clark,

and his heirs, one such share, the said John Bryson Clark and his heirs one such share, and the remaining share to be paid to the said Margaret Campbell, whom failing, the said John Bryson Clark, whom failing, his brother William, whom failing, his brother George," whom failing, to their three sisters and their heirs. Now, it must be observed that the parties who are to take benefit in the event of the subjects being sold are different from those who are to receive a disposition of the subjects if they remain unsold, and therefore the event on which the sale is made imperative on the trustees becomes very important in the question of carrying out the intention of the testator. One can hardly suppose that a testator would direct his trustees to divide the subjects if sold among one class of beneficiaries, and if not sold, among another class, and leave the question of selling or not selling to their discretion, or dependent on any mere chance. That does not seem a very rational purpose, and I should therefore be inclined to think that the event which was to operate this change in the destination of the subjects must be one capable of being determinately fixed, and the contemplation of which influenced the testator's mind in making this change of succession follow on that event. As the intention is expressed, it seems to be that if the holders of the bond should press for their money, and the trustees should have to pay up, the subjects were to be sold to enable them to do so. That seems to have been the idea present in the testator's mind. The events which actually occurred are described in the 7th article of the case. The bond for £2000 was held at the testator's death in 1851 by John Smith, writer, Falkirk, to the extent of £1000, and to the extent of the remaining £1000 by John Wilson. These gentlemen were both assignees to the portions of the bond which they respectively held. John Smith was the testator's agent, and continued after his death to be the agent of the trust. In November 1853 Mr Wilson, by a letter to Mr Smith, gave notice that he wanted payment of his money, and in February 1854 he was paid, granting at the same time an assignation in favour of Alexander Macvey, Carron, and Mr Smith's part of the bond was, in July 1854, assigned to Mrs Foord, Brackenless. The trustees did not think this was the event contemplated in the fifth purpose of the settlement, and accordingly did not bring the subjects to sale. The question is, whether they were right or wrong in doing as they did? On the 3d of February 1875 they did sell the property, and quite rightly, on the bond being called up. But this sale in 1875 could not affect the present question, though it does alter the condition of the subjects from heritable to moveable, and makes the price divisible as directed in the deed. But if the trustees were wrong not to sell in 1854 the subjects must be dealt with as if they had then sold them, and the result would be that Mrs Bryson, as assignee of John Bryson Clark, would be entitled to a share of the price under the fifth head of the settlement, because by reason of the sale, if it had taken place, John Bryson Clark would have been vested in one-fourth of the price. The whole question is, whether the trustees were right or wrong in not selling in 1854. I am not disposed to think that any assignation of this bond necessarily came up to what the testator meant when he spoke of the bondholders calling up their money, and intimating their resolution to do so. He seems to have contemplated the whole money being called up, and to have thought that that would embarrass the trustees in holding the property, and that so it would be better to sell. Now, all that actually happened was this. Mr Wilson, who was an assignee to one half of the bond, said he wanted his money.

There was no very formal intimation of his wish, though I should not be inclined to lay much stress on that, but he got payment and assigned his share to another person. Only a fragment of the bond was called up, and, for aught we know, the other half was not called up at all. I do not think this was what was contemplated by the testator. The trustees were not embarrassed, or necessitated to find £2000 as the testator contemplated they might be. In addition, the information we have as to what occurred in 1853 and 1854 is not very complete or definite. No blame attaches on account of that to the parties, for almost everybody is now dead who could have given any information on the subject; but if our information is imperfect and defective the presumption arises that what the trustees did in their discretion was rightly done. That presumption is only fair. On the whole matter I am disposed to think—and without difficulty—that it has not been made out by the party who contends that a sale should have taken place in 1854, that the events had then occurred which were contemplated by the testator in his settlement.

I think, therefore, on this point we should answer the third question in favour of the fourth parties, and that disposes of the whole matter.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the properties in Graham's Road and Bainsford, Falkirk, did not vest in John Bryson Clark, and were not carried by his disposition and assignation, or his testament, and that William Clark is entitled to a conveyance of these properties: Find and declare that the fourth parties are entitled to one-fourth share of the reversion of the price of the Abbotsford Place property, and decern."

Arbitration—Objections to decree—Arbiter applying for loan from parties-submitters.—An arbiter who was the intimate friend of both the parties-submitters having, during the dependence of the submission, become involved in financial difficulties, applied to each of the parties successively for a loan of £1000. The loan was refused by both parties, and the submission was proceeded with until a final award was pronounced. In an action of reduction of the award at the instance of one of the parties on the ground of legal corruption on the part of the arbiter in consequence of his actings in connection with the application for a loan, held that his application, although in the abstract liable to misconstruction, was not in itself corrupt, and decree of reduction refused accordingly.

FROM August 1869 until December 1877 Messrs John Morison and John Morison junior, wine and spirit merchants, Edinburgh, and John Thomson, brewer there, carried on business as brewers and maltsters in Edinburgh, under the firm of J. & J. Morison & Thomson. In the end of 1877 or beginning of 1878 disputes having arisen among the partners, it was agreed that Mr Thomson should retire from the copartnery, and that the amount to be paid him upon so retiring should be fixed by arbitration. The arbiter selected was a Mr James Steel, a mutual friend of both parties, who had formerly himself been a brewer in Glasgow, and was then a wine and spirit merchant there. A formal minute of reference to Mr Steel was entered into on 15th May 1878, the Morisons being parties on the one side and Thomson the party on the other.

On 5th June 1878 Mr Steel duly accepted the office of arbiter, and claims were lodged by the parties to the submission, and a record made up. Mr Thomson died on 17th April 1879, but in terms of the minute of reference the trustees appointed by him in his trust-deed and settlement were sisted as parties to the submission. On several days in May and June 1879 proof was led before the arbiter, and counsel were heard by him upon the whole case. On 28th July 1879 the arbiter issued notes of his proposed award to the parties. Representations were lodged for both parties against certain findings in the notes so issued, and Messrs Morison applied for an oral hearing on their objections to the proposed award. On 14th October 1879 the arbiter issued a draft award, which bore to proceed upon consideration of the representations of parties, and in which, to some extent, his views as expressed in his former notes were modified partly in favour of the Morisons. Thereafter, on 12th November 1879, the arbiter refused to allow an oral hearing. On 4th February 1880 the final decreet-arbitral was pronounced, the result of which was to find a sum of about £12,000 due by the Morisons to Thomson's trustees.

Messrs Morison had, in the meantime, on 12th December 1879, lodged a note of protest against the arbiter proceeding in the submission for certain reasons therein given, which were substantially the same as the reasons of reduction after-mentioned. In this protest they reserved their right to bring a reduction of any award that might be pronounced.

Accordingly, on 27th February 1880, Messrs Morison raised an action of reduction of the award of 4th February. In their condescendence they averred,—(Cond. 6) "While the process was at avizandum with the arbiter, and about the middle of July 1879, he called on Mr Thomas Duncan, of Messrs D. & T. Duncan, wine merchants and commission agents, 100 West Regent Street, Glasgow, the agents in Glasgow for the pursuers, and known to the arbiter to be so, the said Thomas Duncan having been examined as a witness at the proof before the arbiter, and the arbiter explained to the said Thomas Duncan that he wanted to raise a loan of £2500 to enable him to pay an overdraft from the City of Glasgow Bank, for which he was being pressed by the liquidators of the said bank, and that he proposed to ask a Mr Fraser, a wholesale spirit merchant, for £1000 of the amount, and give him, as an inducement, the whole of his trade in spirits, meaning thereby the supplying of the whole of the spirits required to be purchased by the arbiter for the business carried on by him as a wine and spirit merchant and restaurateur at the Cross of Glasgow, and to ask a Mr Dalrymple for £500, and give him the whole of his trade in porter, and to ask the pursuers for £1000, and give them, as an inducement, the whole of his trade in ales, and he accordingly asked the said Thomas Duncan to lay his said proposal before the pursuers, and to keep it private, as he said it was a delicate matter on account of the dependence of the said submission, and to report to him what answer the pursuers should make to it. Mr Duncan called on the pursuers in Edinburgh on or about 21st July 1879, and communicated to them the said proposal. The pursuers were placed in a position of great difficulty by this request from the arbiter for a loan. They were unwilling to entertain it, and Mr Duncan, although anxious to avail himself of an opportunity of extending the trade of the brewery through his agency, did not recommend it. The pursuers felt that in the circumstances in which they were placed towards the arbiter they could not venture to give his proposal a direct refusal, but they informed Mr Duncan that before they could entertain it they would require to know the arbiter's position in respect of his liabilities, and what security he intended to offer. Mr Duncan gave an answer to that effect to the arbiter. The arbiter was not a customer of the said brewery, and he had apparently no other reason for applying to the pursuers for the said loan than that they were parties before him in the said submission, and were deemed by him likely on that account to give him the required loan." The pursuers also relied upon certain letters written by the arbiter to them in reference to the loan above-mentioned, and on an application made on 4th November to Mr John Sime Thomson, Mr Thomson's son and one of his trustees, for a loan of a similar sum made after they had declined to make the required advance. They, in addition, adduced as reasons of reduction the refusal by the arbiter to allow an oral hearing on their objections to the notes of award issued by him, and also that there had been a correspondence between the clerk to the submission and the agents for Thomson's trustees as to the amount of the arbiter's fee.

Pleaded for the Morisons;—(1) The arbiter having been guilty of grossly improper and illegal conduct and of corruption within the meaning of the Act of Regulations, 1695, the said decree-arbitral is illegal and corrupt, and ought to be reduced. (2) The loan asked by the arbiter from the pursuers having been of the character of a gift, or at all events involving large benefit to the arbiter, the whole subsequent proceedings in the submission were and are corrupt, illegal, and invalid. (3) The arbiter having acted improperly, illegally, and corruptly in unfairly increasing his original findings in several particulars, in refusing the reasonable request of the pursuers for a further hearing, and in refusing to correct errors pointed out to him by them, and otherwise as condescended on, the said decree-arbitral is corrupt, illegal, and invalid. (5) The arbiter having improperly and illegally bargained with Mr Thomson's trustees for a fee before issuing his decree-arbitral, and, separatim, that fee being exorbitant, the said decree-arbitral was in the circumstances obtained by bribery and corruption, and is illegal and invalid. (6) The arbiter having misconducted himself and given reasonable grounds for a suspicion of unfairness, and of having negotiated with both parties to the submission for loans and favours, the said decree-arbitral cannot be sustained.

Pleaded for Thomson's trustees;—(1) The pursuers having concealed from the defenders the whole matters now alleged by them upon which they found the charge of corruption, until the arbiter had pronounced his final findings, and having continued to plead before him and to take their chance of a more favourable judgment, they are now barred from impugning the decree. (3) The arbiter not having been guilty of corrupt conduct, or of bargaining or taking bribes, and having exercised his functions as arbiter to the best of his ability, the defenders should be assolized. (4) The defenders being entirely free from any corrupt conduct, and having had no knowledge of the communications between the arbiter and the pursuers, the pursuers are not entitled, in the circumstances, to have the decree-arbitral set aside.

A proof was allowed, from which it appeared that Steel, the arbiter, had been for long on intimate terms with both the Morisons and the late Mr Thomson and his family. That in 1879, Steel having largely overdrawn his account with the City of Glasgow Bank, was being pressed by the

No. 39. liquidators of that bank for payment, and had, after trying in vain to raise money through his agents on the security of certain heritable property of which he was possessed, made the application referred to by the Morisons in their reasons of reduction. Mr Morison junior, who had conducted the negotiations with Steel as to the proposed loan, stated that when the application was made to him in July 1879 he had purposely left the matter open, partly for fear of offending the arbiter, and partly until he saw the result of their representation against the notes issued by him in July.

On 20th July 1880 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—
“ Finds that the defender, James Steel, did not act corruptly in pronouncing the decree-arbital libelled : Finds that the pursuers on or about 16th July 1879, and while the arbitration referred to in the summons was still depending, received from the arbiter, through Mr James Duncan, their agent in Glasgow, an application for a loan of £1000, and that they entertained the proposal, or allowed the said James Steel to proceed in the arbitration, to issue notes of his proposed findings, and to receive representations and answers with reference thereto, in the belief that it was a proposal which could be entertained : And finds that they thereby waived any right which they might have had to found upon the said proposal as disqualifying the arbiter : Finds, further, that the procedure in the submission was regular, and that the pursuers have failed to prove any unfairness, excess of power, or neglect of duty on the part of the arbiter : Therefore repels the reasons of reduction, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns : Finds the defenders entitled to expenses,” &c.*

* “ NOTE.—In May 1878 it was agreed between the pursuers and their now deceased partner, Mr William Thomson, that the latter should retire from the brewing business carried on by them upon payment to him by the pursuers of the value of his share and interest in the concern under the contract of copartnership, and a submission was entered into for the purpose of determining the amount so to be paid. The arbiter named was Mr James Steel, a friend of both parties, and formerly a brewer in Glasgow. He is called as a defender in this action, which craves reduction of the decree-arbital, dated 4th February 1880. The chief ground of reduction libelled is, that the arbiter acted corruptly in pronouncing his decree, inasmuch as, pending the submission, he made a proposal to the pursuers for a loan of £1000, and was influenced in his final award by the pursuers' conduct in not agreeing to the proposal. There are other grounds stated. In particular, it was urged that he improperly refused to the pursuers an oral hearing upon the proposed findings, and that he communicated to the parties before the decree-arbital was signed, through the clerk to the reference, the amount of the fee which he expected as arbiter. But, as the refusal of an oral hearing was after written representations and answers for both parties upon the subject had been received and considered, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the case is not one in which such refusal affords a ground of reduction. It is not suggested that the pursuers had less opportunity of being heard than the other party, and it appears to the Lord Ordinary that both parties were allowed abundant opportunity of submitting their views. And, as regards the communication about the arbiter's fee, it is sufficient to say that it took place after the award had been finally settled, and in consequence of an inquiry at the clerk to the reference ; it was not a case of bargaining about the fee pending the submission.

“ But the proceedings with reference to the arbiter's proposal for a loan require to be more particularly considered. The facts are as follows :—The arbiter had heard counsel for the parties on 16th June 1879, after the conclusion of the proof, and he then proceeded to consider his decision. He appears to have made a very full investigation, and, as his proposed findings were issued on 28th July, his statement, that on 16th July he had substantially settled with the clerk to the reference the general principles of his award, is probably correct. On that day (16th July) he went to Mr Duncan, the agent in Glasgow for the pursuers' brewery, and inquired as to the probability of the pursuers being able and willing to lend him £1000 on the security of property, which he valued at £22,000, but which was already burdened to the extent of £16,000, and on the further security of his beer business, which he estimated as worth to a brewer about £400 or £500 a-year. The result was that Mr Duncan wrote on that day to the pursuers the letter No. 440 of process. Although marked private, it is evident that Mr Duncan saw no impropriety in such a proposal. For he not only transmitted it without hesitation, but explained, in answer to the Lord Ordinary, that he saw no objection to the transaction except that it was not a good investment. There is no doubt that Mr Steel was pressed for money at the time, owing to his debt to the City of Glasgow Bank (to which he owed £3000, for which decree had been taken); but his unwillingness to sell his property at that time is very intelligible, and there is no reason to doubt that he had a fair-going business, and some reason to think that his credit was not so bad but that he might look for assistance from friends upon such security as he could offer. He had already been promised £1500 by two friends upon the security of his wine and porter business. And, on the whole, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied, both upon his own evidence and the other evidence in the case, that there was no corrupt idea or consciousness of impropriety in the mind of Mr Steel in making the proposal.

"The question remains, however, whether at any subsequent stage of the proceedings, prior to his final award, he acted corruptly in connection with this matter of the proposed loan, or allowed himself to be influenced by the pursuers' conduct in regard to it. What happened was, that he personally saw the pursuers on the subject. He states that he did not see them until after the proposed findings were in their hands, and gives a reason for that impression. But the Lord Ordinary is not disposed to doubt the accuracy of the pursuers' statement, that he saw them both on the 21st July and in the beginning of August, about eight days after the proposed findings were issued. The way in which the pursuers treated the proposal is not satisfactory. They say that they felt at once that the proposal placed them in a situation of delicacy and embarrassment; but that they did not like to offend the arbiter by refusing to entertain his proposal, and accordingly professed to entertain it, and to be desirous of receiving further information as to the securities offered. They allowed him to leave under the idea that he would have the loan, if the securities were satisfactory. Before Mr Steel's visit in the beginning of August they had consulted their law-agent on the subject, and he had told them at once to let the arbiter know that the proposal could not be entertained during the dependence of the submission. This was very proper advice, and the Lord Ordinary sees no reason why the pursuers should not have acted on it. There was no awkwardness whatever in their letting Mr Steel know that they had been so advised. They had no right to assume that he would be offended at them for doing so, and no reason to fear him if he did take offence, and act unjustly, in consequence of their doing what was right. Mr Steel might have exposed himself to an objection as arbiter by his indiscreet conduct. But they were not entitled to hoard up the objection, and to allow him to go on in the belief that the pursuers, as well as himself, felt no difficulty in treating for the loan, as a matter which should not affect in any way the arbitration proceedings. Instead of doing so, however, they allowed him to go on in ignorance of the advice they had got, and of the feeling of delicacy and embarrassment which they say troubled them. Mr Morison junior went to Glasgow to see Mr Steel on the subject about 22d August. At that time, if not sooner, it was known that the pursuers were to put in a representation against the proposed findings; and on that occasion Mr Steel gave Mr Morison junior to understand that the loan proposal would have to wait until the arbitration was settled; and nothing more was said or done about the matter until after clear case of corruption was made out. This arbiter, having found it impossible to raise money in the ordinary way, applied to one of the parties-submitters before him for a loan on unmarketable security, and, when refused the accommodation, used his utmost endeavour to injure the party declining to help him. Any such actings as had here taken place were sufficient to invalidate an award.¹ Where it was evident that an arbiter intended to use his office for his own profit it was unnecessary for the party challenging his award to connect the corrupt state of his mind with any particular part of the award. It was therefore unnecessary for the pursuers to shew exactly wherein they were damaged. The corrupt intention was enough.² The fact also that a rehearing was refused in the circumstances was sufficient ground for setting aside the award.³

14th October, when the arbiter issued the interlocutor or note No. 84 of process, disposing of the representations, and of the question of expenses in the arbitration. The terms of that interlocutor or note shew that the arbiter had fully considered the matters brought before him in the representations, and then finally committed himself to the views (to a considerable extent favourable to the pursuers) upon which his valuation proceeded. The alterations which he made were insignificant, and are explained. The letters of 2d and 4th November, printed in Cond. 12, were thus written after the arbiter had not only intimated his decision, but had disposed of the representations on both sides, and of the matter of expenses. The pursuers' note of 11th November asking an oral hearing was, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, quite legitimately refused; and the evidence affords no support to the allegation that it was issued under feelings of irritation on account of the pursuers' refusal of the arbiter's request for a loan. The letter of 13th November shews no irritation whatever; and on 27th November the arbiter issued the interlocutor No. 86 of process in reference to a point which had occurred in preparing the decree-arbitral as to the form of the decerniture. It was not until 12th December that the pursuers lodged their note protesting against the arbiter proceeding farther in the reference.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers, unless they could have proved actual corruption on the part of the arbiter (which they have failed to do), had previously waived any right which they might have had to allege that the arbiter, by the mere fact of his proposal for a loan, had disqualified himself from acting as arbiter. The mere statement of the facts, as disclosed in the proceedings, and in the evidence of the pursuers themselves, appears sufficient to shew this.

"It is upon these views of the case that the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the foregoing interlocutor. He considers it unnecessary to go into the details of the proof. But it is proper to add that the evidence of the leading witnesses was, in his opinion, creditably free from any attempt at exaggeration. The pursuers did not in the least conceal their unfortunate want of candour and sincerity in their communications with Mr Steel. And Mr Steel, on the other hand, while he admitted, under the searching examination through which he was put, his consciousness now of the indiscretion he committed in opening such a proposal before the arbitration was finally settled, gave his evidence in such a manner as to convince the Lord Ordinary that he was entirely free from corrupt motive.

"The evidence relating to the proposal to Mr Thomson on 4th November really throws no additional light on the matter. Before that date the arbiter had finally intimated his decision, and his proposal of the loan to Mr Thomson, when he ascertained that the pursuers were not going on with it, does not appear to the Lord Ordinary, in the whole circumstances, to afford evidence of corruption, or of any such misconduct as should vitiate the decree-arbitral."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A dispute arose between the partners in this brewing business, the course of which it is unnecessary to follow. It suffices to say that finally it was agreed that the amount to be paid to Mr Thomson on his retiring from the firm was to be fixed by arbitration. The arbiter selected was a Mr Steel, who had been at one time employed in a similar business, and who, therefore, was presumably familiar with the details of such a concern. The reference was adjusted and entered into in May 1878. In the course of the next year, Steel, the arbiter, got into difficulties owing to the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, with which he was involved, and he proposed, in July 1879, to borrow £1000 from the Morisons, one of the parties-submitters before him in the reference. To this request he received no definite answer until the following November. Mr Morison junior says, however, in his evidence that he, to some extent purposely, left Steel, after the interviews in July, under the impression that the loan might be got,—his object in leaving the matter thus apparently open being, he explains, that before deciding he wished to see the nature of the arbiter's final award. In November, however, after becoming acquainted with the terms of the award, he wrote Steel declining to make the desired advance. Steel thereupon made an application for a loan to Mr John Sime Thomson, the son and one of the trustees of the late Mr Thomson, and therefore one of the parties-submitters. Mr Thomson, under the advice of his agent, declined to give the loan, the obstacle being that as a party to the reference he could not enter into such a transaction with the arbiter pending the proceedings. Neither of the parties, however, proposed to put a stop to the reference, or in any way to suspend the proceedings, until 17th December 1879, when the pursuers lodged a protest against the arbiter proceeding.

The question now raised for our decision is whether these applications made by the arbiter to the parties-submitters render nugatory the award, and whether these actings on the part of the arbiter were corrupt in the sense of the Act of Regulations.

Apart from this general ground, the award has also been challenged upon two more special grounds—(1) That the arbiter, after issuing the notes of his proposed award, refused an application by one of the parties to be heard orally upon them. That is a ground of challenge which has often been stated to arbiters' awards, but I think that, except in very peculiar circumstances, it is absolutely within the discretion of an arbiter to decide whether he will hear parties of new or not. I am of opinion the arbiter in this case acted rightly in refusing a rehearing. (2) The second objection is as to the correspondence and discussion as to the arbiter's fee ; but we have heard no argument on that point, and it is therefore unnecessary to advert to it.

The general question is whether the arbiter approached his decision with a clear and impartial mind? Now, as a general proposition, in such a case, I should say that if the act alleged against the arbiter be in itself corrupt in the sense of the Act of Regulations,—that is to say illegal in itself—it would not be necessary to shew that it had a direct effect upon the mind of the arbiter, and had influenced it in order to support a challenge of his award. I think that any act which was in its nature sufficient unduly to bias the quasi judicial mind of an arbiter would be enough to justify a challenge of his award. But if the act be indifferent in itself, and of a nature not necessarily unduly to influence the arbiter's mind, then it will fall upon the challenger to shew, at all events, that the act may reasonably be presumed to have left the arbiter's mind deprived of the free and impartial quality essential in his position. The cases of Elliot and Mackenzie illustrate the distinction which I desire to make. The questions in these cases were not whether the actings of the arbiters were corrupt, but whether the arbiters had not so mixed themselves up with the subjects in dispute as to preclude them from being in the position of viewing them dispassionately. This case is in an entirely different position. The act objected to is one entirely apart from and independent of the arbitration. The question really comes to be whether anything occurred in this arbitration which necessarily would influence the mind of the arbiter. I have read the evidence carefully, and, to my mind, there is nothing which is necessarily to be presumed, or can be presumed to have unduly biassed the mind of the arbiter. I think that there is nothing illegal in itself in a business transaction between an arbiter and the parties-submitters before him, provided the transaction has nothing to do with the arbitration. It may be that the proceeding as now attempted to be construed appears to be an improper one, but it had no connection with the arbitration, and although, in any view, it may not be entirely excusable in the abstract, still I have no doubt that none of the parties at first had any idea that it had any bearing on the question submitted, or on the award. When the arbiter made the applications for this loan time was of the utmost importance to him. He had already exhausted all the ordinary channels through which a loan could be obtained. I do not think that we are bound to assume that he went to these persons, who were old and intimate friends, in order to be influenced in his award by the success or non-success of his application. We are rather bound to hold, on the other hand, that he went to them because he had to get the money, and that at once. Morison gave him no definite answer for three or four months, and then after becoming aware of the terms of the award as finally adjusted, he stated that he was unable to give the required advance. That was urged upon us as proof that he waited until he knew the nature of the final award, for fear that an answer in the negative before then might have an effect upon the arbiter's mind unfavourable to him. But I am inclined to give a more simple explanation of his behaviour. When he became convinced that the arbiter was going to find so large a sum due by him to Thomson's trustees, he thought that he would have no money left available for the loan. Therefore, as regards Morison, I think there is no ground for supposing that the arbiter's mind was influenced one way or the other. As regards Thomson, before the arbiter applied to him at all his mind was fully made up as to his award, and the terms of the award had been communicated to the parties. The arbitration, it is true, was not finally and formally at end, but the lines upon which the award was to be given were definitely fixed. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that there is not here any solid ground for imputing corruption to any of the parties. It may be that the arbiter committed a mistake in not considering the aspect which his application might be made to bear, but I think he was thoroughly honest.

The other ground on which the Lord Ordinary proceeds, viz. that Morison waived any right he might have had to challenge the award, involves principles upon which I am not prepared to rest my judgment, although I am willing to acquiesce in the interlocutor as it stands. It seems to me that if a corrupt act had been done by the arbiter it would take a great deal of acquiescence to bar challenge of his award. Nothing, however, in this case really occurred to suggest dishonesty on the part of the arbiter to the mind of Morison, and accordingly the arbitration was allowed to go on to the close. For the reasons I have given, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion also, and I do not know whether I may add, concurring as I do most thoroughly in your Lordship's observations on the question of waiver, that perhaps the best form for our interlocutor to take would be to repel the reasons of reduction. I say so because I feel a difficulty as to the Lord Ordinary's second ground of judgment, viz. waiver. I feel so strongly that this arbiter was quite honest, that I am not willing to suggest that there was any corrupt act on his part which could be waived.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is certainly the form of interlocutor which I should have preferred, but I am not prepared to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as if we in any way disagreed with him.

THE COURT adhered.

Heron v. Gray.

JAMES HERON (Pursuer), Appellant.—Keir—A. J. Young.
WILLIAM A. GRAY (Defender), Respondent.—Kinnear—Darling.

Property—Urban tenement—Implied servitude of light and air.—A property company purchased, in one lot, a villa and surrounding garden ground. Thereafter they divided the subjects into two lots, the first of which consisted of a shop, which they had erected on the plot of ground lying to the front of the villa, and two cellars or warerooms—part of the sunk storey of the villa—which, for more than forty years, had received light and air through two small windows in the south gable, which overlooked the plot of ground adjoining. This lot the company sold to A, together with the solum of the piece of ground on which the shop was built, and a right of property in common with the proprietors of the villa in the solum of the piece of ground on which the warerooms were situated. In the following year the company sold the remainder of the property to B. This lot consisted of the villa, other than the part of the sunk storey already sold to A, together with a right of property, along with A, in the solum of the piece of ground on which said house was built, together with the piece of ground, or green, lying to the back and south of the house, with right to make use of it as absolute owner, it being thereby declared that there was no restriction against building, or any right of servitude affecting the said piece of ground. B erected on the piece of ground to the south of the house a wooden screen, in such a manner as to obstruct the windows of the warerooms. Held that he was not entitled so to obstruct the windows, on the ground that A's title gave him, as at the date of purchase, an implied servitude of air and light over the said plot of ground, and

No. 40. that the subsequent declaration in B's title, that there was not "any right of servitude affecting the said piece of ground," could not override the implied servitude.

Heron v. Gray.

2D Division.
Sheriff of Midlothian.

By disposition dated 10th and 11th May 1877, and recorded in the division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Edinburgh, 16th May 1877, Lauchlan M'Kinnon junior, advocate in Aberdeen, sold and disposed to and in favour of the Scottish National Heritable Property Company (Limited), and their assignees, All and Whole "that lot of ground of the lands of Belleville, and house built thereon, No. 1 Arniston Place, Edinburgh." This house and ground had been occupied as an undivided villa residence since the year 1810, when the ground was feued by the then proprietor, and the house built. When the property company purchased the subjects there were in the ground storey of the house, and in the south gable thereof, certain openings, for the purpose of admitting light and air to the sunk flat. These apertures, or windows, overlooked a piece of ground which lay to the south, between the house and Salisbury Road. The property company divided the property into two lots, of which the first consisted of a shop, which they built on a piece of ground lying to the west of the house, between it and Arniston Place, and of the western or front portion of the sunk flat of the house. The sunk flat was intended for warerooms for the new shop, and to make it suitable for this purpose the two apertures or windows above mentioned were enlarged to the size of three feet square. The second lot into which the subjects were divided consisted of the remaining portion of the old house, together with, inter alia, the piece of ground lying to the south thereof.

By disposition dated 12th and 19th, and recorded in said Register of Sasines 25th June 1878, the Scottish National Heritable Property Company, in consideration of the price of £1750, sold and disposed to and in favour of James Heron, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, "All and Whole that shop No. 1A Arniston Place, Newington, Edinburgh, situated at the corner of Arniston Place and Salisbury Road, there, together with the cellar underneath said shop, and together also with the two cellars, or warerooms, forming the western or front portions of the sunk or ground flat of the dwelling-houses Nos. 1 and 2 Arniston Place, now communicating with the said shop, with entrance to the said two cellars or warerooms from the said shop, together with (first) the solum of the piece of ground on which the said shop is built; (second) a right of property in common with the proprietors of the said dwelling-houses to the solum of the piece of ground on which the said cellars or warerooms are situated; which shop, with the cellar immediately below the same, and entrance to the said two cellars or warerooms, are erected upon part of the area of ground lying to the front of the said last mentioned dwelling-house, and the southmost of the said two back cellars or warerooms forms part of the said dwelling-house, and which dwelling-house, with the ground pertaining thereto, is described in the titles."

By disposition dated 10th and recorded 11th November 1879 William Affleck Gray, doctor of medicine, in consideration of the price of £800, acquired from the company the remaining portion of the dwelling-house, viz., "All and Whole the self-contained dwelling-house No. 1 Arniston Place, now entering by No. 23 Salisbury Road, Edinburgh, in the county of Edinburgh, but excepting always the front or westmost portion of the sunk storey of said dwelling-house, disposed by said company to James Heron, merchant, No. 5 Arniston Place, Edinburgh, along with the shop at the corner of Arniston Place, and Salisbury Road, Edinburgh, with access to the said dwelling-house by the passage and stair leading thereto from Salisbury Road, together with a right of property, along with the said James Heron, to the solum of the piece of ground on which the said house is built; together with the piece of ground, or green, lying to the east and south of the said dwelling-house, as the same is now enclosed, with right to make use of it as absolute owner, it being hereby declared that there is no restriction against building on or any right of servitude affecting the said piece of ground.”

Heron v. Gray.

It appeared from the record that a question having arisen between Mr Heron and Dr Gray as to whether the disposition granted to the latter gave him the sole right, unburdened by any servitude, to the piece of ground lying south of the house, into which the windows of the warehouse belonging to Heron looked, Dr Gray, for the purpose of trying the question, “placed on the said area of ground a wooden structure, or boarding, hard against the said southmost gable of said house, and for the sole purpose, and with the effect, of closing up the windows in that division of said gable which forms the southmost wall of said warerooms.”

Thereupon Heron presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh praying the Court to find and declare that he had a right of property in common with Dr Gray to the solum of the said piece of ground; and further “to find and declare that the defender has no right to make any erections or buildings on said area of ground which will in any way interfere with, affect, or injure the pursuer’s property, which forms the westmost or front portion of the sunk or ground flat of the said dwelling-house No. 1 Arniston Place, Edinburgh, now used as warerooms, or the pursuer’s rights in said area of ground; and to find and declare that the wooden structure or boarding placed by the defender on the said area of ground, near or against that part of the southmost gable of said dwelling-house which forms the southmost wall of the said warerooms (the western part of the ground flat of said house) belonging to pursuer, is illegal and unwarrantable, and to ordain the defender to remove it forthwith.”

The screen having been put up solely with the view of asserting the defender’s right to build on the said piece of ground was removed by him when the case came into Court.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer, in respect of the circumstances condescended on, and particularly of the disposition in his favour, is proprietor of and entitled to the rights and others sought to be declared, including the rights of light and ventilation mentioned, and as these are now interfered with he is entitled to the decree craved. (3) In respect of the terms of the titles, and particularly of said deed of agreement, there exists a servitude on the ground in dispute which bars the defender’s alleged rights, and entitles the pursuer to the findings craved. (6) In any event, the pursuer has at least a right of common interest in the area in question, and is therefore entitled to decree of removing and prohibition as craved, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having, under his titles, no right of property in or servitude affecting the ground upon which the erections complained of have been made, and his averments of common proprietary or other right therein being unfounded, is not entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the prayer of the petition, and the defender should therefore be assolizied with expenses. (2) The defender, as absolute and unrestricted proprietor of the ground in question in virtue of his titles, is entitled to make the erections complained of, and should therefore be assolizied from the prayer of the petition.

On 2d August, 1880, the Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) issued the following interlocutor:—“Finds that the present question relates to an enclosed piece of ground lying between Salisbury Road and the south gable of the house No. 1 Arniston Place: Finds that said piece of ground is not in-

No. 40. cluded within the pursuer's title, and that he has no right of property, either exclusive or common, thereto, nor any servitude thereon : There-

Heron v. Gray.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Davidson), who, on 4th October 1880, adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, but did not there contend that he had a right of common property in the said piece of ground.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The windows in the gable were made before the property was subdivided by the Property Company, and a right to light and air was implied in the sale of the warerooms as a separate tenement.¹ In every sale of land all incidental rights essential to the reasonable enjoyment of the subject of the sale are implied.²

Argued for defender ;—The defender's title clearly shewed that there was no servitude over the piece of ground in question. A negative urban servitude such as was here claimed could not be constituted by prescription.³

LORD GIFFORD.—This is a question as to a right of property in and servitude over a small piece of ground situated to the south of Dr Gray's house in Salisbury Road. The piece of ground is very limited in extent, and the pursuer, Mr Heron, claims, first, a right of property over it, and, alternatively, and in addition, he asks the Court to find and declare that the defender has no right to make any erections or buildings on the said piece of ground which will in any way interfere with his, the pursuer's, property or rights. I have come to be of the opinion that both parties are wrong in the strong contentions which they have advanced. I am of opinion that the pursuer has no right of common property in this piece of ground, but that the solum is the exclusive property of Dr Gray. But, on the other hand, I think that the pursuer, being the proprietor of the sunk storey, is entitled to a right of servitude of light for his warerooms. Originally the whole property consisted of a dwelling-house with a sunk flat, and also a front plot of ground. This property came into the hands of the National Heritable Property Company, who altered its condition, and built on the front plot a shop, and then sold the new shop and the sunk flat of the old house to Mr Heron, and the remaining part of the dwelling-house to Dr Gray. The question is, what right has the proprietor of the shop to any portion of the ground to the south of the original dwelling-house—is it a right of property or a servitude, or neither ? In order to answer this question we must look to the title-deeds. The first was granted in 1878 to Mr Heron, the second to Dr Gray in 1879. By his conveyance Mr Heron got the shop together with the cellar below the shop. He also got the two warerooms under the dwelling-house and the solum of the ground on which the shop was built. He also got a right of property in common with the proprietors of the dwelling-house to the solum of the ground on which the warerooms were situated.

On the other hand, Gray in 1879 acquired the dwelling-house, "excepting always the front or westmost portion of the sunk storey of said dwelling-house disposed to James Heron, . . . together with a right of property along with the said James Heron to the solum of the piece of ground on which the said house is built, together with the piece of ground or green lying to the east and south of the said dwelling-house, as the same is now enclosed, with right to make use of it as absolute owner, it being hereby declared that there is no restriction against building on or any right of servitude affecting the said piece of ground." Now, if Dr Gray had got his right first, and recorded it, he would have had a very strong case for saying, "I have this piece of ground absolutely, and you can claim neither property nor servitude over it," but the question must be determined as at the date of the first infestment, viz., Heron's, and we must ask what were the rights he got by his disposition. Now, we are familiar with the law as to this kind of urban property. It is a common thing in Edinburgh to erect a property with a main-door and a sunk area, and then separate flats above. It is not unusual in such cases to give the proprietor of the main-door tenement an exclusive right not only to the plot in front but to the green behind. Nothing is said as to servitude, but there is an implied servitude in all such cases in favour of the proprietors of the upper flats, that the proprietor of the main-door house shall not erect buildings in the back-green so as to obstruct their lights. In one case the proprietor of the lower storey wished to build on the back-green, and, after remitting to the Dean of Guild to report whether the lights of the upper flats were interfered with, we stopped the operations on a report saying that they were. That applies directly to the present case. No doubt there is here given to Heron not the upper flat but a portion of the lower, but that portion is lighted by what were once small windows, and which are now windows three feet square. It is plain Heron was intended to have these windows, and access to the light and air they give. There is no right in Gray to block them up. On the other hand, Heron's claim is clearly untenable—the only proprietor of the ground is Dr Gray, and he may pave it or do what he likes with it, the only restriction on his use of it being that he shall not interrupt the light and air which comes to the pursuer's windows. He must have had this in view when he obtained a declaration in his titles that there was no servitude over the ground. That may or may not give him a right of recourse against his author, but will make no difference in a question with Heron. The windows have existed more than forty years, though they are now larger than they were. The proprietor of the shop is entitled to the benefit and use of them. This leads to a modification of the Sheriff's judgment. He is right in not affirming common property. The true view of the case is that there is an implied servitude of light, and that Dr Gray, though proprietor of the solum, is not entitled to cut off that light.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor, and found that the defender was sole and exclusive proprietor of the area of ground in question, but subject always to an implied servitude of light and air in favour of the pursuer as proprietor of a portion of the dwelling-house, No. 1 Arniston Place, and found and declared that the defender was not entitled to make any erection on the said area of ground that would in any way obstruct the access of light or air to the property of the pursuer, &c.

Entail—Heir in possession—Provisions to children, authority to charge fee and rents with, by bond and disposition in security—Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 21.—A deed of entail dated in 1799 conferred power upon the heirs of entail in possession to grant provisions to their younger children, not exceeding three years' free rents of the estates, provided that the bonds of provision should "contain this express condition, that the sums contained in the same shall not be exigible at once but shall be payable only by yearly instalments of ten per cent of the capital sum of such provisions, together with the interest due at the time." There was farther a declaration that the heirs in possession should pay regularly the instalments as they fell due, with interest, and should forfeit all right to the estate in the event of their allowing the instalments to fall three years in arrear, but there was no irritancy of the bonds.

In 1819 the heir of entail in possession granted a bond of provision in favour of his younger children for "a sum equal to three years' free rent of the said lands."

This provision became payable on the granter's death in 1876, and the succeeding heir of entail applied to the Court for power to charge the fee and rents of the estate with the amount by bond and disposition in security under the 21st section of the Rutherford Act.*

Held that notwithstanding that the amount of the provisions was payable in ten yearly instalments the 21st section applied, and petition granted.

JAMES HOPE JOHNSTONE, Earl of Hopetoun, by deed of trust dated 11th April 1793, conveyed the Annandale estates to trustees for the purpose of paying off the debts, burdens, and provisions affecting these estates in manner therein provided, and then of conveying them to a series of heirs therein named, or to any other series of heirs which he might point out by any future deed, but under the proviso that, should he at any time choose to make an entail of the said estates the disposition to be granted

* The Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 21, enacts, that "In all cases where an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland shall be liable to pay or to provide by assignation of the rents and proceeds of such estate for any sum or sums of money granted by any former heir of entail by way of provisions to younger children, in terms of the said recited Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Fourth, or in virtue of the powers to that effect contained in any deed of entail under which the heir of entail in possession holds, . . . it shall be lawful for such heir of entail in possession to charge the fee and rents of such estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or to charge the fee and rents of any portion of such estate other than as aforesaid, with the amount of such provisions, by granting bond and disposition in security over such estate, or such portion thereof other than as aforesaid, for such amount, with the due and legal interest thereof from the date of such bond and disposition in security, or any subsequent date, till repaid, and with corresponding penalties; and such bond and disposition in security may be in ordinary form binding the granter and his heirs of entail in their order successively to repay the principal sum therein, with interest and penalties as aforesaid, and may contain all clauses usual in bonds and dispositions in security granted over estates in Scotland held in fee-simple."

No. 41.
Nov. 27, 1880.
Hope Johnstone v. Hope
Johnstone.

This deed of trust was subsequently modified by supplementary deeds executed in 1800 and 1813. The Earl died in 1816.

In 1799 he had executed a deed of strict entail of the Annandale estates, proceeding on the narrative of the deed of trust of 1793, and under burden always of the trust-conveyance contained in that deed. This deed of entail conferred a power on the heirs of entail in possession to provide their children other than the heir succeeding to the estates "in competent portions and provisions, bearing interest from the death of the granter," but providing that the whole sum to be granted as portions and provisions to such younger children should not exceed three years' free rents of the estates; and "providing also that such portions or provisions to younger children as aforesaid shall be secured only by bonds of provision, binding for the regular payment thereof by instalments in manner after mentioned the heir of entail who for the time shall be in possession" of the said estates, "and that such bonds of provision shall contain an express condition that it shall not be in the power of the said younger children or their heirs or assignees to obtain adjudication against" the said estates, "or to use any other method of diligence whatever against the same, except for levying the rent and yearly profits thereof; and that such bonds of provision shall also contain this express condition, that the sums contained in the same shall not be exigible at once, but shall be payable only by yearly instalments of ten per cent of the capital sum of such provisions, together with the interest due at the time," beginning the first payment or consignment of such instalment of ten per cent of the aforesaid provisions, together with the interest due at the time, at the third term of Whitsunday or the third term of Martinmas, whichever shall first happen after the death of the heir in possession who shall have granted the said provisions, and continuing the payment or consignations of an instalment of 10 per cent of such provision, together with the interest due at the time, yearly thereafter, until the whole of such provisions shall be paid off, "and it is hereby specially provided and declared that all and each of the heirs and members of taillie before mentioned in possession of the foresaid" estates "at the time shall pay regularly as they fall due at the terms before mentioned the instalments of 10 per cent of the several provisions which shall have been granted in manner before mentioned, . . . and in no case shall any of the heirs or members of taillie suffer any of the said instalments and interest due along therewith to remain in arrear for three years from the time when he or she by this deed of entail ought to have paid the same."

It was further provided that the bonds of provision to be granted in virtue of this power should have inserted in them "the several conditions herein mentioned" on pain of nullity, and that any heir of entail in possession who should "fail or neglect to insert the several conditions hereinbefore mentioned" in the several bonds of provision to be granted by him, or should grant any other security for payment of the foresaid provisions, "except in the manner hereinbefore directed, or shall omit for three years complete to pay or consign in manner before directed any of the aforesaid instalments of 10 per cent of the aforesaid provisions payable to younger children, with the interest due along therewith, shall immediately amit, lose, and forfeit all right and title which he or she shall have or can pretend to the lands, &c. before mentioned, or any part thereof, and the same shall become void and extinct, and ipso facto fall, accresce to and devolve upon the next immediate heir or member of tailie in manner and under the conditions before mentioned, and such next immediate heir or member of tailie shall be obliged to establish a right in his or her person by declarator or otherwise within the time and in the same manner and under the like irritancy as is hereby provided respecting the other contraventions hereinbefore mentioned."

This deed of entail, though complete in itself, and registered in the Books of Council and Session after the granter's death, was never recorded in the Register of Tailzies, and was never feudalised. After they had cleared the estates of debt and otherwise implemented the trust-purposes the trustees under the trust-deed of 1793 executed two deeds of entail, the first of the main body of the Annandale estates, dated 9th December 1839, and the other of certain outlying properties which they had found it necessary to keep longer in their hands, dated 30th and 31st October and 1st November 1850, in favour of John James Hope Johnstone, eldest son of Lady Ann Johnstone Hope, and grandson of James Hope Johnstone, Earl of Hopetoun, and as such the heir of entail in possession under the deed of entail of 1799. There were inserted in these deeds the destination and whole conditions, prohibitions, clauses irritant and resolute, and other clauses, and in particular those above narrated having reference to children's provisions, contained in the deed of entail of 1799, all as directed by the deed of trust of 1793. These deeds of entail of 1839 and 1850 were duly recorded in the Register of Tailzies, and under these John James Hope Johnstone made up his title to the Annandale estates.

On the occasion of his marriage in 1816 John James Hope Johnstone, who was then heir-apparent of entail to the Annandale estates, his mother, Lady Ann Johnstone Hope, being still alive, bound himself on his succeeding to these estates to grant bond or bonds of provision "in the terms allowed and pointed out by said deed of entail" (of 1799) in favour of the younger children of his marriage, binding himself and the heirs of entail succeeding to him to pay to said younger children "such a sum as is allowed to be provided for the younger children of an heir in possession of said estates by said entail," but particularly providing and declaring that the bonds to be granted for the said provisions should be "made out and executed in exact conformity to the directions for that effect contained in the foresaid deed of entail, . . . so as due obedience may be paid to it in every respect, and no irritancy be incurred."

In implement of this obligation John James Hope Johnstone, after the succession to the estates opened to him by the death of his mother, though subject always to the trust-deed of 1793, and the unrecorded entail of 1799, granted at various dates four different bonds of provision.

First, Bond of provision, dated 11th January 1819, for "a sum equal to three years' free rent of the said lands," &c. This bond, while bearing to be granted in virtue of the powers conferred by the deed of entail of 1799, did not provide for the payment of the provision by instalments of 10 per cent per annum, and did not have inserted in it the whole several conditions anent provisions to children contained in the deed of entail, but merely the condition that it should not be the foundation of adjudication or other diligence against the lands.

Second, Bond of provision, dated 27th December 1839, for £12,000, being one year's free rents in the event of there being one child other than the heir, £24,000, being two years' free rents in the event of their being two children, and £36,000, being three years' free rent in the event of there being three or more children other than the heir. This bond bore to be granted under the powers conferred by the Aberdeen Act, which had passed in 1824, and by the deed of entail of 1839, and affected only the lands embraced in that entail. It contained no special provision for payment by instalments, and did not engross the various conditions directed to be inserted by the deed of entail.

Third, Supplementary bond of provision, dated 23d December 1853, affecting the lands embraced in the entail of 1850, with provisions of £3750, £7500, and £11,250, according as there were one, two, and three or more children other than the heir, but only to the effect of supplementing the bond of 1839, so as to secure that under the two bonds the full provisions granted by the bond of 1839 should be drawn, but no more. This bond contained a provision for payment by instalments, and that it should not be a foundation for adjudication or other diligence against the lands, but did not engross the other conditions directed by the deed of entail to be inserted.

Fourth, Bond of provision, dated 12th February 1861, granted by virtue of the powers contained in the entails of 1839 and 1850, and in the Aberdeen Act, for £1333, 6s. 8d., £2666, 13s. 4d., or £4000, according as there were one, two, or three or more children other than the heir, and that in addition to the provisions contained in the former bonds. This bond contained a provision for payment by instalments, and that it should not be a foundation for adjudication or other diligence against the estates, but none of the other conditions were directed to be inserted.

John James Hope Johnstone died in 1876, and was succeeded in the Annandale estates by his grandson, John James Hope Johnstone the younger.

John James Hope Johnstone the elder had eight children. The full provisions of £36,000 and £4000, or £40,000 in all, in favour of younger children, were therefore exigible under the bonds of 1839, 1853, and 1861. This sum was, without objection, in 1877, charged on the fee of the estate under the provisions of the Rutherford Act, and of the Entail Amendment Act, 1853.

Three years' free rents of the estates, however, as at the death of John James Hope Johnstone the elder amounted to £56,000, and a claim was made by the younger children, founded on the obligation in their father's marriage-contract of 1816 and on the bond of provision of 1819 and subsequent bonds, for an additional sum of £16,000. An action of declarator and payment was accordingly raised by them against John James Hope Johnstone the younger and the substitute heirs of entail, in which it was found, inter alia, "that the said bonds of provision are still to the extent of £16,280, 17s. 9d. valid and effectual against the defender, John James Hope Johnstone, as heir of entail, and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the said lands and estate."¹

The defender in this action, John James Hope Johnstone the younger, then presented a second petition to charge the fee and rents of the estate with this additional sum of £16,280, 17s. 9d. by granting bond and disposition in security therefor, in terms of the Rutherford Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 21, and the Entail Amendment Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 7.

The Lord Ordinary made a remit to Mr Archibald Steuart, W.S., who, in his report, raised the question as to the petitioner's right to charge the fee of the estates with the sum in question.

Mr Steuart presented for consideration the view that the provisions to which the Aberdeen Act applied were those only granted under the bonds of 1839, 1853, and 1861, and were therefore limited to the £40,000 which

No. 41. had been already paid and charged; that the balance of £16,000 still due and now sought to be charged was exigible only under the marriage-contract of 1816 and the bond of 1819; that that bond depended for its validity on the deed of entail of 1799 alone, and that the exercise of power thereby must be held to be controlled by the conditions contained in that deed of entail; that whatever, therefore, might have been held had the question been raised with reference to the provision of £40,000, to which the Aberdeen Act applied, it was clear that the condition of the entail that the provisions should only be exigible by ten yearly instalments applied to this balance of £16,000; that if so, the case was ruled by the decision in Campbell's case, Jan. 26, 1854, 16 D. 396, 26 Scot. Jur. 188, in which it was held that the 21st section of the Rutherford Act did not contemplate provisions of this qualified nature, but only provisions which, in accordance with the terms of the entail, formed a continuous burden upon the rents of the estate.

The Lord Ordinary, having considered Mr Steuart's report, on 20th June 1880 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the petitioner is not authorised by the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, or the other statutes recited in the petition, to charge the fee and rents of the estate with the sum of £16,280, 17s. 9d., as proposed: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.—. . . . It is said in the present case that the petitioner is within the scope of the clause" (the 21st section of the Rutherford Act), "inasmuch as he is liable to pay the balance of the provisions constituted by bond of provision executed by the deceased John James Hope Johnstone, of date 11th January 1819, and the other bonds granted in implement of his marriage-contract, and referred to in the judgment of Lord Young, adhered to by the Second Division of the Court on 19th May 1880. It was contended, on the other hand, on behalf of the next heirs of entail, that under the bonds of provision, and the marriage-contract to which they refer, the petitioner is not liable to pay the sum mentioned in the petition, excepting by instalments of ten per cent per annum, and is therefore not authorised by the clause founded on to charge the amount as a permanent burden on the estate. It was also contended that this point, as to the manner and time of payment, is settled by the terms of the decree contained in the judgment already referred to.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the contention of the respondents is well founded, and that the petition in its present shape must be refused.

"In the first place, it appears to him that the terms of Lord Young's judgment, adhered to by the Second Division, distinctly constitute the debt against the petitioner, and the heirs of entail succeeding to him, but only 'at the terms and by the instalments, all as specified and provided in said bond of provision.'

"In the second place, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that according to the sound construction of the bonds of provision no obligation is imposed upon the petitioner to pay the amount found due, otherwise than by instalments, as provided in the marriage-contract to which they relate. The marriage-contract provided that the provisions should be payable in manner mentioned in the deed of entail, and should be made out in exact conformity thereto. But the Lord Ordinary does not doubt, and it was not disputed on the part of the next heirs, that after the date of the Aberdeen Act it was in the power of the deceased Mr Hope Johnstone to grant provisions up to the limit authorised by that statute without the condition of payment by ten yearly instalments required by the deed of entail. The fact is, however, that although the later bonds refer also to the powers of the Aberdeen Act, none of them professes to grant provisions in excess of the obligation contained in the marriage-contract, and the latest of all, which purports to increase the provisions as far as the increase of rental then warranted, makes it an express condition that the 'provisions herein conceived, so far as the same shall be payable out of the lands, teinds, and others contained in the deed of entail second above mentioned, or from the heir of entail in possession thereof, shall not be exigible at once, but shall be payable only by yearly instalments of ten per cent of the capital sum.' The bond of 1853 contains a similar provision, and the bond of 1819 bears to be granted exclusively under the powers of the deed of entail, and in implement of the marriage-contract. It was suggested that the bond of 1839 might be read by itself, and as creating an obligation under the Aberdeen Act, altogether unsecured by reference to the terms of the marriage-contract. It rather appears to the Lord Ordinary that this bond admits of being so read. But as it professes to be in implement of the marriage-contract, and does not to any further extent than £36,000 free the marriage-contract obligation from the condition of payment by instalments, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that this bond sanctions the proposed charge of the balance of £16,280, 17s. 9d. It must be kept in view that the petitioner has already been allowed, under a former application referred to in the petition, to charge £40,000 on the fee and rents of the estate, and that the interlocutor of Lord Young expressly decerns for payment of this balance by instalments.

"If the Lord Ordinary's view be well founded it is necessary to look at the terms of the marriage-contract for the purpose of ascertaining the character and conditions of the petitioner's liability for this balance of £16,280, 17s. 9d. This is what the Lord Ordinary understands the Court to have done in decerning for payment of the sum by instalments, as concluded for in the action at the instance of Miss Lucy Hope Johnstone. In so far as the Lord Ordinary may have any right to examine a matter which appears to be already res judicata, he may say that the terms of the marriage-contract satisfy him that the obligation of the petitioner, in so far as standing upon that deed, is subject to the condition of payment by yearly instalments of ten per cent in terms of the deed of entail. The marriage-contract distinctly requires that the provisions shall 'be payable in manner mentioned in said deed of entail itself,' and the deed of entail not only imposed the condition of payment by yearly instalments at ten per cent, but provided that any heir who should grant provisions except in the manner therein directed, or should omit for three years to pay or consign in manner therein directed any of the required instalments, should forfeit all right to the estate.

"The result is that the only obligation imposed on the petitioner and the other heirs of entail with regard to the balance of the provisions is an obligation to pay by ten yearly instalments; and the question of law raised by the present petition is whether such an obligation enables the heir now in possession to take advantage of the 21st clause of the Rutherford Act, to the effect of granting a bond and disposition in security constituting the amount a permanent burden on the estate. This appears to the Lord Ordinary to be precisely the same question which was decided in the case of Campbell, January 26, 1854, 16 D. 396. The decision in that case was unanimous, and was concurred in by Lord Rutherford. The opinions are quite conclusive of this case in the Lord Ordinary's view of it. For although the limitation under the entail in that case was for a period of twenty-five years, the case of a shorter period was taken as affording a stronger illustration of the inapplicability of the statute. Lord Rutherford said,—'It is plain that the bond contemplated by the Act was chargeable on the rents in all time coming, and the Legislature, having that in view, says it may be charged directly on the fee; but when the entailer, looking to this transaction, says no bond shall be granted by the heir to affect the rents for longer than twenty-five years, it is not only out of the statute in words but in substance. Suppose it had been for three years, could the Court have held that it was the intention of the Legislature to make that a charge on the fee of the estate for ever?'

"On these grounds the Lord Ordinary has refused this petition."

No. 41. of Annandale, is liable, according to a recent judgment of the Court, to pay a sum of £16,280, 17s. 9d., granted by his grandfather, his immediate predecessor, by way of provisions to younger children, asks authority, under section 21 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, to charge that sum on the estate. It was assumed in the argument addressed to us that the sum in question (which is truly only the unpaid balance of provisions to a much larger amount) was not exigible immediately on the petitioner's accession, which occurred in July 1876, but by instalments extending over ten years from that time, interest, however, running from the first, the indulgence being accompanied by a condition of forfeiture of the debtor's right to the estate should he allow any instalment to remain unpaid for more than three years. The Lord Ordinary, proceeding on this assumption, and on the authority of the case of Campbell, 16 D. 396, has refused the application for leave to charge. The question is, whether the refusal was right, and I am of opinion that it was not.

Nov. 27, 1880.
Hope Johnstone v. Hope Johnstone.

The assumption to which I have referred is probably right, and, at all events, I accept it, as the Lord Ordinary did. It was the condition of the argument. The parties were, however, in controversy on one point, viz., whether, if the provisions or any of the instalments should be left unpaid beyond the prescribed period of ten years, the debt, i.e., the whole provisions or the instalments with respect to which such default was made, would, according to the provisions of the entail, survive or be cancelled. It was conceded by the respondents that it would survive against the defaulting heir and his general representatives, but they contended that should he die, or the irritancy be enforced against him by the heir next in succession, the debt in whole or in part, according as the default was total or partial, would cease to be payable by the heir in possession. The point is material only with reference to the applicability contended for of the case of Campbell, 16 D. 396, but for which I should have thought it clearly immaterial. I am of opinion that the contention of the respondents is erroneous. It would, I think, require a clear and distinct provision to that effect to annul a debt against the heir of entail in possession by reason of default made in the due payment of it, and there being here none such I can attach no such consequence, and reject the argument by which it was attempted to be deduced from provisions which were, I think, plainly intended only to give ample indulgence to the debtor on the one hand, and, on the other, to prevent that indulgence from being exceeded.

The question really depends on the true meaning of section 21 of the Act of 1848. The material words are—"In all cases where an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland shall be liable to pay" "any sum or sums of money granted by any former heir of entail by way of provisions to younger children in virtue of the powers to that effect contained in any deed of entail under which the heir of entail in possession holds, . . . it shall be lawful for such heir of entail in possession to charge the fee and rents of such estate" "with the amount of such provisions," &c. That these words exactly apply to the petitioner in the position which he occupies is, I think, not doubtful. He is heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, and he is liable to pay the sum of £16,280, 17s. 9d., granted by the preceding heir by way of provisions to younger children, in virtue of the powers of the entail which he holds. Prior to the statute an heir in possession had to meet his liability to pay provisions to younger children as he best might out of his income or general estate, being, of course, at liberty to pledge his life interest in the entailed estate for that as for any other debt of his. The creditors in the provisions might also, like creditors in any other debts, but not otherwise, have attached by diligence any estate of his, including his rents from the entailed lands. But the fee of the estate was sacred, so that no relief could be had out of it. The purpose of the Act was to remedy this to the heir's relief, by enabling him to meet his liability by charging the estate, i.e., by borrowing money on it. But the only condition and measure of his right to charge is his liability to pay, which, prior to the statute, he must have met out of his income or general estate, if he had any. Now, here, the fact of the petitioner's liability is not doubtful, nor the amount of it, for both are fixed by a decree of this Court. The indulgence to pay by instalments does not affect the existence or amount of his liability, but is only a provision for his convenience, should he choose to avail himself of it, in meeting it, and he might not choose, having to pay interest, possibly at a higher rate than he could borrow for. He might, no doubt, die before payment—just as an heir to whom no such indulgence was accorded might—and then the liability would attach to the succeeding heir, with a corresponding right to charge in order to meet it. I can find no ground for thinking that an heir liable to pay provisions to younger children is deprived of the benefit of the Act by any special indulgence as to the time or times of payment, and, indeed, if indulgence to pay by ten instalments would exclude the application of the Act I should be at a loss to find a reason why indulgence to pay by two should not have the same effect. The more extended the indulgence the more likely are the succeeding heirs to have benefit by the charge which they object to, for the more likely is liability for the debt, to a greater or less extent, to pass to them. The heir in possession is most immediately and certainly relieved by the Act, at the possible cost of his successors, when his full liability is enforceable instantly and at once on his succession.

The only doubt which I had was whether we could allow an immediate charge beyond the amount presently exigible from the petitioner under his liability, i.e., the amount of the past-due instalments. This point was not adverted to in the argument, and no doubt both parties thought that if the Act applied there was an obvious convenience in making one charge for the whole amount which is past-due to the extent of about a half, and that with respect to the rest it will be advisable to arrange to pay it up at once. It is immaterial whether interest is payable to the creditors in the provisions or to the lender of the money by which they are at once paid off, and, in short, I do not assume, and the parties did not suggest, that any one can take prejudice by following the most convenient course with respect to the mere business arrangement, viz., borrowing, and paying the whole at once.

With regard to the case of Campbell, on which the Lord Ordinary has founded his judgment, I am of opinion that it is inapplicable, inasmuch as the peculiar feature of that case, and on which alone it was decided, does not occur here. That feature was a valid provision, as the Court held (rightly or wrongly we are not concerned to inquire), that the debt there in question should subsist for a certain specified period and no longer, and that, if not paid within that period, it should altogether cease to exist. The provision, so far as I know, was unique, and it is unlikely to be of frequent occurrence. Should it again occur, the case of Campbell may possibly be thought to require reconsideration. I should myself incline to the opinion that the liability of the heir in possession was not the less a liability within the meaning of the Act passed for his relief, because the LORD GIFFORD.—This petition raises a very important question under the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act of 1848. The petitioner, who is heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates of Annandale, asks authority to charge the fee and rents of the estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies, with a sum of £16,280, 17s. 9d., being the balance of the provision of £56,280, 17s. 9d. made by the late Mr J. J. Hope Johnstone of Annandale for his younger children, the amount of which provision was held fixed and validly constituted against the present petitioner and against the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the entailed estates by final judgment of this Court, dated 19th May 1880. The petitioner, founding on the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act of 1848, proposes to grant a bond and disposition in security or bonds amounting in all to the said sum of £16,280, 17s. 9d., in order to the payment of the amount to the younger children of the late heir of entail or to those in their right.

The heirs of entail next in order object to this on the ground that by the terms of the entails of the estate of Annandale the heir of entail then in possession for the time is bound to pay off all provisions in favour of younger children within a period of ten years, and that by instalments of ten per cent per annum as therein mentioned, and this obligation against the heirs of entail in possession is enforced by an irritancy to the effect that if any of the heirs of entail in possession shall omit for three years complete to pay the said instalments of ten per cent per annum of the said provisions to younger children such heir in possession so failing to pay off the provisions shall forfeit the entailed estates at the instance of the next heir.

It thus appears that it was the intention of the entailor, and was expressly provided by him, that provisions in favour of younger children should not be permanent burdens upon the entailed estate or upon the rents thereof, but should be paid off or discharged within a period of ten years, so as thereafter to leave the whole estate free and disencumbered thereof for the benefit of the future heirs of entail, and it is said that wherever an entailor has made a provision like this, then the enactments in the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act do not apply, and the heir of entail in possession is not entitled to create the provisions to younger children a permanent burden upon the entailed estate by granting bond and disposition in security therefor in manner provided in the 21st section.

The true objection is not merely that the provisions in favour of younger children are payable only by instalments, and spread over a greater or less number of years, for that is merely an indulgence to the heir or heirs of entail in possession, and prevents their being unduly pressed for payment of the capital. The true force of the objection lies in the fact that, by the terms of the entail, the heirs of entail in possession are bound at all hazards and within a definite time to pay off the provisions in favour of younger children, so that they shall no longer affect the entailed estates.

Now, apart from the decision in the case of Campbell, 26th Jan. 1854, 16 D. 396, I confess I should have been disposed to think that the words of the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act are sufficiently broad and strong to cover all cases where an heir of entail in possession is obliged to pay provisions to younger children granted by a former heir whether the amount of these provisions is payable at once and in one sum, or is payable by instalments and over a series of years. I should have been disposed to think that the provision of the Entail Amendment Act even applied to cases where the heir or heirs in possession were taken bound to pay off the provisions within a definite number of years, for the words of the statutory enactment do not make any such exceptions.

No. 41.

Nov. 27, 1880.
Hope Johnstone v. Hope Johnstone.

The provision is that "in all cases where an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate shall be liable to pay or to provide by assignation of the rents and proceeds of such estate for any sum or sums of money granted by any former heir of entail by way of provisions to younger children in terms of the said recited Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Fourth, or in virtue of the powers to that effect contained in any deed of entail under which the heir of entail in possession holds, and in all cases where any heir of entail in possession as aforesaid shall in the marriage-contract of his younger child have validly granted provision for such younger child out of the rents and proceeds of such entailed estate in terms of the said recited Act, or in terms of such deed of entail, it shall be lawful for such heir of entail in possession to charge the fee and rents of such estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or to charge the fee and rents of any portion of such estate other than as aforesaid, with the amount of such provisions, by granting bond and disposition in security over such estate" in manner therein mentioned. This provision seems unqualified and unconditional. It applies apparently to every case where an heir of entail in possession is either (1) liable to pay; or (2) liable to provide by assignation of the rents for provisions to younger children, and, prima facie, the petitioner in the present case is undoubtedly in the position supposed. He is liable to pay this provision of £16,000 odds, and he is liable to provide for it by assigning the rents under the statute or otherwise. Nothing is said in the statute about cases where payment is to be made by instalments, or where it is spread over a period of years, and at first sight I have a difficulty in seeing how these circumstances can affect the express enactment. If the statute applies where the whole sum is instantly exigible, or where the relief of the heir in possession is only by tendering an assignation of a third of the rents under the tenth section of the Aberdeen Act, it is difficult to see why a provision for payment by ten yearly instalments should deprive the heir of the benefit of the Entail Amendment Act. In truth, the statutory mode of payment by assigning one-third of the rents will in general be very nearly equivalent to paying off the provisions by ten yearly instalments.

But the decision in the case of Campbell, followed as it seems to have been by the case of Baillie (Duncan on Entails, p. 339), creates a very serious difficulty in the present case. In Campbell's case it was held that, where an entail provided that provisions for younger children should not affect the entailed estate or the rents thereof for a longer period than twenty-five years after the death of the granter, and that any provisions not under this condition should be void and null, in such a case the heir in possession could not grant bond and disposition in security under the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act, the Court apparently holding that it was only where the rents of an estate might be pledged in all time coming, or for an indefinite period, that the Act of 1848 authorised the fee to be charged by a bond and disposition in security. This is an authoritative decision, and it is not possible for this Division to go back upon it, though,

No. 41. if appropriate circumstances arose, I think it might be worthy of reconsideration by both Divisions or by the whole Court.
Nov. 27, 1880.
Hope Johnstone v. Hope Johnstone.

But I do not think that the case of Campbell, or the case of Baillie, are really applicable to the present case. The specialty in these cases was that the heir of entail in possession was by the express terms of the entails disabled from validly or effectually assigning or affecting the rents of the entailed estate for more than a definite limited period. If the debt to the younger children was not paid off and discharged within a certain and fixed number of years then it came to an end, and became null and void, so far as related to the entailed estate, and to the rents and profits thereof. The estate and its rents became, by the lapse of the appointed period, free and disburdened, leaving only a personal claim against the heirs in possession individually; and Lord Rutherford explains that it was only where the rents might be charged with the debt in all time coming, or indefinitely, that the Legislature says the debt may be charged directly on the fee.

Now, in the present case, there is no provision that the bond in favour of the younger children, or the assignation of the rents in security thereof, shall become void or null if the provision be not paid within a definite period. There is no irritancy of the bond itself, or of the security thereby afforded to the younger children. These are not touched, and will remain effectual to the younger children so long as their debt is unpaid. It will be a valid assignation of the rents to the younger children in all time coming until their provisions are paid, and thus in the present case the heir of entail in possession is entitled to do what he was not entitled to do in the case of Campbell, grant an effectual security to the creditors, which will remain effectual to them for an indefinite period, or, in all time coming, until the debt is paid.

No doubt while the security of the younger children is not affected thereby the heir or heirs of entail are taken bound to pay off the provision within ten years, and it is true that this obligation on the heir of entail is fenced with an irritancy directed against him. But I do not think that this makes any difference, the essential point being that there is no irritancy directed against the creditors in the bond, and that the failure of the heir to pay it off in ten years will in no way affect the rights of the creditors, or the extent and efficacy of their security.

I am of opinion, therefore, though not without considerable hesitation, that the authority of the case of Campbell does not extend to or govern the present case, that the petitioner is within the purview and provisions of the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act, and that he is entitled to grant the bond and disposition in security as proposed by him. I think the object of the Entail Amendment Act was to give relief to an heir of entail in the situation of the petitioner by enabling him to make the provisions to the younger children a permanent charge upon the fee, and thus enjoy the estate under burden only of the interest of the provisions instead of being bound to pay off the capital thereof in ten years, or in any other limited period. I incline to think that a proprietor making an entail after 1848 could not defeat the provisions of that Act by merely taking his heirs of entail bound to pay off provisions to younger children within a definite or limited time.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. A good deal of difficulty has, I think, been introduced into a question, which otherwise would not have presented much, by a reference to the authority of the case of Campbell. On the one hand, I do not think that the relaxation introduced by the Legislature in the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, was intended solely for the benefit of the heir in possession, who was bound to pay; I think it was also intended to confer and did confer benefit on the younger children who were entitled to payment, by securing to them payment in a more convenient form than theretofore.

On the other hand, I cannot doubt that the object of the entailor, in this particular case, was to secure the extinction of all provisions granted in favour of younger children at the end of ten years. But that appears to me to be just one of the cases for which the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act was intended. The enactment applies with very great force to a burden subject to such condition. Suppose the free rent of the estate to be £1000, then three years' free rents would be £3000, and it would take £300 a-year for ten years, besides a sum to keep down interest on the balances still due, to clear off this liability. This implies that the heir in possession would be reduced to a revenue of £700 a-year from the estate. But make it a permanent burden and you cripple the heir of entail in possession much less. All he will have to do will be to pay the annual interest on £3000. But one at least of the objects of the Entail Amendment Act, in section 21, was just to relieve the heir in possession in this way.

Campbell's case raises indeed much difficulty, but I must own that where a principle is rested on a single decision, not shewn to have been followed during a long course of years, I should not consider myself precluded from reconsidering it. I am, however, willing to accept the distinctions which have been pointed out by Lord Gifford between Campbell's case and the present, and I am otherwise of opinion that the 21st section of the Entail Amendment Act applies with peculiar force to the present case.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the Lord Ordinary with instructions, after due inquiry made, to interpose authority, and grant warrant in terms of the prayer of the petition."

Held that the legacies of £500 to the testator's brothers Thomas and Alexander vested in them a morte testatoris, in terms of the sixth purpose of the testament, and that the direction as to lapsed legacies in the residue clause did not suspend vesting, but only provided for the possibility of lapse by reason of there being no one to take.

JAMES BROWN, M.D., who died in Aberdeen in 1823, left a last will and testament, whereby he appointed his wife, Mrs Margaret Paton or Brown, and others his executors.

The purposes of the will were, so far as material to the present case, that the executors should pay an annuity to the testator's widow, and certain other smaller annuities, and should pay or hand over certain minor specific legacies and bequests.

In the sixth purpose there occurred the following bequest:—"To my brothers Thomas and Alexander Brown I bequeath the sum of £500 sterling each, payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the decease of my said spouse."

The residue-clause was as follows:—"And after paying the whole legacies and other sums before destined I appoint the residue and remainder of my estate of every description at the death of my said spouse, and including the principal sum laid out for an annuity to her, and any legacy that may have lapsed by the legatees predeceasing her, to be equally divided among the children then alive of my brothers and sisters, equally per capita; but always secluding the eldest son of each family who may have succeeded to any heritable property of his father's, and any of my said nephews who may have situations in India."

The testator's widow, Mrs Margaret Paton or Brown, survived till 28th May 1879, when Dr James Brown's estate fell to be wound up. The executors having all deceased, William Yeats, advocate, Aberdeen, was appointed judicial factor.

Various questions having arisen in the distribution of the estate, the judicial factor raised this multiplepounding, calling as defenders the surviving children of Dr Brown's brothers and sisters, and the issue of such as had predeceased. All Dr Brown's brothers and sisters had predeceased his widow.

Only two questions came before the Inner-House, viz., (1) whether the legacies to Thomas and Alexander Brown had lapsed and fallen into residue owing to their having predeceased the testator's widow; and (2) whether the issue of George Brown, who was the only child of the testator's brother Thomas Brown, and had succeeded to heritable property from his father, were excluded under the condition attached to the residue clause "secluding the eldest son of each family who may have succeeded to any heritable property of his father's."

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th July 1880, pronounced an interlocutor containing, inter alia, these findings:—"Finds that the legacies to Thomas and Alexander Brown lapsed by their having predeceased the widow of the testator: Finds that the residue is divisible in equal shares among the nephews and nieces of the testator who survived the testator's widow, and the children of such nephews and nieces as predeceased the testator's widow, such children taking their parents' shares, but subject to the qualification that the children of George Brown, nephew of the testator, are not entitled to any share, in respect that the said George Brown succeeded to heritage from his father."* No. 42.

Nov. 27, 1880.
Yeats v.
Paton, &c.

Against the first of the above findings a reclaiming note was presented by Mrs Sarah Thomas or Taylor, who was in right both of Alexander and Thomas Brown, the testator's brothers, and maintained that the legacies of £500 each, contained in the 6th purpose of the testament, had vested in them, and were transmitted to her as their representative.

The claimants, Walter Thomas Brown and another, took advantage of this reclaiming note to argue against the second of the above findings of the Lord Ordinary, which excluded them from any share in the fund available for residue, owing to their father George Brown having succeeded to heritable estate from his father.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary has decided several questions in this action of multiplepounding, but the two reclaiming notes now before us raise the only two points on which his interlocutor is brought under review.

The first question arises under the bequest of £500 to each of the testator's brothers, Thomas and Alexander Brown, "payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the decease of my said spouse." It appears that both of these legatees of £500 predeceased the testator's widow, and the question is whether the legacies lapsed. The Lord Ordinary has found that the terms of the residue clause occurring at a later part of the deed so far control this bequest as to suspend or postpone vesting, and that, therefore, the legacies have in the circumstances lapsed. I am not surprised that the Lord Ordinary has come to that conclusion, because at first sight the parenthetical clause "and any legacy that may have lapsed by the legatees predeceasing her" (that is, the widow), occurring in the provision as to residue, does lead to the apparent inference that these legacies were intended to lapse.

But, dealing with the bequest of £500 each to these two brothers by itself, in the first place, it is clear that, if there is nothing to the contrary, the legacies

* "NOTE.—1. The first question is, whether the legacies to Thomas and Alexander Brown vested a morte testatoris. If this were to be determined by the clause of bequest alone it is not doubtful that they vested at that date, inasmuch as there is only a postponement of payment till the death of the widow; but a difficulty arises in consequence of the residuary clause. The testator directs that the residue, and 'any legacy which may have lapsed by the legatees predeceasing' the widow, shall be disposed of in a certain way. These words can apply to no other legacies than those which the testator left to his brothers, and the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that they shew that the testator not only postponed payment, but postponed vesting till the widow's death.

"2. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the children of predeceasing nephews and nieces take their parents' share. This is the ordinary rule under such a will, and he does not think that in this case there is room for an exception.

"3. But George Brown, a nephew of the truster, succeeded to heritable property from his father. He was therefore excluded from any share, and the exclusion, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, extends to his descendants, who merely come in his place. If he could not take, neither, it is thought, can they."

vest a morte testatoris. It is simply a gift to the testator's brothers, payable on the decease of his wife. That is the operative bequest, and it is there that one naturally looks for the terms and conditions under which the gift is made. But there are none.

The residue clause again appears to me to deal with the possible contingency of a legacy not being claimable by anybody. Taking the circumstances as they stand, there is no difficulty in giving effect to the provision, because, in point of fact, no legacy has lapsed. The provision is not that any legacy shall lapse "by the legatee predeceasing" the testator's widow, and shall fall into residue; but only that in the event of any legacy lapsing, it shall fall into residue. The testator may have had some doubt in his own mind as to whether some of the legacies he had given might not lapse, and he has provided by this clause for the possibility of any legacy lapsing prior to the period of payment. But that is all, I think, that he intended to do. I cannot think that he thereby intended to affect the vesting of legacies already given.

With regard to the second point, viz., that arising on the clause "secluding the eldest son of each family who may have succeeded to any heritable property of his father's," it appears that in one of the families there is only one child, a son, who has succeeded, of course, to the heritable property of his father, and the question is, does the seclusion apply to him to the benefit of the remaining residuary legatees? I think not. I think it only applies intra familiam, and that there is no justice or equity in extending it to a family where there is only one child. I am therefore of opinion that where the real object was to prevent the heir in heritage taking any portion in competition with his younger brothers and sisters there is no ground for excluding him where he has no younger brothers or sisters.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur with your Lordship on both points. On the question of vesting it is a cardinal principle in the interpretation of wills that you are always to avoid reading a subordinate clause in a sense repugnant to the substantive gift, if reconciliation is possible. Now, the testator here in his residue-clause does not directly fix the period of vesting at the death of his wife; he only intimates a doubt in his own mind whether the result of some of the provisions he has already made may not be that the legacies provided may lapse by the legatees predeceasing his wife, and he provides for that possibility. But if it is plain that, but for this clause, a legacy would not lapse, I am of opinion that the clause was not intended to suspend the vesting of a gift already given in such terms as to vest it absolutely.

On the second question I have nothing to add.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for Mrs Sarah Thomas or Taylor against Lord Rutherford Clark's interlocutor of 16th July 1880, Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it finds that the legacies to Thomas and Alexander Brown lapsed by their having predeceased the widow of the testator, and find that the same vested a morte testatoris, and that the reclaimer, Mrs Sarah Thomas or Taylor, as representing the said legatees, is entitled to the legacies: Further, recall the said interlocutor in so far as it finds that the children of George Brown, nephew of the testator, are not entitled to any Poinding—Illegal execution—Appraisement—Liability of creditor.—A sheriff-officer, in carrying through a poinding under a small-debt decree, poinded almost the whole articles in the debtor's house, and in the report of the valuation and sale articles of household furniture, pictures, and portfolios full of engravings, were united under one head, and valued together. No serious attempt had been made to arrive at the real value, and the whole were valued at the amount of the decree, and expenses. The two appraisers who assisted were not put on oath. No bidders having appeared at the sale, the articles were declared to belong to the poinding creditor at the appraised value, and were removed by him to an auction sale-room for sale. Before they were sold the debtor intimated that the proceedings were illegal, and that he held both the poinding creditor and the sheriff-officer answerable. In an action of reduction and damages, held that the poinding and sale had been illegally carried through, and that the poinding creditor, having sold the goods after receiving notice of the illegality, must be held to have adopted the proceedings of the officer, and was liable in damages along with him.

Question, is the employer of a sheriff-officer liable in damages for his illegal acts?

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that appraisers in pointings must be put on oath.

ON 12th July 1876 William Scott Douglas obtained a small-debt de-1st DIVISION.
cree for £12, and 4s. 1d. of expenses, against John Le Conte, engraver, Ld. Craighill.
Edinburgh; and in May 1879, acting under instructions of Mr Douglas, M.
Robert Richardson, sheriff-officer, carried through a poinding and sale of the furniture and other effects in Mr Le Conte's house in Greyfriars Place, Edinburgh.

Mr Le Conte brought two actions (which were conjoined), the one in June 1879 against Mr Douglas, and the other in October 1879 against Mr Richardson, the sheriff-officer, for reduction of the poinding and sale, for restoration of the poinded effects, and for damages.

The pursuer alleged that the valuation of the effects in his house had not been properly made, because, inter alia, a large number of valuable engravings in portfolios had not been separately valued, and other articles had been valued in lots, and the amount stated at sums far below their value; that the two appraisers who signed the report of the valuation had not been put on oath; and that the execution of the officer, which stated that this had been done, was false.

The pursuer pleaded that the proceedings were illegal and oppressive, and that he was entitled to reduction and damages.

The defenders maintained that the poinding and sale had been carried through in the usual way, and that it was not necessary that the appraisers should be put on oath. The defender Douglas maintained that he was not answerable for the mistakes of the sheriff-officer whom he employed, and that the pursuer was aware that the effects had been removed to Lyon & Turnbull's rooms for sale, and should then have brought a suspension and interdict to prevent the sale. He offered to pay the difference between the amount realised by the sale at Lyon & Turnbull's and the amount of the decree under which the pouncing was executed.

A proof was allowed. The following facts were established:—In the report of the pouncing by Richardson the articles of furniture were not all valued separately, but were put down together in lots. The last item was —“(11) Large mahogany table, an old table, a chair, a stool, a piece of carpet, an easel, four drawing boards, ten unframed oil-paintings, five oil-paintings in gilt frames, and two pictures in gilt frames, six portfolios containing a large quantity of engravings, oil-paintings, and water-colour drawings, £3, 11s. 7d.” The whole of the articles were valued at £12, 4s. 1d., the amount of the decree and expenses. The report by the officer stated that the effects had been duly appraised “upon oath,” and that, “after public notice of, at least, two hours,” the articles were, on 23d May 1879, exposed by public roup, but, no person having offered the appraised value, they were declared to belong to the pouncing creditor at the appraised value.

The articles were afterwards removed by Mr Douglas to the sale-rooms of Messrs Lyon & Turnbull, auctioneers, and sold for £35, 9s. 11d. On 26th May, before the articles were sold, the agent of Mr Le Conte wrote to Mr Douglas that the pouncing and sale had been carried through illegally, and that, unless the articles were restored by next day, an action of damages would be raised, and Mr Douglas replied that the sheriff-officer was answerable for any irregularity.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“In the first place, finds as matter of fact (1) that the defender Richardson, on the employment of the defender Douglas, pounded effects belonging to the pursuer; (2) that the effects thus pounded were, under a warrant of the Sheriff of Midlothian, afterwards exposed to sale, and no person having appeared to offer the appraised value, being £12, 4s. 1d., these were declared to belong to the pouncing creditor, the defender Douglas, as set forth in the report of the pouncing and sale; (3) that the said effects were not appraised on oath, the appraisers not having been sworn, and the statement in the said report that the same had been duly appraised on oath is false; (4) and separatim, that the said effects were appraised without reference to their value, and, especially in the case of prints, engravings, and oil-paintings in portfolios, without reasonable knowledge on the part of the appraisers of the things which were pounded; (5) that it has not been proved that there was concert or conspiracy between the defenders in the premises, nor has it been proved that effects not pounded were carried off by either of the defenders; and (6) that the said pouncing and sale were to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, and these, with an allowance of £25 for solatium, may reasonably be estimated at £100: In the second place, finds as matters of law, the facts being as above set forth (1) that the said pouncing and sale were irregular and illegal, and (2) that the defenders are liable to make good to the pursuer said loss, injury, and damage: Therefore, in the action against the defender Richardson, repels the defences; ordains said defender to pay to the pursuer the said sum of £100, but under deduction always of any sum which may be paid by or recovered from the defender Douglas on account of said loss, injury, and damage, and decerns: And, in the action against the defender Douglas, repels the defences; ordains the said defender to pay to the pursuer the said sum of £100, but under deduction always of any sum which may be paid by or recovered from the defender Richardson on account of said loss, injury, and damage; and decerns: Finds the defenders severally liable to the pursuer in the expenses of the actions," &c.* No. 43.

The defender Richardson reclaimed, and argued;—The decree and proceedings being ex facie regular and valid, the pursuer's remedy was interdict, and, at any rate, the reductive conclusions were incompetent against him, he being bound in respect of his office to execute the decree upon the instructions of his employer. Having acted throughout in bona fide,

 Le Conte v.
 Douglas and

* "NOTE.—The pursuer here seeks to recover reparation for loss, injury, and damage said to have been caused by the irregular and illegal pointing and sale of his property, carried through by the defender Richardson on the employment of the defender Douglas. Both defenders maintain that the proceedings were regular and legal. The defender Douglas also pleads that, even if there were irregularity or illegality in the proceedings, he, as the employer, is not answerable to the pursuer for the consequences. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pointing and sale were irregular and illegal, first, because the appraisers were not put upon oath; and, secondly, because the appraisal was conducted without reference to the value of the articles pointed, and especially as regards the contents of the portfolios, without reasonable knowledge on the part of the appraisers of the things which were included in the pointing. On the first point the defenders contend that the administration of an oath to the appraiser is not requisite. And this contention is maintained upon two grounds. In the first place, it is said that the provisions of the Small-Debt Act, 1 Vict. chap. 41, do not prescribe the administration of an oath, but, reading section 20 of that statute and the relative schedule G together the Lord Ordinary thinks that this contention is unsound. The report of the pointing and sale, No. 87 of process, which sets forth that the effects had been 'duly appraised on oath,' points certainly to this conclusion. It is further maintained, on the part of the defenders that, even if by the Small-Debt Act the administration of an oath had been prescribed this solemnity was taken away by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 72. The parts of this statute which are relied on are section 12, sub-sections 4 and 5. These, however, must be read in connection with the 'saving clause,' section 14, sub-section 12, and, so reading them, the Lord Ordinary thinks it must be held that the oath in question has not been abolished.

"On the second point, the Lord Ordinary thinks it proved that those concerned in the execution of the diligence were indifferent to the interests of the debtor, and that the values which were put upon the pursuer's effects were hardly, if at all, influenced by any consideration of their real worth. What was done, and the way of doing it, may have been similar to what frequently occurs, as the defenders have suggested, but the Lord Ordinary considers that this is not a reason for deciding in favour of its validity, but rather the contrary.

"The defender Douglas has a separate plea in defence. He contends that the irregularities in the execution of the pointing are not things for which he, as employer, is answerable. The pursuer, he argues, must look to the sheriff-officer who did the wrong, and to his cautioners, and cannot come upon the creditor for redress. The Lord Ordinary, however, thinks that this point has already been judicially determined (vide Macdonell v. Bank of Scotland, July 21, 1835, 13 S., p. 701; Beattie v. M'Lellan, June 29, 1846, 8 D., p. 930; and Struthers v. Dykes, 7th July 1847, 9 D. 1437, 19 Scot. Jur. 583); and consequently that it is his duty to overrule the plea maintained on the part of this defender.

"The point upon which the Lord Ordinary has experienced most difficulty is the assessment of the damage. The valuation, as set forth in the pointing, is absurdly low. The prices obtained, when the effects were subsequently sold for behoof of the defender Douglas came considerably nearer, but, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, did not reach to, the true value. Taking everything into account, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the £100 which has been awarded is not more than fair reparation to the pursuer for the loss, injury, and damage which he has suffered."

and the pursuer not having through his actings suffered loss, he could not be held liable in damages.¹

Argued for both defenders;—The proceedings were unchallengeable, although the usual or judicial form of oath was not administered to the appraisers, that not being now required by law, or in accordance with common usage. The Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 41), sec. 20, although most minute in its directions as to pointing, did not mention an oath, but provided that goods pointed should be “duly” appraised, and the mention of the oath in the schedule was not sufficient to incorporate it into the statute. The Promissory Oaths Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 72), sec. 12, sub-secs. 4 and 5, covered the office of appraiser, and the saving-clause in sec. 14, sub-sec. 12, referred only to proceedings of a judicial nature, while the proceedings here complained of were purely executorial. The Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 114), sec. 23, had also impliedly abolished oaths.²

Argued for Douglas;—He was not answerable for the illegal acts of the sheriff-officer, as he was bound to employ an officer, and if he employed a properly qualified officer he had done all he could.

The pursuer replied;—The cases quoted by the Lord Ordinary established that an employer of a sheriff-officer was responsible for his illegal acts. Besides, here the defender Douglas adopted these acts. The sheriff-officer was bound to have administered an oath to the appraisers. The schedule of pointing was false in stating that an oath had been administered, and the whole manner in which the valuation was carried through was illegal. No proper valuation had been made. It was not legal to include a number of articles under one head in the valuation, but each article should have been stated at a separate value.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pointing complained of in this action was used upon a small-debt decree for £12, with 4s. 1d. of expenses, obtained by the defender Douglas against the pursuer in the Sheriff Court of Midlothian, and the Lord Ordinary has found it illegal on two grounds, first, that the appraisers were not put on oath, and, in the second place, that the circumstances show it to be an oppressive use of diligence.

I shall consider first the latter objection, which depends on the report of pointing itself which we have before us. There appears to have been a great variety and quantity of effects, and among others a number of pictures, prints, and engravings, which are all included in the goods pointed and appraised in the schedule of pointing at very small values. The last entry in the report is in these terms:—“A large mahogany table, an old table, a chair, a stool, a piece carpet, an easel, four drawing boards, ten unframed oil-paintings, five oil-paintings in gilt frames, six portfolios containing a large quantity of engravings, oil-paintings, and water-colour drawings, at £3, 11s. 7d.” Now, it is quite apparent that this sum is put in just to make up the amount of the debt and expenses. That, on the face of it, appears to be a very objectionable mode of making an appraisal. When we look into the evidence adduced as to the manner in which the poinding was executed, that impression is very much confirmed. Articles of very various description, furniture, and works of art contained in six large portfolios, are slumped together without any further specification of their value and contents. Now, in the evidence led, Cowan, one of the appraisers, who is examined as a witness for the pursuer, gives this account of the way the proceedings were conducted. He says that after a general examination, which seems to have been slight, of the house and its contents, he and the other appraiser and the sheriff-officer went to the parlour and sat down at a table. He then goes on to say—"During the whole time we were there I did not leave the room excepting when we surveyed the house previous to going into the parlour. When we surveyed the house we went from one room to another. We just had a look at the place and then sat down at the table. We valued the articles. Richardson called out so many things, and we put them down at so much. We had no other examination of the articles than what I have mentioned. We just went into the room and looked at what was in it. We never took much notice. We did not look inside any of the portfolios. I cannot say if they were locked up tight. I did not know what was inside them. I afterwards knew that there were paintings, and sketches, and scraps. Richardson did not name the value of the articles. When he called them he would say, 'How much are they worth? Are they worth four shillings, or five shillings, or what?' We considered, and we might put them down as he said, or if the value was too low we altered the sum. (Q.) Did Richardson not mention the value of every lot he called out? (A.) No. (Q.) What are the other lots the value of which he did mention? (A.) I cannot say. He might say 'mahogany table in two halves,—is it worth ten shillings?' We might say no; put it down at 7s. 6d. We took the values into our own consideration. If we did not think the sum Richardson asked as the value of an article sufficient, we put it down at what we thought proper. I cannot mention any articles that were put down in the schedule at a smaller sum than that suggested by Richardson. I cannot say if there are any. (Q.) Is it not the case that there was a sum mentioned by Richardson, and that that sum was the one you took as the value? (A.) There might be in one case, but I cannot swear. That certainly was not the case with all the articles. Richardson did not say exactly what the value of any article was. He merely asked us. (Q.) Can you tell me one article that you valued? (A.) No. 7 for example, which was valued by myself and by Lauder. I had seen the articles before I sat down at the table. I made up the 7s. 6d. by a rough calculation of what we thought the articles would fetch at a sale. We made the calculation for the whole lot. I cannot state what sum we put on each article in that entry, No. 7. Lauder and I valued the last item, No. 11, 'large mahogany table.' The portfolios were in pursuer's work-room. Ten unframed oil-paintings, and five oil-paintings in gilt frames were in that room, if I mistake not. (Q.) How did you come at the value, £3, 11s. 7d.? (A.) Richardson asked pursuer what was the value of the things in the portfolios, and the pursuer said, 'Merely rubbish.' (Q.) Then you put no value upon them? (A.) No; they were just included in the whole lot. I did not look at any of the oil-paintings that were there. I don't know who examined them. (Q.) Then it is not your valuation, is it? (A.) I suppose it must be. (Q.) Who put the value upon them? (A.) Lauder and I. (Q.) You never looked at them? (A.) We put the value on them for all that. We saw that they were paintings, but I did not see what was inside the portfolios. I did not examine the paintings on the walls minutely. (Q.) How could you put a value on them? (A.) I put them down at £3, 11s. 7d. I come to that by a rough calculation. By the Court.—We both made the valuation. Nobody else made it but ourselves. (Q.) Can you not tell what part you took in the calculation? (A.) I took no part further than the other witness. (Q.) Is not this the case, that when you came to value lot No. 7 there was just £3, 11s. 7d. required to be made up, and you put that in in order to get the amount of the debt? (A.) Yes, that might be so.”

The other appraiser is examined for the defenders, and his account of the proceedings does not substantially differ from that of Cowan. He is asked—“Were there more than six portfolios in the place? (A.) I could not say. (Q.) Did you see six? (A.) I did not count them. (Q.) You surely counted six, did you not? (A.) No; Richardson said there were six. (Q.) You saw the portfolios that were there, did you not? (A.) Yes, but I did not count them. Before we began to value the things Richardson told us to put a fair valuation on the articles to the best of our knowledge. (Q.) Did you agree to do so. (A.) Yes, we said we would do it. (Q.) Was what was said and done that day in accordance with your usual practice in the execution of poindings in small-debt decrees? (A.) Yes; Cowan wrote a copy on the back of the small-debt decree the same as mine. (Q.) When Richardson pointed out the things to you, and you entered them in your schedule, did you put a value upon them? (A.) Yes. (Q.) You and Cowan did? (A.) Yes; Richardson put no value upon them. (Q.) Did he ever say, when you were doing your work upon any occasion, that you were ever putting too low or too high a value upon the things? (A.) No; I am not a judge of the value of engravings; but I did my best in putting a value on Le Conte's pictures and engravings. By the Court.—(Q.) Did you see a great number of engravings? (A.) I saw some portfolios, but they were tied up, I think. I did not see the engravings that were inside the portfolios. (Q.) How could you do your best to put a value upon them if you never looked upon them? (A.) The £3, 11s. 7d. was to make up the amount of the debt, and what was required when we came to the last lot was to bring the value up to the amount of the debt.”

Now, the question comes to be, whether this mode of executing the diligence of poinding is legal, and I entertain no sort of doubt that it is eminently illegal, and for this reason, that the goods were never appraised. It is essential to the validity of a poinding that the goods should be appraised and reported on by the officer executing the diligence, and on that report the warrant of sale is got from the Court, and the goods are put up for sale at the appraised value. This shews the appraisement to be an essential part of the process. But to take a quantity of articles of furniture and six portfolios containing engravings and put a value upon them simply to make up the sum of the debt and expenses, is not an appraisement. It is quite true that a critical valuation is not to be expected, but the appraisers are bound to use their best skill and care to come to a proper idea of the value of the articles. Here, however, all idea of an appraisement seems to have been abandoned, and from other parts of the evidence we see the officer simply made a clean sweep of the debtor's premises. It seems to me unnecessary to go further in order to concur with the Lord Ordinary that the proceedings complained of were illegal and oppressive.

Dec. 1, 1880
Le Conte v.
Douglas and

But it is contended on the part of the creditor in the decree that he is not answerable for the mode of execution, having employed a proper and responsible officer. Whatever may be the merits of that question, when it occurs purely, I am clearly of opinion that the creditor cannot take benefit from such a plea in the present case, for he adopted the actings of the officer. The goods were handed over to him as his property. He was at that stage duly warned that the proceedings were illegal, but took the goods adjudged to him by the officer and sent them to an auction-room to be sold. Having thus adopted the proceedings of the officer he cannot maintain that he is not responsible. I therefore think that the pursuer here is entitled to prevail. It is unnecessary in the present case to decide the question whether the appraisers in such a proceeding must be formally put on oath. I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and giving damages as he has done.

LORD DEAS.—A question of this kind occurred in a case cited at the hearing, M'Kinnon v. Hamilton, 4 Macph. 852. In that case Hamilton had executed a poiding of the ground for a debt of £13. The value of the effects poided amounted to £72, 19s. The Lord Ordinary was Lord Mure, who passed the note, and continued the interdict, and he observes,—“The poiding of effects of an appraised value of upwards of five times the amount of the debt sought to be recovered is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, of itself a very questionable proceeding.” Then the Lord President observed,—“The poiding was excessive, and we cannot sanction the excuse that the creditor poided as much as would satisfy the landlord's claims.” Lord Curriehill said,—“If this poiding were sustained on the ground now pleaded it might as well be maintained that if a debtor's estate were burdened with an heritable debt, for which a poiding of the ground might be executed by the heritable creditor, which would be preferable to the diligence of personal creditors of the owner, it would follow that any personal creditor of the owner, poiding for payment of a personal debt, however trifling in amount, might poid all the moveable effects upon the ground, in order to guard against the possible contingency of the heritable creditor happening to use his remedy under his real security. Then there are some observations which I made,—“The poiding was perfectly unjustifiable, for it appears to have involved a total dispenishing for a debt of £13. If we were to sanction such a proceeding we should be making the diligence of poiding the means of gross injustice and oppression.” Lord Ardmillan concurred in those opinions. Now, it is true that the question there was only a question of passing the note of suspension, but the opinions are explicit, and unqualified with reference to the merits. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was adhered to, and so the result was that the complainer was found entitled to stop the sale, and the case does not seem to have come again before the Court. Your Lordship has stated the grounds of judgment in the present case, and they are stronger here than in the case of M'Kinnon v. Hamilton. I can therefore have no hesitation in agreeing. The case is a fortiori of that case, which was decided in 1866.

LORD MURE was absent.

LORD SHAND.—It appears to me that the question for the decision of the Court is substantially that stated in the issue adjusted in the case of Robertson v. Galbraith. In that case the landlord, having obtained a warrant to sell, was said to have carried it through illegally, and the Court settled the following issue, viz, "Whether the defender, on or about the 16th of March 1855, in selling part of the sequestrated effects under the said warrant, did illegally and oppressively sell the same in disregard of the interests of the pursuer, and in a manner to produce loss, injury, and damage to the pursuer?" The question here is whether this defender, having procured a warrant of poinding and sale, did in carrying it out act illegally and oppressively, and in disregard of the interests of the pursuer, and to his loss, injury, and damage. I have no doubt that the proof establishes the affirmative of this issue. The statute no doubt provides that the proceedings should be carried out in a summary way, and if the warrant be granted for a debt of really small amount, and the articles poinded are of trifling value I do not say that there ought to be a very minute and detailed valuation. But there ought as far as possible to be an accurate valuation. Each case must be looked at according to the circumstances.

In the present case the whole effects in the house were inventoried and included in the valuation. It would be a serious thing if the officer were to be allowed recklessly to include every article in the house so as to inventory and have the power of selling all the debtor possesses. There must be reasonable procedure in the way of valuing the effects, for the valuation is only a step towards transferring to the creditor the property of the debtor at the amount of the valuation. The statute provides for a notice of two hours before the goods are exposed for sale by the officer, and if no one appears to offer the appraised value the property is handed to the creditor at that value as his own. It is clear, therefore, that there must be a substantial, if a somewhat rough, valuation of the goods poinded. But here the evidence shews that no serious attempt was made to put a fair value on the effects. I shall only add, in addition to the item already referred to by your Lordship in the chair, that in article five of the report of poinding we have, "twenty pictures in gilt frames, five oil paintings, at £5." These works appear to have been of substantial value, and we find that the articles realised upwards of £36 at the sale, and were thought by the purchasers to have been bought at a low price. The officer appears to have thought the claim would be settled, and that the proceeding was a mere matter of form, but there can be no doubt that the proceedings were illegal and oppressive, in disregard of the interests of the debtor, and to his loss, injury, and damage. And I am not disposed to interfere with the Lord Ordinary's valuation of that loss.

As to the responsibility, which the Lord Ordinary has found to be conjunct and several, the employer maintained he was not liable. I think it unnecessary to give any opinion on the general case argued, for in this case the creditor was duly warned of the nature of the proceedings, and must be held to have adopted them by going on with the sale.

Another objection stated was that the pursuer was not entitled to lie by, and then after the articles were sold bring an action of damages, and that his proper course would have been to interdict the sale. The pursuer was in straitened circumstances, and it was not easy for him to find an agent to take up his case at once, and proceed by way of suspension, a process in which he might possibly have been required to find caution, and I am not prepared to say that he was bound to proceed in that way.

The case discloses a very loose practice in regard to sales of this kind. The defence practically came to this, that the defenders were only doing what other people usually did. If that be so, all I can say is that the sooner such practices are put a stop to the better, by regulations issued by the Sheriffs, in virtue of their powers under the statute, or from the Crown office if necessary. No. 43.

LORD DEAS.—Lord Shand has reminded me, that I meant to make two further observations. In the first place, I do not see any ground to interfere with the amount of damages which the Lord Ordinary has fixed. In the second place, this case raises no general question as to the liability of the employer of a messenger or sheriff-officer, because here the employer adopted the acting of the officer.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the diligence sought to be reduced was used oppressively and illegally: Therefore repel the defences in both of the conjoined actions: Reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of both summonses: Find the pursuer entitled to damages; assess the same at £100, and decern against both defenders conjunctly and severally for payment thereof to the pursuer: Find the pursuer entitled to three-fourths of the expenses incurred in the Outer-House: Find him entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

v. Austin, &c.

Sea-shore—Right of barony proprietor to exclude public from his private pier and harbour.—A proprietor of seaboard lands, with a barony title, who had built a quay upon the foreshore ex adverso of his barony, and had formed a small harbour, with a road giving access to it from a village on his estate, for more than forty years had exacted dues from coasting craft, but not from fishing-boats, for admission to the pier and harbour. In an action raised by him concluding for interdict to enforce payment of these dues by the lessees of oyster-fisheries, recently established in the neighbourhood, and by the owners of boats employed by them, held that, as the pursuer had no grant of harbour, he had no right to exclude the defenders from the use of that part of the shore where the harbour was built, or to exact harbour-dues, and defenders assolvit.

THE barony of Kilhilt, including the lands and village of Drumore, 2ND DIVISION. lying on the south-west side of the Bay of Luce, in Wigtownshire, is part of the Stair estates. Drumore Point, extending into the sea at a little distance from the village, forms a smaller bay within the Bay of Luce, which is called Drumore Bay. Near this point, and within Drumore Bay, two gravel banks ran out from the shore at a short distance from one another, forming a sort of natural anchorage for fishing boats and other small craft.

By arrangement with John, Earl of Stair, a pier was erected on one of these gravel banks in 1809 by Alexander M'Douall, at considerable expense, and the solum was dredged between it and the other gravel bank so as to make a small tidal harbour with pier or quay for the loading and discharge of coasting vessels. M'Douall got a lease of the harbour for 99 years, at a nominal rent, with power to levy reasonable dues on vessels taking the benefit of the harbour and works. This lease was ultimately assigned to the Earl of Stair in 1843.

A private estate road was made at an early date by the Earl of Stair from the foot of Drumore village along the shore to the pier, and he continued to maintain the pier and harbour, by repairing, dredging, and otherwise, and, either by his servants or tacksmen, levied small dues on the trading smacks which frequented the harbour in order to reimburse himself this outlay. No dues were levied on fishing-boats, which, though they sometimes used the harbour and the shore inside the harbour, made no use of the pier. It was proved that when the weather was favourable fishing-boats were hauled up on the shore and moored to pawls fixed in the beach near high-water mark between the village of Drumore and the pier, or to rings fastened to large stones in the gravel bank behind the pier; but that in rough weather they anchored in the harbour.

In 1871 Messrs Austin & Gann, an English firm, became, for the first time, lessees from the Crown of the oyster-fisheries in the Bay of Luce. Prior to that date the boats belonging to the district sometimes dredged for oysters, but there had been no regular fishery.

Messrs Austin & Gann made Drumore village the centre of their operations, and employed many of the villagers and their boats. They dredged the oysters with large boats of fifteen or thereby tons burden, but generally landed them on the shore at a little distance from the harbour by means of small boats. At the same time, as alleged by the Earl of Stair, they brought their large boats into the harbour, and, though they seldom made use of the pier, anchored them in such a manner as frequently to block up the harbour and prevent the access of trading smacks to the pier. They refused to pay any dues in respect of their use of the harbour.

The Earl of Stair raised this action against Messrs Austin & Gann, and also against William Biggam and others, residing in Drumore, owners of boats, who with their boats were engaged in the service of Messrs Austin & Gann in the oyster-fishing, to have it found and declared "that the quay at Drumore harbour, in the Bay of Luce, and adjacent shore of the lands of Drumore, on both sides of the quay, and the access to the said quay and shore through the said lands, belong to and are the property of the pursuer, and that the defenders have no right or title to moor their vessels or boats by attaching them to the quay at Drumore, or to the stakes, buoys, anchors, or works thereon, or on the said shore, used in connection with the said harbour, or to use the said quay, stakes, buoys, anchors or other works, or the said access to the said quay and adjacent shore, for the purpose of loading or discharging their vessels or boats, or otherwise as a landing-place in connection with the fishing in the Bay of Luce," and to have the defenders "interdicted and discharged from mooring their vessels or boats at the said quay, or to the said stakes, buoys, anchors, or other works, and from using the said quay and access thereto, and to the adjacent shore, through the pursuer's lands, for the purpose of loading or discharging their vessels or boats, or otherwise as a landing-place in connection with the fishery in the Bay of Luce."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being proprietor of the quay at Drumore and adjacent lands, is entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. (2) The defenders having no right or title, ought to be interdicted from using the said quay and access thereto.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has produced, and has, no title to sue. (2) The pursuer's statement is irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (5) In any view, the pursuer is not entitled to the decrees of declarator and interdict concluded for, in so far as these are directed against the defenders mooring their vessels in the bay and using the sea-shore for the purpose of loading or discharging their vessels or boats, or otherwise using the shore as a landing place in connection with the fishings in the Bay of Luce.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th July 1880, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it sufficiently established by the titles produced, and by the possession which has been had under them by the pursuer and his predecessors, that the quay at Drumore harbour, in the Bay of Luce, and the road leading thereto from the village of Drumore, and also the adjacent shore from which such quay extends, form part of the lands and barony of Kilhilt, belonging to the pursuer, and are the property of the pursuer, and that the defenders, the lessees of the oyster-scalps and oyster-fishings in the bed of the sea in the Bay of Luce, and others fishing oysters there in their right, have no right or title to use the said quay or road or other property of the pursuer for the purposes of the oyster-fishings in the Bay of Luce: To the extent and effect of so finding, repels the defences, and finds and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Grants interdict in terms of the conclusions thereof, so far as applicable to the oyster-fishery, and decerns: Quoad ultra finds that no grounds have been established for pronouncing decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and particularly that no grounds have been established for excluding the defenders who are called as fishermen residing in Drumore from the use of the shore in connection with the fishing of white fish in the Bay of Luce: Dismisses the action excepting to the extent and effect above expressed, and decerns.”*

Earl of Stair
v. Austin, &c.

* “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has been somewhat puzzled how to dispose of this action, owing to the general terms used in the conclusions of the summons, and to the fact that no distinction has been taken by the defenders as between the rights of those exercising the Crown's right of oyster-fishing, and the rights of fishermen generally.

“As the Crown is not called, the Lord Ordinary assumes that no question was intended to be raised by the pursuer concerning the property of the foreshore, or the uses to which it may be subject on the part of fishermen exercising the right of fishing for white fish. He has therefore decided only upon the question raised with the oyster-fishers as to their use of the quay.”

(His Lordship then narrated the history of the pier and its access.)

“In these circumstances, the question raised by the defenders is, whether they have right, as lessees of the Crown's oyster-fishings in the Bay of Luce, or as otherwise exercising the right of the Crown to the oyster-fishings in the sea, to use the quay in question, or to dispute the pursuer's title to it as his private property.

“The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defenders have failed to instruct any right to the use of the quay. The lease of oyster-fishings upon which they found deals with the oyster-fishings in the bed of the sea as a distinct patrimonial right; and the Lord Ordinary does not doubt that they may be so regarded. But such a right gives them no title, and the lease does not profess to give them any title to make use of the private property of the pursuer, or others holding property upon the sea-shore; nor does it give them any title to question the pursuer's right to maintain the quay as a part of his property—that not being questioned by the Crown, from whom the lease is derived.

“It is quite settled law, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, that the proprietor of a seaboard estate, held under a barony title, may establish by possession a right to the property of erections on the foreshore, and to the foreshore itself—(Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, 11 Macph. 309; Colquhoun v. Paton, June 17, 1859, 21 D. 996). And although every right to the foreshore is subject to certain public uses, it is indisputable that the shore may be appropriated; and where it has been appropriated, with the authority, expressed or implied, of the Crown, a separate grant of oyster-beds under the sea will not confer a right to make use of the shore so appropriated. Such oyster-fishings may be carried on from any neighbouring port, and imply no right to make use of the adjacent land or property connected therewith.

“The case of the fishermen of Drumore generally, however, is different,—at least, in so far as the use of the shore is referred to in the summons. By the Scots Act of Queen Anne's reign (1705, c. 2), persons fishing for white fish ob-

v. Austin, &c.

LORD YOUNG.—It is clearly of advantage to the proprietor of an estate that fishings, whosoever may be the tenants, should be established which give profitable employment to the villagers residing upon his property. Drumore is really a fishing village, situated upon what may be called a sort of natural harbour or anchorage, protected by a projecting point. The oyster-fisheries in the neighbourhood give employment to the inhabitants of the village, and are therefore of advantage to the district generally and to the proprietor in particular. It appears that a predecessor of the present Earl of Stair early in the present century, for the benefit of the district, made a road along the sea-shore to a convenient point for purposes of embarkation and disembarkation; and that he, or one of his tenants in his right, had shortly before improved this point for these purposes by making a quay at its extremity. One of the witnesses says,—“The quay was finished in 1810 so far as I remember, and the road was then cut out of one of the Earl of Stair’s fields down to a level with the quay. It was made by people employed by Mr M’Douall. Before that there was no road except to the sea-beach and the sand. After the road was made, Mr M’Douall built a wall to prevent the sea from tearing away the road. The road was made no farther west than near to the quay—cut out of the brae. Of late years a piece of road was made from the quay to the point of Drumore. It was said to be the Earl of Stair that did that—to one of his farms. The public at large in going to the harbour use the road from Drumore to the quay.” Nevertheless the quay was an improvement upon the natural shore, and it would cost a certain amount of money. The making of the road to it was also an advantage; and that it and the road should be used by all and sundry who wanted to go to the shore was just the very thing that made it of advantage to the district, and indirectly to the proprietor of the district.

It does not follow from all this, and even from Lord Stair having exacted certain payments from those who availed themselves of the improvements which he had made upon the previous natural state of things, that Lord Stair could have appropriated,—with or without the works which he had executed for the tained right to the use of the shores for bringing in and unloading their fish. The Lord Ordinary is not aware that this right has been taken away. It does not appear to be repealed by the Fisheries Act of 1868. It is necessary, therefore, in his opinion, to avoid deciding anything which might prejudice a claim not distinctly challenged in this action, although the terms of the conclusions might affect it.

“With regard to any claim which the defenders may have to the use of the shore as members of the public, it is only necessary to say that the foregoing interlocutor will not prejudice such claim. It disposes only of the question concerning the defenders’ right to use the quay and its adjuncts. Holding, as the Lord Ordinary has held, that these are the property of the pursuer, the case of Colquhoun v. Paton appears to him substantially to decide against the right of individual members of the public to make use of such structures without complying with the proprietor’s conditions, and to negative the title of private individuals to complain of such structures as an encroachment.”

improvement of the harbour,—Drumore Point, as a place where he exclusively, or those having his special permission, should be entitled to embark and disembark, and from which all others should be excluded. For him to have pointed out any part of the sea-shore there which should be exclusively appropriated to his own use, or to the use of those having his special permission, would, I think, have been extravagant with reference to public rights; but that he should have improved the natural state of things by certain works at his own expense was the most natural thing in the world for a proprietor to do. It was not mere benevolence, although that perhaps had something to do with it. — Whatever improves the state of things in a district is a benefit to the proprietor; and it is just the multiplication and continuance of such benefits that has raised the condition of this harbour from the state in which it was in 1809 to the very different state in which it is now.

Earl of Stair
v. Austin, &c.

Lord Stair, or his advisers—probably he was entirely in the hands of advisers in the matter—conceived he had a right of harbour, and a right to exact dues from all resorting to the place, but I suppose, consistently with the argument which we have heard, that it was a right of harbour of this particular sort, that he could admit whom he pleased and exclude whom he pleased. Where there is a grant of harbour, that is, where there is a grant recognised by law, all the world are entitled to resort there upon paying the reasonable dues which may be exacted; but the kind of harbour here claimed is a harbour to which some may be admitted and from which others may be excluded at the will of the alleged proprietor. Now, that is altogether out of the question.

I do not know how much of this shore the proprietor would include within the space that he so claims as subject to his entire control. It is stated on record as the quay which had been erected on the old natural gravel bank at Drumore Point and the shore adjacent on either side. How much that is to include we were told, upon appealing to the bar for information, had not yet been thought of. But it is manifest that the inhabitants of this village upon the sea-shore are entitled to put to sea in boats and to come back again. From anything that appears they might have to embark twenty miles off on either side if they were to get to sea. But if they are entitled to embark and land, as heretofore in all past time, from the adjacent sea-shore, and to moor their boats to the rings which have been put there for the purpose—and they have been doing nothing more—what in the world is the meaning of this action?

I can understand it in any other than a legal point of view. Lord Stair says—“It costs me £20 a-year to keep up this pier and to clear away the periodical silting up; and as a certain number of the villagers have profitable employment in the oyster-fishing, and use their boats in connection with that fishing, I think it is proper that they or their employers should relieve me of part at least of that expense, because of the convenience which they have in anchoring in the bay, which is, to a certain extent, protected by this quay.” That may be more or less reasonable, but I am afraid the legal answer is conclusive. “Take away your quay if you like. We do not object to your keeping it there if it serves your purpose; but if you wish to take it away, remove it, by all means, and we will land from our boats just the same; they may then be as well protected or not, as it happens. There is a difference of opinion about that. Some say the bank would protect us well enough but for the stones that have been taken out of it to make this pier. But we are prepared to take our chance.”

Dec. 2, 1880.
 Earl of Stair
 v. Austin, &c.

There is no manner of right by which Lord Stair can exact harbour dues. When these fishermen land on the shore and fasten their boats to the rings, they are just doing what has been done in time past, and has not been objected to. They may be in greater numbers now ; that is the mark of their prosperity, which it ought to rejoice the landlord that these fishings have brought to the village and the people of the village. I say nothing about the Crown having[†] appropriated the oyster-fishings. They may be entitled to do that and let them to an English company, or they may not ; that is not in question. But one result is to bring such additional prosperity to the village and the people thereof, as is indicated by the very concourse of fishing boats to this bay which is referred to, and to say that they are to pay dues because of this pier or dyke which was erected upon the sea-shore in 1809 is, as a legal proposition, altogether out of the question.

I entirely concur with the observation which has been made by Lord Gifford—to some extent by all of us, but more pointedly by him—that it is impossible to make any distinction between the people who are embarking for or returning from oyster-fishing, and those who are embarking for or returning from any other kind of fishing. In pursuit of lawful business or pleasure upon the sea, the inhabitants of this village, or the public at large, who are entitled to reach the sea-shore, are entitled to embark and to land as heretofore.

It has been sufficiently pointed out in the course of the argument that there is really here no question about the use of the pier, that not having been taken by the fishermen in question ; but if there had been a question about the use of the pier, as perhaps there formally is by the conclusions of the summons, it would be apparent, I think, from what I have already said, that, in my opinion, there is no distinction between the pier and the rest of the shore. The site of the pier was just the shore, and the pier is nothing more than an artificial erection, and not of a very elaborate character, on a natural bank which forms part of this bay, and I could make no distinction, if there was any legal question about it, between the pier and the rest.

I have only further to say that I quite assume that Lord Stair has all the right of property on the sea-shore, including this improved natural promontory, which is properly enough called a quay, which any adjacent seaboard proprietor could have in the sea-shore. If there was any dispute about that, we have no parties here between whom to try it. The action is directed against people who are making a use of the sea-shore not as proprietors, not as claiming any right of property, but as the residents of the district, the inhabitants of this village, or the seafaring public who happen to be dwelling in this village, and although it is quite proper to state as an introduction to the argument that the question is about this right of use by the fishermen, it is upon a challenge by the proprietor of the sea-shore. The proprietor of this barony, whose title to the barony is not in dispute, challenges a certain use. I am of opinion that there has been no invasion of his rights by the use of which he complains, therefore it is quite unnecessary to pronounce any decree of declarator of his right in the sea-shore any more than to his Stair estates, or to this barony, which is part of the Stair estates. I assume that ; and assuming that, I am of opinion that he sets forth no denial or invasion of any legal right, and that, therefore, this action is untenable, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur, and on the same ground. In one sense this may be said to be an important case, for its conclusions may be calculated to raise some important questions. But, fortunately, the real matter at issue is very trifling, and we are not called upon to give an opinion upon most of these questions. The conclusions of the summons are twofold, first, for a declarator that the pursuer, Lord Stair, is proprietor of a quay in the locality mentioned, and of a certain portion of the adjacent shore; and also for declarator that the defenders have no right to moor their boats at said quay, or at the adjacent shore. Then there is a conclusion that the defenders "should be interdicted and discharged from mooring their vessels or boats at the said quay, or to the said stakes, buoys, anchors, and other works." This conclusion for interdict is directed against the whole defenders, and these stakes, buoys, anchors, and other works are stated to be on the quay, and on the adjacent shore on either side of the quay, so that really the attempt is to prevent these oyster-fishers, and all people whom they employ, from using this little harbour, natural bay, or dyke at Drumore for the purpose of oyster-fishing. I think the declaratory conclusions may fairly be regarded as introductory merely to the interdict. And I agree that, so far as this is a declarator of right in the foreshore or any part of it, there is no proper contradictor and no materials for pronouncing a judgment. The proper defender would be the Crown, but the Crown is not called. The defenders who are called are partly the lessees of the oyster-fisheries, who apparently reside at Canterbury in Kent, and they have no right or interest to raise this question of property, and are eminently not defenders on that point. Neither are the other defenders, who are all residents in or near Drumore, and proprietors of small fishing-boats. Plainly these are not the parties with whom to try the question of right of property in the foreshore, and I do not think they have any interest to raise that question, for none of them are claiming property in it; they are only claiming public use. I think, therefore, this declarator is really uncalled for.

But that leaves open still the question of interdict. A proof has been led, and I think the result of the proof, or rather the result of the admissions, is this: The quay was made by the Earl of Stair, or by a tenant by arrangement with him, in or about 1809, and he has kept it up, he or his tenants by arrangement with him, ever since, such as it is, and he has levied dues from coasting vessels, whatever that expression may mean. He admits that he has never levied dues from fishing-boats resorting to the quay or coming into the bay and using the pawls. Now, in that state of fact, he proposes to levy dues from the fishing-boats belonging to the defenders, the principal tacksmen of the oyster-fishings in the bay, and from all boats to whomsoever belonging, employed by them in connection with the oyster-fishings. I do not think that conclusion has been supported in point of proof, or upon any ground intelligible or reasonable either in law or equity. If the dredging of oysters had gone on on a smaller scale with vessels of somewhat less size as it did before the Crown let the fishing to the Kent company, I suppose there would have been no demand for such dues. No boat ever paid dues for bringing in oysters from time immemorial; that has been admitted and proven. Why then shall the boats that come from Kent, or the fishermen who bring boats from Kent, pay any dues? The admission given in the proof was not that it was a gratuity given to the tenants of Drumore estate; the admission was that fishing-boats had come there, as undoubtedly they had a right to do, ever since there was such a thing as fishing there, or a

v. Austin, &c.

And this really exposes the fallacy which underlies this action, viz., that Lord Stair has a right of harbour, which he has not, and therefore no right to levy harbour dues. In the statement on record he says,—“The defenders nevertheless refuse to pay harbour dues to the pursuer, and this action has therefore been rendered necessary.” It is not that the defenders are doing wrong, or because any injury has been done, but because they are now refusing to pay harbour dues, although their boats are not coasting vessels, which alone have paid harbour dues hitherto, but fishing boats, and the foundation of Lord Stair’s claim is the idea that he has the right to levy harbour dues, and, as the counterpart of that right, to interdict anybody from using the harbour who does not pay harbour dues. The claim of the pursuer comes, in fact, to this,—“I have the right of harbour at Drumore, you the fishing boats from Kent shall not enter my harbour and have the benefit of my harbour without paying me harbour dues.” The answer to that is,—“You have no right of harbour.” Nobody has right of harbour who has not a grant of harbour and who does not support the harbour, granted, as such grants always are, for advantage, and containing, as they always do, an obligation to maintain the harbour for the purposes, of the public, and the right to levy dues is the counterpart of maintaining the harbour. Lord Stair is not bound to maintain this harbour; he is not bound to lay out that £20, which he seems to think so serious a matter, upon the harbour; he may give up expending it, and say to the tenants and to the oyster fishermen, “You are the only parties using the harbour, keep it up yourselves.” That may be a reasonable thing for him to say, not a very generous thing certainly, but we have nothing to do with generosity. The question we have to decide here is whether Lord Stair is entitled to interdict anybody from going into Drumore harbour, or from fastening boats to the pawls, or even from mooring them to the shore. I think the answer to that is conclusive,—“You have no right to levy harbour dues; you do not pretend to have that right; nothing can be pointed to on which to rest it,—no right of harbour—no immemorial usage—and therefore you cannot interdict parties from doing that which they have a right to do; without that illegal condition which you have no right to impose.”

That seems to me absolutely conclusive of the whole case. I cannot hold that the man who goes out to dredge oysters is not a fisherman, and to make a distinction between the “Vigilant” when she goes out to fish cod, and the “Vigilant” when she goes out to help in the oyster-fishing, is absolutely absurd. You cannot make people pay in one case and not in another. I think the foundation of this action fails the moment it is seen that Lord Stair has no right of harbour and no right to levy dues; therefore he cannot make the payment of these dues the condition of the public use of the harbour he has made.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships. I have great difficulty in understanding the drift of the pursuer’s summons. His whole claim is, I think, untenable, and I have only two observations to make.

The first is, that the Lord Ordinary gives undue importance to the case by some general expressions regarding the appropriation of the shore, which he seems to think may be made by a seaboard proprietor. There is, I think, no authority for such a proposition. It may be quite true that any erection on the shore by the proprietor is as much his property as any other part of the shore, but it is no more. I subscribe to what Lord Neaves said in the case of Hagart, 9 Macph. 129,—“Even if the petitioner had a title which gave him an absolute right to the foreshore that would not give him a right to exclude the public from the shore so long as it remained a shore.” That I take to mean, that no man by putting down a building or other erection on the shore can prevent any member of the public using that building or erection, just as he could any other part of the shore. But, secondly, the question in this case is really a question of interdict, and after what has been said by your Lordships it is quite unnecessary for me to go at length into the case. I would notice, however, that the defenders are actually sought to be interdicted from the use of the shore adjacent to the quay, as well as of the quay itself, as a landing place in connection with the fishery in the Bay of Luce, so that fishermen are actually proposed to be prohibited on their return from fishing oysters from setting foot upon the shore adjacent to the quay. That, in my opinion, is entirely and absolutely out of the question. It might be profitable to both parties to come to some arrangement, but that is a matter with which we cannot deal. I am satisfied that the conclusions in this summons, both for declarator and for interdict, are wholly and entirely untenable.

Trust—Foreign—Direction to entail jewels as heirlooms in England—Testamentary intention.—A trust-settlement in Scotch form, and executed in Scotland by a domiciled Scotch lady, directed that certain jewels, &c. should “be held as heirlooms and settled upon” her son, the Marquis of Bute, “and after him on the heirs entitled to succeed to the Bute estates, in the county of Glamorgan ;” and in the event of his dying without issue they were to be sold at his death by public auction, and the proceeds applied in the erection of almshouses, &c. The testatrix further directed that certain plate should “be settled and secured upon the same series of heirs as are appointed to succeed to the Marquis of Bute’s Glamorganshire estates.” The trustees delivered the jewels and plate to the Marquis on obtaining from him a receipt acknowledging that they had been delivered on the conditions set forth in the trust-deed, and binding himself to concur with the trustees in settling them by a formal deed, in such form as might be permitted by the rules of law and equity, in terms of the trust-deed.

Ld. Curriehill.

By trust-disposition and settlement, dated 2d June 1859, Sophia Marchioness of Bute, who died on 28th December 1859, conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees. The deed was in Scotch form, and was prepared and executed in Scotland.

The fourth purpose of the deed was as follows:—"I direct and appoint that the jewels, watches, seals, pocket and other personal trinkets and ornaments bequeathed to me by the late John Marquess of Bute, my husband, shall be held as heirlooms and settled upon my dear and only child, John Patrick, now Marquess of Bute, and after him on the heirs entitled to succeed to the Bute estates in the county of Glamorgan; and in the event of my dying before my son attains the age of twenty-one, I recommend and trust that the Court of Chancery will appoint as his guardians the foresaid Colonel Charles Stuart, Sir Francis Hastings Gilbert, Baronet, and Lady Elizabeth Moore, whose near relationship entitles them to the office, and in all of whom I have the most perfect confidence; and if any member of the Bute family shall interfere with or endeavour to prevent such appointment, or refuse to apply for and recommend it, then and in that case, or in the event of my son dying without issue, I direct the said jewels, trinkets, and others to be sold at his death by public auction, and the proceeds applied in the erection of almshouses in memory of my mother and my sister Flora, said almshouses to be erected in or near Edinburgh, their birthplace, and to be called the 'Flora Almshouses,' to be used and occupied by the widows and daughters of officers of the British or Indian army in necessitous circumstances, under such conditions and regulations as my trustees may from time to time appoint."

The sixth purpose was,—“I direct and appoint the plate purchased by me from the executors of the deceased Lord Dudley Stuart to be made an heirloom, and settled and secured upon the same series of heirs as are appointed to succeed to the Marquess of Bute's Glamorganshire estates; and in respect a portion thereof is much worn, I authorise any heir in possession to melt down and restore what may at the time be unfit for use.”

By the eighth purpose of the deed the truster further directed and appointed that the residue of her estate should be applied to the purposes of the almshouses above-mentioned, or in such other manner as her trustees should consider most for the honour and benefit of her family.

Lady Bute's trustees, in pursuance of the directions of the trust-deed, delivered the jewels and others and the plate to the Marquess of Bute per inventory, taking from him the following receipt and obligation, dated 12th July 1873:—"And now, seeing that the said Lieutenant-General Charles Stuart, Sir James Fergusson, and Frederick Pitman have handed over to me the jewels, watches, seals, pocket and other personal trinkets and ornaments referred to in the fourth place, and that I have also received the plate referred to in the sixth place of the said trust-disposition and settlement, conform to inventories thereof annexed, and signed by me as relative hereto, but always on the terms and conditions of the said trust-disposition and settlement, and that it is reasonable and proper that I should grant these presents; therefore I bind and oblige myself and my heirs, executors, and successors, at any time (if and when called upon) to concur with the trustees and their successors in settling, by a formal deed or deeds, in such form as may be permitted by the rules of law and equity, the said jewels, watches, seals, pocket and other personal trinkets and ornaments, and the said plate above referred to, upon myself, and after me on the heirs entitled to succeed to the Bute estates in the county of Glamorgan, all in the terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement; and in the event of my death without issue, I direct my executors or executor, and bind and oblige my heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever to hand over the said jewels, watches, seals, pocket and other personal trinkets and ornaments to the said trustees and their successors in office, in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement; and in the event of my death, leaving issue, I direct my executors or executor, and bind and oblige my heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to hand over the said jewels, watches, seals, pocket and other personal trinkets and ornaments, and the said plate, to the heir entitled to succeed to the Bute estates in Glamorganshire, as above provided."

Marquis of Bute v. Lady
Bute's Trustees, &c.

An action was brought by the Marquess, concluding for declarator that under the trust-disposition above narrated he was entitled to the absolute property of the jewels, &c. and plate, and had right to dispose of them at pleasure. He called as defenders (1) the trustees, and (2) his only child, Lady Margaret Crichton Stuart, Lieut.-Col. J. F. Dudley Crichton Stuart, and his son, Patrick James Crichton Stuart, who were the next heirs of entail to the Glamorganshire estates.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) That his rights in the jewels, &c. were those of absolute property; and (2) that the direction for their sale had become inoperative, in respect he had attained the age of twenty-one, and, separatim, had issue.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) That under the limitations in the deed the pursuer's interest in the jewels was a life interest, similar to the interest he had in the Glamorganshire estates under the deed of entail, and that they had been effectually settled upon him for life within the meaning of the deed, by delivery to him upon the above-mentioned document of receipt and obligation; and (2) that they were bound to carry out the direction in the deed in accordance with the law of England, by which personal property might be entailed so as to be transmissible as heirlooms.

* "NOTE.—. . . The pursuer, however, maintains that, as the mother was a domiciled Scotchwoman, and as her settlement, which is in the Scottish form, was prepared by her agents in Edinburgh, and executed by her in that city, the deed must be construed according to the law of Scotland; that by the law of Scotland an entail of moveables, which is what is truly intended by the directions above recited, cannot receive any effect; that he is therefore entitled to retain the whole of the articles as his absolute and exclusive property, and to alienate them at pleasure, onerously or gratuitously; and that he is not bound to redeliver them to the trustees, or to submit to their being settled or secured as directed by the settlement.

"It may be conceded, and after the recent decision in the case of Kinnear, 2 Ret. 765, and 4 Ret. 705, it would be difficult to dispute that, by the law of Scotland, moveables cannot be effectually entailed; but the defenders, who are the trustees of the late Marchioness, and the four persons next entitled to succeed to the Glamorganshire estates, viz., the pursuer's only child, Lady Margaret Stuart, and Colonel J. F. Crichton Stuart, and his two sons, maintain (1) as regards the jewels and trinkets, that the direction, even if the settlement be construed as a Scotch deed, confers upon the pursuer no higher right than a life interest; and (2) that, as regards not only the jewels and trinkets, but also the plate, the settlement must be construed with reference to the law of England, which allows moveables to be made heirlooms, and entailed in connection with landed estates.

"Now, even assuming that the settlement must be construed as a purely Scotch deed, and with reference to the rules of the law of Scotland, which forbid entails of moveables, I should be inclined to hold that, according to the sound construction of the fourth purpose, the direction given to the trustees to hold the jewels, &c. as heirlooms, and settle and secure them on the pursuer and the heirs of the Glamorganshire estates, is qualified by the direction to sell them in

Bute v. Lady
Bute's Trustees, &c.

The following minute of admissions was put in in the Inner-House :—
“(1) That under the will of the late Lord Bute, the present Lord Bute, the pursuer, is tenant for life of the Bute estates in the county of Glamorgan, with remainder to his first and every other son successively in tail, with remainder to his first and every other daughter successively in tail, with other remainders over. (2) That by the law of England personal property may be devised and limited as an heirloom to a person for life, with remainder to other persons in tail. (3) That by the law of England personal property so devised or limited as an heirloom will be enjoyed by the tenant for life, and will be inalienable by him, and at his death will pass to and become the absolute property of the first person seised in tail, unless by an express declaration in the settlement vesting has been postponed until his attainment of twenty-one, or his death under that age, leaving issue inheritable under the entail.”

Argued for the reclamer ;—(1) The deed was a Scotch one ; it was in Scotch form, and Lady Bute was a domiciled Scotchwoman. That shewed that Scotch law was that by which the deed fell to be interpreted.¹ By Scotch law, which was alone applicable, an entail of moveables was impossible.² (2) The Lord Ordinary was not entitled to get assistance from the fact of the direction to sell. The clauses were to be construed by themselves. (3) There was no need here to have recourse to English conveyancing. The word “heirlooms” did not necessarily import a reference to the law of England. Even if it did, it was not a word of skill.³ The

the event of the pursuer dying without issue, and to apply the price in the erection of almshouses. This, I think, clearly implies that the pursuer was intended to have merely a life interest in these articles, and that the heirs of the Glamorganshire estates were to take no interest at all in the event of the pursuer dying without issue.

“I am inclined, however, to think that, in giving the directions contained in the fourth and sixth purposes of the settlement, the truster intended her trustees to deal with the jewels, trinkets, and plate according to the rules of English jurisprudence, and that the settlement must be construed on that footing. It is therefore necessary to ascertain how the Courts of England would deal with this settlement ; and at the debate the parties concurred in stating (1) that by the law of England moveables may be competently made ‘heirlooms,’ and may be effectually entailed in connection with land ; (2) that the directions in question are expressed in the proper terms to secure that result with reference to the Glamorganshire estates of the Bute family, which are held under a strict entail ; and (3) that the interest of the pursuer in these estates, and in the jewels and plate, if made heirlooms, is merely a life interest.

“This being so, it appears to me that the trustees have already given to the pursuer all that he is entitled to ask. They have handed to him the articles, per inventory, taking from him at the same time an obligation to concur with them in settling and securing the heirlooms, in terms of the directions, and directing his executors on his death to restore them to the trustees. What is to become of the articles after the pursuer’s death is a question on which I do not venture to offer an opinion. In the meantime, the pursuer cannot succeed in his present claim, and the action will be dismissed—a course which I think preferable to pronouncing decree of absolvitor in favour of the defenders.”

case was stronger in the sixth purpose than in the fourth, for there was no ulterior direction in the former. No. 45.

Argued for the defenders ;—The pursuer said the question was one of construction, and not of intention. But the Court, if possible, would give effect to the intention.¹ The intention was that a deed should be executed in English form, by which the jewels, &c. should go with the Glamorganshire estates. It was possible in English law to create a series of life-rents of moveables by the machinery of a trust.² But if Lady Bute's directions were held to be impossible, the jewels, &c. would fall into residue, and could not in any case fall to the pursuer.

Dec. 3, 1880.
Marquis of
Bute v. Lady
Bute's Trustees, &c.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a question as to the property of certain jewels and plate which were settled by the will of the late Marchioness of Bute. They are claimed by the pursuer, who is her son, the present Marquis, as his absolute property. On the other hand, Lady Bute's trustees maintain that the jewels and plate fall to be settled according to the directions contained in her will.

With regard to the first question, we must ascertain what was the intention of the testatrix, and when we have ascertained that, the only other question is how to carry that intention into effect, or whether it should not be carried into effect at all, which is the contention of the pursuer. The property in question is disposed of by the fourth and sixth purposes of Lady Bute's will, which are in the following terms—[reads as above.]

Now, the provision as to the jewels in the fourth clause is not quite the same as the provision about the plate in the sixth clause. They are the same so far, that in both the testatrix expresses a desire to settle them as heirlooms on her son and the other heirs entitled to succeed to the Glamorganshire estates ; but in the fourth clause there is in certain events an ulterior direction to the trustees to sell the jewels and apply the proceeds in a certain way, and one of these events is that of her son dying without issue.

As far as the question of intention is concerned, I have no doubt whatever. The Glamorganshire estates were settled, as we now have it admitted, by the will of the late Marquis of Bute, in such a way that the pursuer is tenant of them for life, with remainder to his first and every other son successively in tail, with remainder to his first and every other daughter successively in tail, with other remainders over, and the immediate heir after the pursuer is his daughter, and only child, who is a party to this case. That being so, if the testatrix's intention is to be carried out, and can be carried out, I have no doubt the jewels and plate must be settled so that the pursuer shall have the use of them for life, and after his death they shall pass to his daughter if she survives and is at the time of his death the heiress entitled to succeed to the Glamorganshire estates. The event of his dying without issue need not, I think, be considered.

But the pursuer contends, that even though that had been the intention, it cannot be put in effect, because by Scotch law it is impossible to entail moveable goods, and therefore that there is no form of deed by which it would be possible to bring about the effect contemplated and desired by the testatrix. I think that contention is quite ill-founded. It seems to me to be no matter whether it is or is not possible, according to Scotch law, to settle moveables so as to pass from one heir to another in succession, vesting no absolute property in any one of them; for the purpose here is that they shall go to the heir entitled to succeed to the Glamorganshire estates under an English entail, and it must therefore receive effect by that law. The intention is that these moveables should go along with the estates so settled. I think there is nothing incompetent or improper, far less illegal, in the proposal that a deed should be made—an English deed, if necessary—carrying these moveables along with the estates as heirlooms, if that can be done.

Now, we have it admitted “that by the law of England personal property may be devised and limited as an heirloom to a person for life with remainder to other persons in tail;” and also “that by the law of England personal property so devised or limited as an heirloom will be enjoyed by the tenant for life, and will be inalienable by him, and at his death will pass to and become the absolute property of the first person seised in tail, unless by an express declaration in the settlement vesting has been postponed until his attainment of twenty-one, or his death under that age leaving issue inheritable under the entail.” The lady left these articles along with her property in trust, and gave her trustees certain directions as to how they were to be disposed of. If she had made an entail herself it is possible that might have been ineffectual. But she has conveyed the goods to trustees, and expressed a desire as to their disposal; and if the trustees can in any way carry that into effect they are bound to do so. The trustees, acting under the will, and not apparently entertaining any doubt as to their right to carry these purposes into effect, made an arrangement with the present Marquis of Bute, in the form of a receipt, or deed as it may be called. They handed over to him the jewels and plate, and took a receipt from him which was in this form—[reads as above.] The trustees fell on a plan for securing the object in view, which seems to me a most reasonable one, and they had apparently the full concurrence of the present pursuer in doing so. He has changed his mind now, and seeks to obtain the moveables in absolute property; but that would be a contradiction of the direct wishes of the testatrix, which were given effect to by the arrangement which was embodied in the deed or receipt I have described, by which the object in view was effectually carried out. In the event of certain exceedingly improbable occurrences, such as the bankruptcy of the pursuer, some questions might arise with creditors, but I think that was not in the view of the trustees or the pursuer in coming to that arrangement. It was thought quite enough to take a personal obligation from him, and I think there was nothing illegal in such an obligation, and that it was probably quite sufficient in the circumstances to secure the object of the testatrix; but if anything further were necessary, I think the trustees would be quite justified in calling on the pursuer, in terms of the obligation, to concur in any deed which would be effectual by the law of England to tie up the moveables in the manner desired.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD DEAS.—I do not see any reasonable doubt that though these clauses as to the jewels and plate are in a Scotch deed, the jewels and plate may be conveyed as heirlooms by an English deed, if that law recognises that as a thing that may be done. Nor is there anything to lead me to suppose that by English law it cannot be done. No. 45.

But the question here is a much more limited one. The Marquis of Bute claims a right of absolute property in these articles, and it is as clear as day that from no reasonable point of view has he any such right; for the obligation under which he got and accepted delivery of them is expressed on the footing that he is only to have the lifereit use of them. That, to my mind, is an end of the whole case.

LORD MURE.—I think there is very little difficulty in this case. The whole phraseology of the deed goes to shew that a mere lifereit right in these moveables was intended to be created in the Marquis. It is objected that you cannot make such articles "heirlooms" by Scotch law; but I know of no law to prevent a Scotch person directing things to be made heirlooms with reference to an English estate to which the party in whose favour the heirlooms are to be made over has right according to the law of England. The Lord Ordinary has thrown out this view in the latter part of his note, and I quite concur with his Lordship's remarks. These articles will therefore fall to be dealt with according to the rules of English law.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordships. It seems to me that the Marquis of Bute acted on a sound view of his legal position when he signed the obligation in 1873, and has taken an erroneous view in bringing the present action. The effect of the provisions of the trust-disposition is that a lifereit right only is conferred upon him. We have nothing to do with the question how far such articles can or can not be entailed by the law of Scotland. The trustees are here directed to entail the jewels and other things on the heirs entitled to succeed to an English estate, and it is therefore a question of English conveyancing how that is to be done. I think there is no difficulty in the case, and that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

THE COURT adhered.

and their result, they sent this notice, which was served upon the owners of lands and heritages in the street:—" Edinburgh Roads Establishment. Notice is hereby given to the owners of lands and heritages in Dove Lane, a private street within the city of Edinburgh district of roads, that the Magistrates and Council of the city of Edinburgh require the said owners to repair the carriage-way of the said street to the satisfaction of the city road surveyor; that if the said owners shall fail or neglect, within fourteen days from and after the date of this notice, to put the carriage-way of the said street in a complete and efficient state of repair, the Magistrates and Council will forthwith execute all such repairs thereon as to them may seem proper or necessary . . . ; all in terms of 'The Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862,' sec. 30, and 'The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act,' sec. 94.

"NOTE.—Mr Proudfoot, city road surveyor, will give information to any owners who may apply to him at his office, 31 St Andrew Square, as to what repairs are proper and necessary.

"On the carriage-way being put into a complete and efficient state of repair, to the satisfaction of the surveyor, by the owners, or failing them by the Magistrates and Council, and, in the latter case, on the Magistrates and Council being reimbursed in the expense they may incur in and in relation to the carriage-way, they will assume the maintenance of the carriage-way as a public street."

The owners did not proceed in terms of the notice to repair the carriage-way, and the Town-Council thereupon did so at an expense of £272, 15s. 5d., which they assessed upon the owners in the street.

This was an action brought by them for recovery of £104, 8s. 7d., the proportion allocated upon Andrew Paterson, C.A., one of these owners.

The pursuers founded upon secs. 30 and 34 of the Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862,* and alleged that Dove Lane was a private street, which was in need of repair at the date of the proceedings referred to, and that these clauses justified what had been done.

The defender denied that Dove Lane was a private street,† or in need

* The 30th section of the Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862, provided as follows:—"In the event of any private street specified in schedule (C) hereunto annexed appearing to the trustees at any time prior to their assuming the maintenance of the same to require repair, and also in the event of any other private street within the district being at any time, in the opinion of the trustees, in need of repair, it shall be lawful for them, so often as the same may happen, to require the owners of lands and heritages in such street to repair the same, by leaving within the dwelling-houses or other premises of such owners respectively a copy of a notice to that effect, which shall be deemed sufficient intimation to such owners; and if such owners shall fail or neglect, within fourteen days from and after the date of such notice, to put the said street in a complete and efficient state of repair, it shall be lawful for the trustees, and they are hereby required, to execute all such repairs upon the said street as to them may seem proper or necessary, and to levy the expenses of such repairs as the same shall be ascertained by an account under the hand of their surveyor, or other officer for the time being, from such owners failing or neglecting as aforesaid, and to recover the same in like manner as the assessment hereby authorised is appointed to be recovered, or otherwise according to law."

The 34th section provided:—"The expenses which may be incurred by the trustees under the provisions of this Act, in making up, constructing, and causewaying the carriage-way of any private street within the district, or in executing repairs on the same, shall be assessed by the trustees on the owners of lands and heritages according and in proportion to the lineal frontage of the same."

† By the interpretation clause "street" was described as including "any square, court, or alley, highway, lane, thoroughfare, or public passage, or place within the district, defined in this Act open to be used by carts and carriages." Private of repair. He stated further that the notice served upon him was not in terms of the statute, and that any expenditure by the pursuers was not incurred in repairing the lane, but in laying the whole length of it with stone causeway, instead of continuing it in the macadamised state in which it had previously been. He founded upon sec. 33 of the statute, particularly in the Inner-House, as that under which the proceedings ought to have been taken. No. 46.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The defender being owner of lands and heritages having a frontage to the said street, and the private street, Dove Lane, having been repaired by the pursuers, as authorised by the said Acts, and the expense thereof having been duly assessed and allocated upon the defender, he is bound to make payment of the amount as assessed.

The defender pleaded;—1. The defender should be assoltized, with expenses, in respect that Dove Lane is not a private street within the meaning of the statute libelled. 2. Esto that it is a private street, the defender should be assoltized, in respect that it was in good condition and needed no repair at the date of the notice, and separatim, in respect that the proceedings of the pursuers were not in terms of the section founded on.

streets were defined as “streets within the district which are or may be maintained by superiors, proprietors, feuars, tenants, bodies politic or corporate, or other persons, and not by the trustees or the road trustees of the county.”

* The 33d section of the statute provided:—“In the case of such private streets as are or may be within the district, and as are not specified in said schedule C, where the carriage-way shall not have been made up and constructed, nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to confer any right on the trustees to compel the making up, constructing, and causewaying of any such street until they have received intimation in writing from the superior that the said street is an open thoroughfare for public use, or until three-fourths of the intended houses in such street shall either have been erected or are in course of being erected, or the areas for such intended houses shall have been feued under an obligation to erect houses, or until the Sheriff on an application by the trustees or any three or more persons assessed in virtue of this Act, setting forth the circumstances of the case, shall determine that it would be for the public advantage that any such street should be made up, constructed and causewayed; but in any of these cases it shall be lawful for the trustees, and they shall be bound, to require the owners of lands and heritages in any such street to make up, construct, and causeway the same to the satisfaction of the surveyor, or other officer of the trustees for the time being, by leaving within the dwelling-house or other premises of such owners respectively a copy of a notice to that effect, which shall be deemed sufficient intimation to such owners; and if such owners shall fail or neglect, within three months from and after the date of such notice, to make up, construct, and causeway any such street as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the trustees, and they shall be bound, to make up, construct, and causeway such street in such way as to them may seem proper or necessary, and they shall levy the expense, as the same shall be ascertained by an account under the hand of their surveyor or other officer for the time, from such owners failing or neglecting as aforesaid, and shall recover the same in like manner as the assessment hereby authorised is appointed to be recovered, or otherwise according to law.”

† “NOTE.—1. The first question in this case is whether Dove Lane is a private street within the meaning of the Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act.

“It is not disputed that it is a public road which has existed for time immemorial, leading to what was formerly the village of Tipperlin. But it is not said that the road trustees were bound to maintain it, nor does it appear to have ever been maintained by any public body.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—Dove Lane was not maintained by the County Trustees nor by the town. It was a "private street" within the terms of the Act, which contemplated (sec. 30) that a "private street" should be maintained at the expense of "the owners of lands and heritages" until it was taken over.¹ It was an old public thoroughfare, and so did not fall within sec. 33, which applied to streets opened up for the first time. The term "causewaying" included all modes in which carriageways were constructed or repaired.²

The defender argued ;—The repair of an existing road was what was contemplated by sec. 30. The time given to the proprietors to execute the work under that section was fourteen days ; under sec. 33, under which, and not under sec. 30, the proceedings here should have been taken, it was three months. Sec. 33 clearly applied to the circumstances disclosed in this case.³ But even though that were not so, the Lord Ordinary was right in holding that Dove Lane did not fall under the meaning of "private street" within the Act.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The claim made in the present action is for £104, 8s. 7d., being the share said to be due by the defender of the expense of repairing a private street, in which the defender is an owner, under the provisions of the Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862. The proceedings have been taken under the 30th section of that statute, and the notice given to the defender, which was dated the 7th of April 1879, expressly bears to proceed upon that section. The objection to the notice, and to the operations which were made upon the street, is, in the first place, that the pursuers have proceeded upon the wrong section of the statute. If the operations which have been made upon 'streets which are or may be maintained by superiors, proprietors, feuars, tenants, bodies politic or corporate, or other persons, and not by the trustees of the Edinburgh district, or the road trustees of the county.'

"It appears, however, to the Lord Ordinary that, according to the true construction of the Act, the definition implies an obligation to maintain the street. The Act seems to be intended to regulate the enforcement of an existing obligation, and not to create an obligation to maintain a public road.

"If this be so, the pursuers' case fails ; for they have not proved that the defender, or indeed any other persons, were under an obligation to maintain Dove Lane.

"But even if, as the pursuers contended, it was sufficient to satisfy the definition by the Act that Dove Lane was de facto maintained by the conterminous proprietors, they would not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, be entitled to prevail. For in his judgment they have not proved the allegation on which their case in this aspect of it is based.

"2. The pursuers contended that by paying no attention to the notice which was served on him, and in which Dove Lane was described as a private street, the defender is barred from maintaining that it is not a private street. The Lord Ordinary cannot assent to that view. The pursuers proceeded at their own peril, and if they are not within the Act the mere silence of the defender will not bring them within it.

"3. The defender maintained other pleas in defence. But in the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of the case it is not necessary to consider them."

the street are of the nature of repairs, then confessedly the notice is given under the right section of the statute, section 30. But if the operation was not the repair of the street, but the making or construction of a street for the first time, then the proceedings ought to have been taken under the 33d section of the statute. The construction of a street is called in the statute "the making up, constructing, and causewaying" of the street; the operation under the 30th section is simply repairing; and the points of distinction between the two sections are very important. The trustees under section 30 are entitled to proceed upon their own opinion entirely as to whether a street wants repair; but in the case of "the making up, constructing, and causewaying," under section 33, they cannot so proceed. They are prohibited from proceeding except upon certain conditions, and the condition applicable to the case before us is that the Sheriff on an application by the trustees shall determine that it is "for the public benefit" that this shall be done; and when that deliverance has been obtained from the Sheriff, then they are to give notice, and to allow three months, instead of fourteen days as in the other section, to the owners and occupiers to make up, construct, and causeway the street themselves. The two operations are undoubtedly of a very different character in other respects. The repair of a street may be a very slight affair, and generally is a very much less important affair than the "making up, constructing, and causewaying" of a street for the first time, and accordingly the trustees have much more unlimited power in the one case than they have in the other.

If, then, what the trustees have done is not to repair the street, but to make up, construct, and causeway it,—that is to say, to make it for the first time,—it is quite plain that they have proceeded under the wrong section of the statute. That, of course, is a matter of fact, and to be determined upon the evidence. David Crawford Proudfoot, surveyor to the Edinburgh Road Trust, said,—“Dove Lane, which I know quite well, is rather a long, narrow place. (Q.) What was its character as regards being a public or private street? (A.) It was a private street until recently, when it came to be constructed. I say that because it was not maintained by the public authorities. With the exception of putting down a little material now and again to prevent danger or accident, they did nothing to it at all. Extending from Morningside Road on the east to Tipperlin Road on the west, it is within the city of Edinburgh district. Tipperlin Road extends from Colinton Road southwards to Morningside Road and the Asylum. . . . The total length of it is 928 feet, and the average breadth of the whole twenty feet, and of the section last done eighteen feet nine inches. Some years ago a row of semi-detached villas was built at the south end of Dove Lane. In 1872 the Edinburgh City Trust paved the carriageway opposite these houses and to the east of the houses with blocks, and grouted the joints with Portland cement. They gave notices to the proprietors similar to those given last year to the defender, under the 30th section of the Roads Act. The notices were similar to No. 7 of process. I was a servant of the trust at the time those repairs were done in 1872, and since that time the Road Trust, and afterwards the Town-Council, have taken charge of that part which was repaired. (Q.) What has been the condition of the western section, which was not repaired from that time until now? (A.) I have seen it often. It was an open piece of roadway, without any proper metal or channels, or anything to give it the character of an average made road. The Road Trust never took it over at that time, or undertook the maintenance of it. I never saw anything put upon it, with the exception of some stones and rubbish, which I thought came principally from the gardens adjoining on the north side of the lane. Once or twice I observed barrowfuls of the cleanings of the walks. In consequence of a letter from the town-clerk, dated 20th December 1878, enclosing one from Macrae, Flett, & Rennie, I examined Dove Lane, and reported to Mr Skinner in a letter dated 25th December 1878. The statements in that letter are correct. In consequence of a remit from the Streets and Buildings Committee I again examined Dove Lane, and reported to the committee in a letter addressed to Mr Skinner on 19th March 1879. The statements in that report are correct." [That letter was,—". . . This road extends from the east entrance of Abbotsford Park, Morningside Road, to Tipperlin Road, adjoining the entrance to Viewfield House. The east portion of the road in front of Albert Terrace is maintained by the town. The west portion, extending from the west end of Albert Terrace to Tipperlin Road, is still unmade, and is not maintained by the town. This road is in bad order, and is in much the same condition as the Tipperlin Road adjoining, neither of these roads having yet been properly constructed, and they have not been taken over as public roads . . ."] "Cross.—I first knew Dove Lane ten or eleven years ago. It was not then, and never was, a macadamised road; nor was it ever a made up or constructed road. The magistrates have seldom done anything to it within the past ten years, I think only three or four times altogether; and all that was done was to take a barrowful of stones from some of the other roads and fill up the holes. Except what I have mentioned in regard to depositing garden rubbish, I have not known anybody else mend the road saving the Magistrates. The idea of the parties who laid down the rubbish seemed to be to repair the road. Whatever its necessities, no one seemed to attend to it. I think it was the only direct road between the Morningside Road on the east and the old Colinton Road until the Morningside Road was laid out. I think Dove Lane is a very old road . . . (Q.) Is it correct to describe this road from end to end as simply a beaten track, and brown earth with grass growing over it? (A.) That would be about the character of it from the time I knew it until the Magistrates paved it." The result of Mr Proudfoot's statement is this, that the west portion of Dove Lane, with which we are dealing, was never a made or constructed road or street at all; it was just a public right of way over the surface of the ground, to which nothing had ever been done that could be called construction or making up. And what is it that was done by the Magistrates when they came, in their notice under the 30th section, to deal with this lane? They causewayed it from end to end, and at a very considerable expense, as may be gathered from the amount sued for in this action. The amount expended upon this lane is £272, 15s. 5d. Plainly, that is not the expense of a mere repair of a road of this kind, but the expense of making it; and accordingly the account of the contractor shews very clearly that the operation which he performed under the employment of the pursuers was the laying down and making of a street, with side channels, and all the usual accompaniments of a causewayed street. The kind of causeway is described as ordinary mashed rubble stones, which is not so expensive or so valuable as causeway of a different description; still it is a distinct causewaying of the street.

I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the pursuers here have proceeded under the wrong section of the statute, and the consequence is that their whole proceedings are invalid, and that they cannot be allowed to recover this money.

But this ground of objection to the assessment is not that upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded, and it would be quite wrong not to notice his Lordship's grounds of judgment also. I have no hesitation in agreeing with them, and think that they are sufficient also for the determination of this case against the pursuers. I am quite satisfied that this was not a private street within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. A private street is defined in the interpretation clause of the statute to mean "streets within the district which are or may be maintained by superiors, proprietors, feuars, tenants, bodies politic or corporate, or other persons, and not by the trustees or the road trustees of the county." Now, there are two requisites here to distinguish private streets from other streets. The one is, that they are or may be maintained by private persons, being either superiors, proprietors, or something of that kind; and secondly, that they are not maintained by the trustees under this statute, or by the road trustees of the county. If these conditions are fulfilled, then the street becomes a private street, as distinguished from other streets, not as distinguished from public streets, for that is not one of the terms of this statute, but from streets generally, and the word "street" is described as including "any square, court, or alley, highway, lane, thoroughfare, or public passage, or place within the district, defined in this Act, open to be used by carts and carriages." And therefore if there is an open space—no matter whether it be a lane or a court or anything else—or a passage used by carts and carriages which does not answer the conditions of the definition of private streets, then that is a street generally under this statute. In the present case the pursuer's contention is that this is a street which is maintained by the proprietors alongside, and therefore is a private street. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that unless the proprietors or superiors, or somebody in that position, maintain the street in virtue of an obligation upon them to that effect, the words of the definition will not cover the street. I think it is not necessary to determine that absolutely, but I should rather be inclined to question, is this street, in point of fact, or has it been maintained by the proprietors alongside of it in virtue of any obligation imposed upon them, or is it maintained in any way at all answering to the sort of description of maintenance which would be expected of persons who were under an obligation to maintain it? In short, I do not think it is necessary in this case to prove the obligation independently of the maintenance. If a street is maintained by private proprietors, indicating an obligation upon their part so to maintain it, that, I think, might sufficiently answer the description in this interpretation clause. But here there is not only no appearance of any obligation upon the part of the defender and the other proprietors in the street to maintain this lane, but, in point of fact, as I think the Lord Ordinary holds upon the evidence, it never has been so maintained. I quite agree with him in that view. I think the passage which I have already read from the road surveyor's evidence clearly points in that direction; but there is more evidence to the same purpose, the general result of which is that nobody ever repaired or maintained this lane. It was left entirely to itself. Somebody might lay down a barrowful of stones to fill up a hole, or something of that kind, but beyond that temporary repair, which indicates nothing like a general obligation, nothing has ever been done; and therefore upon both grounds I am clearly of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to prevail.

LORD DEAS.—It is very plain that this is a notice to repair given under the

and Town-

30th section of the Act, and that it ought to have been a notice to make up and construct the street under the 33d section. I think that objection is quite conclusive, and I do not go any further, because I do not consider it necessary to do so.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordships that this proceeding has been taken under a wrong section of the statute. I think it is plain, from the reading of the 30th and 33d sections, that they relate to totally distinct matters. The 30th section puts it in the power of the authorities to repair the streets that have been made, and are streets under the statute, and recognised as such. The 33d section, on the other hand, is the section which applies to a lane such as this, which had never been before regularly made up into a street. The distinction is palpable on the face of the statute, and the whole question comes to be, whether, as matter of fact, this lane ever was made into a street so as to bring it into the position of what the 33d section contemplates as a made-up street, and so to put it into the power of the Magistrates to enforce the provisions of the 30th section. Now, upon the evidence which your Lordship has referred to—that of the surveyor—and I think there are other witnesses who speak to the same matter, viz., the witness Melville and Mr Niven—it is clear that this lane never was a made-up street in the sense in which that word is used in the statute. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a right result in assolzieing the defender. With regard to the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has gone, I am also disposed to agree with your Lordship that he has taken a substantially correct view of the statute, but I go principally upon the objection raised as to the application of the 30th section of the Act.

LORD SHAND.—I think the evidence in this case, particularly that of the contractor, and the account of expense incurred with reference to the work done, clearly shew that the operation itself was not a repair, but was the “making up, constructing, and causewaying” of the road for the first time. That being so, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the proceedings should have been taken under section 33 of the statute. And this is no mere technical point. It is a matter of substance, of very considerable importance to the persons affected; for if what is proposed is for the first time to make up and construct a new road, then the feuars and persons who are to be at the expense of it are entitled to be heard on the question whether the time has arrived for constructing the road.

And, accordingly, I agree with your Lordships in holding that proceedings which really are such as should be taken under section 33 cannot be taken under section 30 under the cover of a mere repair, for if that were allowed it would deprive the feuars of the opportunity of being heard before the Sheriff on the question whether the road ought to be made up at all, or at all events at the time when it was proposed. I may further say that I am not surprised at the course taken by the feuars in this case—the persons whose properties abut on the roadside. They seem to have taken no notice of the notices that were served on them. But these notices merely informed them that what was about to be done was a repair of the road, and that they should ultimately have to pay for the repair. I confess if I had been placed in the position of one of those gentlemen I should have expected that something a great deal less than the making up and constructing of the road was to take place. But while quite willing to allow the Magistrates to go on and repair the road and levy a share of the expense, I can quite understand that when they found the thing actually done was not a repair, but the construction of a road by causewaying it for the first time at considerable expense, they should take the steps which they have done in resisting payment of the amount. It appears to me that having resisted their defence is well-founded.

Upon the other point of whether this is or is not a private street, I confess I have not the same clear opinion as your Lordship has expressed. I think that is a question attended with considerable delicacy. The statute is very broad in its provision, that where streets are maintained by persons whose properties adjoin and not by the trustees, these must be regarded as private streets, and a certain amount of maintenance, short of complete maintenance in good order, may be sufficient to bring a street within that character. I prefer in this case to say that I rest my judgment entirely on the first point with which your Lordships have dealt, and that I am not prepared to concur in the opinion that this is not a private street within the meaning of the Act.

Election—Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis to Lunatic—Power of election between legal and testamentary provisions.—Where a person is legally incapacitated from availing himself of a right of election between testamentary and legal provisions, he does not lose the right, even though he receive temporary benefit for his maintenance and support out of the estate, and he may exercise it if the incapacity be removed, or, if it be not removed, the right may be exercised by his representatives after his death.

Circumstances which were held insufficient to justify a curator bonis for a lunatic in making such an election.

ALEXANDER MORISON of Bognie died, without leaving issue, upon 30th December 1879. He was survived by his wife, to whom, as she was in a state of mental incapacity, William Baird Young, her brother, and one of her next of kin, was appointed curator bonis by the Court of Session upon 17th March 1880. At his death Mr Morison possessed moveable property to the extent of £85,000, he owned the estate of Larghan with a rental of £185, and he was heir of entail in possession of the estates of Bognie and Frendraught.

Mr Morison's trustees, under a general settlement dated 5th April 1876, thereafter proceeded to realise his means and estate, and to intromit with it. After providing for payment of debts, &c., the deed directed that the residue of the testator's estate should be invested, and the whole income expended for the comfortable maintenance and support of his spouse, over and above her marriage-contract and other rights previously conferred upon her. The payment of legacies was to be postponed till after Mrs Morison's death. Upon her death the residue of the estate was to be paid over for the benefit of Dr Scott's Hospital for Decayed Business Men and Women in Huntly.

Morison's
Curator Bonis
v. Morison's
Trustees.

Mrs Morison's curator bonis having elected to take her legal provisions instead of those conferred upon her by the trust-deed, brought this action against Mr Morison's trustees in order to fix the sums due upon that footing. The summons concluded for declarator that "the said Mrs Catherine Young or Morison is entitled to one half of the moveable estate left by the said deceased Alexander Morison, her husband, in name of jus relictæ, and to one third of the free rents of the fee-simple lands in which he was infeft at the date of his death on 30th December 1879, from said date, in name of terce;" and further asked for an account of intromissions, &c.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer, as curator bonis, was not entitled on behalf of the truster to claim her legal rights.

A further question was raised upon record, whether the terms of Mr and Mrs Morison's antenuptial marriage-contract did not bar the claim now made, but it will be seen that the Court declined to deal with it at this stage.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th June 1880, dismissed the action, on the ground that it was prematurely brought.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

It was stated by counsel for the curator bonis that his case was to be taken upon the footing that the whole income could not be judiciously spent upon his ward, and that she would not recover.

Argued for pursuer;—As curator bonis he was bound to elect whenever the claim for jus relictæ opened. It was his duty to do so, as it was beneficial to the estate.¹ It was material to notice the distinction between this case and that of Cowan v. Turnbull.² There the whole income belonged to the lunatic ward as undisposed of revenue of the estate. Here the ultimate purpose of the trust was postponed for the wife's benefit. If she were sui juris she would be bound to elect, and she was not privileged because she was non compos mentis. There were other interests to be protected by the trustees. She was merely a creditor of her husband's executry,

* "NOTE.— . . . Now, prima facie, it is not very easy to see what benefit this lady could derive from the present claim of her curator being sustained, and the question is therefore forced upon the Court, whether there are any circumstances disclosed on the face of this record sufficient to justify the present action.

"It is not said, and there is no reason to suppose, that the trustees are mismanaging the trust-estate of the lady's husband, or are misapplying the income; and as they are directed to retain the whole estate during Mrs Morison's lifetime, it is quite clear that if she should ever be restored to health she will then be entitled to raise the whole question of election, which cannot be decided without discussing some difficult matters of domicile and the construction of the English antenuptial contract. My opinion is that the curator bonis has failed to present any case warranting the interference of the Court in hoc statu.

"Were he to succeed in this action, his ward would not, in my judgment, be in any way benefited, however much her next of kin might be benefited were she to die in her present state of mental alienation. And it is not unimportant to observe that the pursuer, who is brother of Mrs Morison, and consequently one of her next of kin, was appointed one of her husband's trustees, but declined to accept that office, and after having been appointed her curator bonis, has in that character raised the present action. On the whole, I am of opinion that the action is, to say the least, premature and uncalled for, and ought to be dismissed; but, of course, it will be in the power of the curator to renew his claim in the event of any material change of circumstances."

and took in satisfaction of a debt.¹ The trustees wished the ward to be maintained at a greater expense than could be judiciously spent upon her. By taking benefit from these provisions she would be barred from making an election later.

Argued for the defenders;—Election was a matter for the Court. If there was a manifest inequality between the legal and the testamentary provisions, then it was the duty of the curator to elect, but that was not the case here.² The only other interest here was that of the ward's next of kin, and it would be their privilege to elect if she did not recover. These were the terms of the decree of the Court in Cowan v. Turnbull. The rule of law was the same in the Court of Chancery.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action is the curator bonis and also the brother of a lady who is a lunatic, and who is the widow of the deceased Alexander Morison of Bognie. By his general settlement Mr Morison made a provision in favour of his widow, who, at the time of its execution, was a lunatic. He directed his trustees to invest the residue of his estate in a certain way, and to expend the whole income of the said estate “for the comfortable maintenance and support of my spouse, Mary Catherine Young or Morison, and this over and above her legal rights under the marriage-contract between us, dated 19th April 1837, and also under a bond of annuity by me in her favour, dated 18th April 1874, declaring that it shall be imperative on my said trustees to spend the whole of said income for the support and maintenance of my said wife; declaring that if she shall recover her health sufficiently to manage her affairs, my said trustees shall pay her the whole annual revenue of my said estate, and that her receipt therefor shall be a sufficient discharge to them; but if she shall so recover and again become incapable of managing her own affairs, my said trustees shall expend the whole income on her maintenance as before provided; and during the whole time she shall not be capable of managing her affairs, my trustees shall have full power of nominating for her her place of residence.” He postpones the payment of all legacies till after the death of his spouse, and then the residue of his estate is to go to certain charitable purposes. Now, Mrs Morison is stated not to have renounced or discharged in any way her legal rights as wife of Mr Morison, and the summons in this case concludes for declarator that she, the lunatic, is “entitled to one-half of the moveable estate left by the said deceased Alexander Morison, her husband, in name of jus relictæ, and to one-third of the free rents of the fee-simple lands in which he was infeft at the date of his death on 30th December 1879 from said date in name of terce.” The defenders are called on to count and reckon with the pursuers for the moveable estate, and also for the amount of the rents of the fee-simple lands. The meaning of this summons, of course, is that the curator bonis intends thereby to elect for his lunatic ward to take her legal provisions in place of the provisions made for her in her husband's settlement. The trustees object to this, and say that the curator bonis has no right to make such an election, and the Lord Ordinary has sustained this defence generally.

The curator maintains that it is for the benefit of the ward, or at least of the ward's estate, that this election should be made, and the chief ground on which he places this contention is, that if he does not now elect to take the legal provisions it will be necessary for him and his ward to accept payment under the settlement of the provisions thereby made by the testator, her deceased husband, and that will operate as an election of the testamentary provisions, and so bar the right of election of the legal provisions in all time coming. If I were satisfied that this would be the effect of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, I should think the questions raised of great importance, and perhaps of difficulty. But I am not at all satisfied that the right of election would be barred by this lady being maintained by the trustees under her late husband's settlement. On the contrary, I think there is authority, and very clear authority, for holding the opposite, and that although no election should be made at present the right of election could be made, and will be available to this lady if she becomes sane at any time, and if she does not become sane, and dies a lunatic, the right of election will be still available to her representatives after her death. Now, if that be so, it is very plain that the curator has no legitimate interest or right to make this election at present.

One of the difficulties suggested by the pursuer is that in other cases where the right of election has been held to be reserved and not affected by taking maintenance from the deceased's estate, the maintenance taken by the curator on behalf of his ward was not a testamentary provision, but a portion of the estate to which the lunatic had right apart from the provisions of the testator's settlement. That was undoubtedly the case in Cowan v. Turnbull. But Cowan v. Turnbull is not the only case of the kind that has occurred in our law. There are various cases of that description, and I think it is necessary to call attention to one or two of them which were not referred to in the argument. The first of these to which I shall refer,—which, though not earliest in date, is, I think, of the most importance,—is the case of Morton v. Young, 11th February 1813, F. C. This was a case of legitim, but it does not appear to me that that makes any difference in the authority of the case, for the principle involved in the right to take legitim is the same as that in the right to take jus relictæ. The testator in that case was Robert Anderson, who made a will in which he gave a large provision to his only son, but with a substitution in favour of other parties. The son was a lunatic, and if the substitution was to take effect, that of course would defeat the right of legitim so far that in the event of the son dying a lunatic, and not being able to make an election, his representatives would take nothing, the substitution being operative. But if the right of election belonged to his representatives in consequence of his continuing lunatic till his death, then the substitution could receive no effect as against their claims. Accordingly this was held, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in the case (Lord Polkemet), brings out the principle of the judgment very clearly indeed. He “finds that from the acknowledged imbecility or idiocy of James Arnot Anderson he cannot be held to have accepted the settlement executed by his father in his favour, with the substitution to the persons therein mentioned, so as to bar his representatives from repudiating said settlement, and from claiming in lieu thereof, first, his legitim, which, on his father's death, fell to him in his own right; and second, his succession to his mother's third of moveables, which had been vested in his person by his father having got him confirmed as executor to his mother: Finds that in consequence of this repudiation only one-third of the funds which belonged to Robert Anderson was carried by his settlement to the substitutes therein mentioned, while the other two-thirds fell to the nearest in kin of the said James Arnot Anderson ; and appoints Morton and others, the pursuers in this branch of the cause, to give in a state," &c. It was thus held that so long as the party with the right of election is a lunatic, and so incapable of making an election, the failure to make an election cannot tell against either him or his representatives. His representatives upon his death are entitled to make the election, and to repudiate the testamentary provisions, notwithstanding that the lunatic during his lifetime was maintained out of the father's estate. There was a good deal of discussion in that case, and there was some difference of opinion, although very slight, upon the bench, Lord Meadowbank having some peculiar views upon the subject which it is needless particularly to mention. But the opinions of the other Judges are clear. Lord Glenlee said,—“ I would concur entirely in what has been stated by my Lord Meadowbank, if it were not for the circumstance that the idiocy of James Arnot Anderson prevented him from making any choice. Till the child had by some act or other precluded himself from making the choice, I think there was nothing to tie him up, and it is the very ground of the interlocutor that no account is to be taken of the will.” Lord Robertson gives a longer opinion, in the course of which he says,—“ It is said that the young man accepted of the father's settlement, and that his heirs are bound by the acceptance. But when it was attended to that he was an idiot from his birth, I do not see how he could accept ; acceptance is an act of the mind ; and he was incapable of doing anything that required an act of the mind.” And Lord Craigie said,—“ I think it was rightly decided in the case of Annandale that no acts of a man in a state of idiocy could have the smallest influence on the succession to his estate, and that it was not in the power of his tutors to do any act by which the nature of it could be changed. And I think the question is just the same as if his tutors had done no act whatever”—that is to say, had not accepted of any maintenance out of the father's estate.

The earlier case of Robertson v. Ker, which is reported by Kilkerran, by Elchies, and by Clerk Home, and is to be found in the Dictionary at page 8202, is to the same effect, but its circumstances are so complicated, and the opinions of the Judges differed so much upon points not referring to what we are now considering, that I do not trouble your Lordships with any particular examination of it.

Then we come to the case of Cowan v. Turnbull, 7 D. 872, H. of L., 6 Bell's Appa. 222, which is a most important authority on this branch of the law, and agrees with those earlier cases, that where a party who has to make an election is a lunatic he cannot make any choice, and nobody is entitled to bind him by making it for him ; but that he may make his choice in the event of his recovering from his insanity, and without prejudice also to his representatives making that choice if he never recovers his sanity, notwithstanding that he is maintained out of the estate of the testator, on which the election is to be made. Now, in Cowan v. Turnbull, as your Lordships recollect very well, there was a direction to make an entail of lands belonging to the testator and to pay the rents thereof to his son. But the entail could not be made, from the insanity of the heir. The rents of the estate therefore belonged to the heir, not under the authority of the father's settlement, but in his own right as heir, and therefore it was not necessary to take any maintenance out of the testator's estate—that is to say, out of the estate disposed of by the settlement. That was a peculiarity of the case, but the general principle which I have stated was affirmed in the strongest manner by the judgment of the Court. The first conclusion of the summons there must be attended to. It is for declarator that "hoc statu it is not incumbent upon the pursuer, in the exercise of the powers, or in the discharge of the duties of his office of curator bonis for the said Thomas Turnbull to elect on his behalf between his right of legitim attaching to the moveable estate and effects of the said deceased William Turnbull, his father, and the rights provided in his favour by the said William Turnbull's deed of settlement, and that notwithstanding such election shall not be made by the pursuer on behalf of the said Thomas Turnbull, and notwithstanding of the sums necessary for his support and maintenance being supplied from the estate under the charge of the trustees of his father, in terms of the requisition made on them by the pursuer as before mentioned, the right of the said Thomas Turnbull to make such election in the event of his recovery, or, in the event of his dying without having recovered, or without having elected, the right of his legal representatives to claim his legitim, shall remain entire and unimpaired." Now, it must be observed that that conclusion assumes that the curator will not succeed in vindicating a claim to the undisposed of rents of the heritable estate, which form the subject of the second conclusion. In that event he seeks for declarator that even if he should be bound to take money for the maintenance of his ward out of the father's estate, as disposed of by the settlement, that shall not prevent either the lunatic, if he recovered, or his representatives, if he did not recover, from electing to take legitim, and the decree of the Court is in terms of that first conclusion. It is not given in the Court of Session report, but it is given at length in the report of the case in the House of Lords in Bell's Appeals. The Court pronounced the following interlocutor, upon 17th June 1845:—"Find, decern, and declare in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons; and farther, find and declare that the defenders, the trustees of the late William Turnbull, are not directed, or entitled, under the terms of his trust-settlement, to execute an entail of the lands conveyed to them by that deed, or of the lands to be purchased by them under the directions thereof, until the period of the recovery or death of Thomas Turnbull, his son, and that the free income and annual produce drawn and to be drawn from the estate, heritable and moveable, of the said William Turnbull by the said defenders, his trustees, between the period of his death and the execution of said entail, whether the same was acquired by him in his lifetime, or has been or shall be acquired by the said trustees under the direction of the said trust-deed, after deduction of all payments which the trustees shall in conformity with the direction and authority in the said trust-deed make out of the said income and annual produce, including such allowance as they shall make for the support and comfort of the said Thomas Turnbull during all the days of his lifetime, or until his recovery, is undisposed of by the said deed, and now belongs, or as the same shall from time to time exist and become due, will belong to the said Thomas Turnbull absolutely and unconditionally as his own funds, and that the pursuer as his curator bonis is entitled to demand and recover the same, without prejudice to the right of the said Thomas Turnbull, or of his legal representatives afterwards, to exercise his right of election, or to claim legitim, as concluded for in the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, and that the same shall belong to the said Thomas Turnbull, and form part of his funds, whether effect shall ultimately be given either to the said legal right of legitim, or to the testamentary provision in his favour in his father's deed of settlement." No. 47.

Now that, I think, is a decision in express terms to the effect that I have already mentioned. I may refer in illustration of this to a portion of Lord Campbell's opinion, which I think is very instructive, and in which, dealing with an objection to the form of the decree, he states (6 Bell's App., p. 243)—
 "A strong objection was made to the form of the decree, that it would allow the representatives of the son upon his death to claim the legitim without accounting for the benefit which he has received under the will. But, my Lords, I think it was quite unnecessary for the decree to make any express provision upon that subject." Then he quotes a portion of the decree, and proceeds,—"Well, then, what is the point which is finally decided, and the only point which is finally decided? Why, it is that the surplus of the intermediate rents and profits shall in all events belong to the son. Upon his death the election may then be exercised, and if the legitim is preferred, that can only be done by giving credit, or accounting accordingly."

 Morison's
Curator Bonis
 v. Morison's

Now, I think, upon these authorities we are well entitled to say, that it is a matter of settled law in this country that where a party who has a right of election like the lunatic here is in such a state of mental incapacity that he cannot effectually make his election, the right of election is not lost, either by his failing to make it, or by his taking benefit under the testamentary provisions, so long as he continues in a state of lunacy, and that the right will nevertheless subsist and be effectual either to him, if he recovers his sanity, or to his representatives in the event of his dying without recovering. Now, that being so, it seems to me that there is no legitimate interest in the pursuer of this action to insist upon making the election now. We see well enough that this pursuer has a personal interest in the succession of the lunatic, because he is apparently her sole next of kin, or, at least, he is one of the next of kin, and, therefore, in the event of her death, he would be entitled to succeed to her personal estate in whole or in part. But the interest of all concerned is perfectly protected by the rule of law to which I have just referred, and, therefore, I see no reason for making the election now, or until some change of circumstances such as the Lord Ordinary points at. I think this action was premature, and I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor dismissing it.

I do not think it necessary to deal with the question arising under the marriage-contract, or to consider whether this lady's legal right, or any portion of it, is barred by the provisions of the marriage-contract. That is a question that will come up for decision when the election is made, if it be made hereafter, but at present it would be quite out of place to decide any question of the kind.

LORD DEAS.—This action is brought at the instance of Major Baird Young as curator bonis of his sister, Mrs Morison, who is a lunatic, against the mortis causa trustees of her late husband, to have it found and declared that in lieu of the provisions settled upon her by the trust-deed and settlement and otherwise, the pursuer, as her curator bonis, is entitled to exercise the option which she might have exercised had she been sane, and to claim one-half of her husband's personal estate as jus relictae.

On this footing the pursuer concludes against the trustees for payment to

No. 47. him of a capital sum of £60,000, with interest from the date of the truster's death.

Dec. 3, 1880.
Morison's
Curator Bonis
v. Morison's
Trustees.

There is no material difference between the parties either as to facts or figures.

The truster died without issue at Edinburgh on 30th December 1879. Both parties admit that at the date of his death he was a domiciled Scotsman, and that his widow would have been entitled, if sane, to have claimed her jus relictæ in place of her conventional and testamentary provisions.

The truster, besides being in possession at his death as heir of entail of the valuable estate of Bognie, was infeft and in possession of the small fee-simple estate of Larghan, also in Scotland, the rental of which was about £185 per annum, and besides the conclusion for jus relictæ, the summons contained a conclusion for terce out of this estate, but this conclusion was withdrawn while the case depended before the Lord Ordinary, the pursuer, I infer, being satisfied that it was sufficiently barred by the words of the English marriage settlement, which I shall immediately notice.

By this antenuptial marriage settlement in the English form, entered into in England at a time when the parties happened to be living there, a sum of £2500 and some other provisions of very moderate amount were vested in trustees for behoof of the wife if she should survive her husband.

This settlement or contract contained the following clause:—"Provided always that the provision hereinbefore made for the said Mary Catherine Young shall be, and the said Mary Catherine Young doth hereby accept the same, in satisfaction and bar of the dower or thirds and freebench to which by the common law, or by custom or otherwise, she would otherwise be entitled from, or out of all or any hereditaments in Great Britain or elsewhere, of which the said Alexander Morison now is or shall during the said intended coverture be seized for any estate to which dower or freebench is incident."

By her husband's trust-deed and settlement, however, in the Scotch form, executed at Edinburgh on 5th April 1876, his lunatic wife (for she had by this time become lunatic) was very differently and amply provided for. By this deed the truster directed his trustees within two years after his death to realise his whole moveable means and estate, and also to realise his heritable estate at such time as might be deemed expedient, and after paying debts and expenses, to invest the residue on heritable securities or others as therein mentioned, "and to expend the whole income of said means and estate for the comfortable maintenance and support of my said spouse, Mary Catherine Young or Morison, and this over and above her legal rights, under the marriage-contract between us," "and also over and above a bond of annuity by him in her favour, dated 18th April 1874, declaring that it shall be imperative on my said trustees to spend the whole of the said income for the support and maintenance of my said wife: Declaring if she shall recover her health sufficiently to manage her affairs, my said trustees shall pay her the whole annual revenue of my said estate, and that her receipts therefor shall be a sufficient discharge to them; but if she shall so recover and again become incapable of managing her own affairs my said trustees shall expend the whole income on her maintenance as before provided; and during the whole time she shall not be capable of managing her affairs my trustees shall have full power of nominating for her her place of residence."

The parties are agreed that Mr Morison's personal estate, to the liferent of which his widow is thus entitled under his trust-settlement, is of the value of £85,000, besides the £185 of income from his fee-simple estate of Larghan, and the benefit of the bond of annuity mentioned in the trust-settlement secured over the truster's entailed estate, the amount of which at present is £900, to increase to £1800 upon the death of the widow of the previous heir of entail.

Now, if this had been a case in which the means of maintenance for the lunatic could not be obtained except by claiming her legal rights, or even if by asserting those rights she were to be accommodated and maintained in a style and manner superior to what she could otherwise have been, I should not have doubted that it was competent for the curator to exercise the option in the way it was reasonable to suppose the lady herself would have exercised it had she been sane. The option in that case would have been exercised for the benefit of the lady herself, and not for the mere enlargement of her estate, which is not necessarily the same thing at all. The trustees find it impracticable to obey the direction, which the truster declares to be imperative upon them, to spend the whole trust-income in the support and maintenance of his lunatic wife, and I agree with the observation of the Lord Ordinary in his note that were the curator to succeed in his action "his ward would not be in any way benefited, however much her next of kin might be benefited were she to die in her present state of mental alienation."

Another important consideration unfavourable to allowing the exercise of the option by the curator is that if the lady were to recover her sanity (which, however unlikely, we cannot assume to be impossible), we have no means of knowing that she would approve of her husband's most liberal settlements in her favour being repudiated while she had been unable to judge for herself. Generally speaking, widows of well constituted minds whose husbands have left them liberally provided for are most anxious to do with the means so provided for them whatever they think the husband, if alive, would have approved of, and would shrink from the apparent ingratitude implied in a repudiation of his settlement. On these grounds, I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MURE.—If it were necessary now to decide the question, whether the curator should be allowed to elect on behalf of the ward, I should have had considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to my own mind. If the interests of third parties, or in other words, if the interest of the estate, were alone to be considered, there might be strong grounds for saying that it was desirable, so far as regarded the relatives of this lunatic, that the election should now be made, and this was strongly pressed upon us. But these are not the only interests which we require to consider. For on this question I am disposed to agree with Lord Deas that the interests of the lunatic herself must also enter very materially into our consideration, and I think that these interests might not be properly secured if the election were now to be made. I have always understood it to be a general rule, in regard to the management of a lunatic's estate, that when a curator was appointed it was his duty to preserve the estate in substantially the same condition in which it was at the time of the appointment, so that if the party should recover the estate should be handed over in as nearly the same condition as it was when the curator was appointed to manage it. Now, this lady may recover, and, as Lord Deas has remarked, it is not at all improbable that she might, in the circumstances, prefer to have the very large annuity her husband has settled upon her, to the half of the moveable estate. It is by no means impossible that she might come to that conclusion, so that if the curator were to be allowed to elect for her now the important question would at once arise,—Could she, if she became sane, repudiate that election, and insist upon returning to the provisions made for her by her husband in his settlement? If she were to do so, grave questions and complications might arise, as to which I offer no opinion. But keeping that possibility in view, I think the reasons why the election should not now be made are so strong that I am not prepared to sanction it.

With regard to the cases referred to by your Lordship, I have only to add that a perusal of them has led me to the same opinion as that expressed by your Lordship, and, on the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordships in holding that the curator is not entitled, in present circumstances, to exercise the right of election claimed, and that the action should be dismissed; and, in doing so, I adopt entirely the grounds of opinion which have been so well stated by your Lordship in the chair. If I were of opinion that the representatives of Mrs Morison at her death would be precluded from the right of election which the curator now desires to exercise, I could not have agreed in the judgment, for in that case I think it would only be reasonable and proper that the curator should make the election now, and that it would be his right and duty to do so in order to prevent loss to the estate under his care. I agree with Lord Deas and Lord Mure in thinking that, if an election were now to be made, the question for the curator is, what is for the benefit of the lunatic? It appears to me, however, to be clear that the curator, in judging for another in such circumstances, is bound to make that election which would tend to enlarge his ward's estate, unless there be some personal or other benefit or advantage to the ward which it is important to retain, and for which a sacrifice of estate should be made. In the present case, if this right of election were now exercised as the curator desires, the lady would at once be put in possession of a large estate, which would not only be amply sufficient for all her requirements, but would provide a large fund which she could dispose of if she recovered, or which would go to her representatives in the event of her not recovering. If it be assumed that the right to jus relicte has not been renounced by the marriage-contract the state of the facts is simply this, that this lady has a legal right to £40,000, while her husband by his settlement has left her a provision of very much smaller value. She might, no doubt, if of sound mind, adopt the settlement, and renounce her legal rights. Her curator could not, however, in my opinion, take this course, and so practically give up a valuable legal right belonging to his ward, and if the circumstance of his drawing the annuity, or of the trustee's spending the income of the estate on his ward were to exclude the right to elect the legal provisions hereafter I should hold that the curator must have and exercise the right now. It is quite true, as has been observed, that if Mrs Morison should recover she may possibly desire to adopt her husband's will, and to renounce her legal rights to this large estate; and it is right that an opportunity for that should be left open. This, I think, may be safely done without prejudice to the ward's estate. Failing her recovery, the right of election will belong to her representatives, for I think the authorities are clear that the lunatic's representatives have the right after her death to make an election. No. 47.

This case does not present a feature which sometimes occurs where, owing to the pressing interests of other parties in the division of a general trust-estate, there may be a necessity for an election being made. In such cases I should have no difficulty in holding that the Court should authorise an election to be made, and if the present had been a case of that kind I cannot doubt that the election must be to take the legal provisions.

No such necessity here exists, and on the grounds I have stated I am of opinion that this action should be dismissed.

THE COURT adhered.

Bank—Cheque—Refusal to cash cheque on ground of depositor's insolvency.
—A bank which held on account current £413 belonging to an executry estate refused to cash a cheque for £100 drawn on the account, on the ground that the estate was insolvent, and that the bank, which had a claim for £130, intended to apply for sequestration of it. Held that the bank was not entitled to withhold payment of the cheque.

ISABELLA ROGERS BUTCHART OR IRELAND was decerned and confirmed executrix on the estate of her deceased husband William Ireland, and Alexander Gilruth Fleming, agent, Dundee, became cautioner for her in the confirmation. He was also Mrs Ireland's confidential agent, and assisted her in collecting the moneys due to the executry estate.

The moneys so collected were lodged with the North of Scotland Banking Company at their branch office at Dundee on account current in name of "A. G. Fleming, for behoof of the representatives of the late William Ireland, hardware merchant, Dundee." The account was regularly operated upon by Mrs Ireland and Mr Fleming as funds were required for the working of the executry. At 30th January 1880 the balance at the credit of the account amounted to £413, 5s. 3d.

On 29th January 1880, Mrs Ireland, requiring the sum of £100 for executry purposes, asked Mr Fleming to draw a cheque upon the account for that sum, which she countersigned as executrix. Prior to this time Fleming had granted a trust-deed for behoof of his own creditors. When the cheque was presented at the bank payment was refused, on the ground of the insolvency of the executry estate, and of Mr Fleming, and the cheque was protested.

Mrs Ireland and Mr Fleming thereupon presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Dundee, praying the Court to ordain the North of Scotland Banking Company to pay to them the sum of £100, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from 30th January till payment.

In the answers to this petition the defenders stated that the estate of William Ireland was insolvent, and that they had presented, or were about to present, a petition to the Court for sequestration of the said estate. (This was done on 27th March 1880 and sequestration awarded.) They further averred that they were large creditors on the said estate, and that they had used an arrestment of these funds in their own hands, which was still in force. Subsequently it was admitted that the amount of the debt due to the bank by Ireland's executry was £130.

On 28th May 1880 the Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) decerned in terms of the prayer of the petition, and, on appeal, the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) on 22d June adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

When the case came on for hearing the appellants moved that the case be sisted to allow of notice being given to the trustee in the sequestration, on the ground that the sequestration deprived the pursuers of their title to sue, and pleaded further, "right of retention, at least until a valid and sufficient discharge is delivered to them, and their own claim, or the dividend effeiring thereto, paid or satisfactorily provided for, in respect of the insolvency of the estates of the deceased and the insolvency of the male pursuer."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a very clear case. Mrs Ireland was the widow and executrix of the deceased William Ireland, hardware-merchant and jeweller in Dundee, and the other pursuer, Mr Fleming, was the cautioner on her confirmation, and her confidential agent. The monies belonging to the executry estate which she had realised, or was in the process of realising, were lodged in the North of Scotland Banking Company's Bank, and the account-current which the executrix had in the bank was operated on in the usual way. She lodged money as it came in, and drew on it as occasion required for the purposes of the executry. It is true, no doubt, that the account was in the name of Mr Fleming, and bore to be in his name for behoof of the representatives of William Ireland, and it is easy enough to see why that was the case; it was to secure Fleming as cautioner for the executry estate. The course taken was perfectly right and proper. Of course Mr Fleming was entitled, on behalf of himself and Mrs Ireland, to draw on the account so long as there were any funds. That being so, we must see what are the averments of Fleming and the answers of the bank as contained in condorcendences 3 and 4. It is there stated (Cond. 3) that "the pursuer, A. G. Fleming, lodged the said monies so collected and recovered by him on behalf of the co-pursuer, as executrix, on account-current with the defenders at their branch office at Dundee, in name of A. G. Fleming for behoof of the representatives of the late William Ireland, hardware-merchant, Dundee. The amount standing at the credit of that account at this date, exclusive of interest, is £413, 5s. 3d. sterling, and this sum is due by the defenders to the pursuer, A. G. Fleming, on behalf of the co-pursuer, Isabella Rogers Butchart or Ireland, as executrix foresaid and the sole representative of the said deceased William Ireland." (Answer 3) "Admitted that the male pursuer lodged certain monies in an account-current in his name for behoof of the representatives of the late William Ireland, hardware-merchant, Dundee, with the defenders' branch at Dundee, and that on 30th January 1880 the balance at the credit of that account amounted to £413, 5s. 3d. Explained that these monies formed part of the estate of deceased William Ireland." (Cond. 4) "That the pursuer, Isabella Rogers Butchart or Ireland, requiring the sum of £100 sterling for the purposes of the said executry, got her agent, the pursuer, A. G. Fleming, to draw a cheque upon the said account for said sum, which he accordingly did, and which she countersigned as executrix of the said deceased William Ireland. Said cheque, which is dated 29th January 1880, and is herewith produced, was, on 30th January 1880, duly presented for payment at the defenders' said branch office at Dundee, but payment thereof was illegally and unwarrantably refused, and the said cheque was duly protested for non-payment, in consequence of which the pursuers have sustained loss and damage, for which action is reserved, and in consequence of which this action is rendered necessary." (Ans. 4) "Admitted that a cheque for £100 was presented for payment on 30th January, and refused."

Ireland v.
North of Scotland Banking
Co.

Now, on these facts it is perfectly plain that unless the bank has some very special defence to offer, they did wrong in refusing to cash the cheque. We must, therefore, consider the circumstances, and that as at the date of the presentation of the cheque. Now, the bank, it is admitted, had more than sufficient money to meet the cheque, and the cheque was drawn by the person in whose name the money stood, and was farther indorsed by the executrix to whom the bank knew that the money belonged. Was there then anything in the circumstances to justify the refusal? It is not said that at that date the estate of the deceased had been sequestrated, or that there was any prospect of such sequestration. No doubt there is an averment that "the defenders have presented, or are about to present, a petition to the Court for sequestration of the estates of William Ireland," but at the date of the presentation of the cheque they had not presented their petition, and did not do so until March following, and therefore there is nothing to deprive the executrix of her proper title to administer the estate, and nothing to prevent her agent and cautioner from drawing out sums necessary for carrying on the executry. It is said that Mr Fleming had executed a trust-deed for behoof of his own creditors, but I do not see what the bank has to do with that. This sum was lying in Mr Fleming's name in his representative character, and the bank was not entitled to conclude that he was going to commit a fraud when he presented the cheque. There is nothing more plain than this, that while a customer has funds in a bank his right to draw on his account is absolute, unless the bank has a right of retention over the money, or some other equally good answer. I am very clearly of opinion that there was no ground whatever for the bank refusing to cash this cheque, and I think we should adhere to the interlocutors appealed against.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the respondents entitled to expenses; allow an account," &c.

Parent and Child—Filiation—Period of Gestation.—Where in an action of filiation intercourse was proved to have taken place at an unascertained date between 287 and 314 days prior to the birth of the pursuer's child, held that the fact that the pursuer herself deponed to a date which gave the lengthened period of gestation of 305 days was not enough to overcome her testimony that the child which was born was the fruit of the intercourse which had then taken place.

Cook v.
Rattray.

THIS was an action of filiation and aliment brought in the Sheriff Court of Forfar at the instance of Mary Cook, farm-servant at Gask, in the parish of Kirkden, against David Rattray, farm-servant at Drummie-termont, in the parish of Dunnichen. Gask and Drummie-termont were about three miles apart.

No. 49.

The pursuer's child was born on 19th August 1879.

Dec. 4, 1880.
Cook v.
Rattray.

The evidence was to the effect that the pursuer and defender had been acquainted for some years, and that on two occasions between Whitsunday and Martinmas 1878 the defender, along with a friend named Kettles, visited the pursuer at Gask. The first of these occasions was admittedly beyond the period of possible gestation. The second occasion was deponed to by the pursuer herself as "five weeks before Martinmas" (O. S. 22d November) 1878; by the defender as "shortly before the term of Martinmas" 1878; by Kettles as "six weeks and two days before the term of Martinmas 1878," and by Elizabeth Millar, a fellow-servant of the pursuer, as "four or five weeks before Martinmas 1878." On this second occasion the pursuer and defender spent an hour alone together about eleven o'clock at night in the stable or byre of the farm, while Kettles and Elizabeth Millar remained in the kitchen. The pursuer deponed that sexual intercourse took place on that occasion, and that the child of which she was delivered on 19th August 1879 was the fruit of that connection.

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) assoilzied the defender.*

The Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and found "in fact that the pursuer has proved that the defender is the father of the pursuer's child," and in law that he was liable in terms of the conclusions of the summons.†

The defender appealed.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a narrow case, and the evidence is not all that could be desired. I will not say how I should have dealt with it had this been the Court of first instance. But the Sheriff has bestowed much attention on it, and I do not see sufficient reason for disturbing his judgment.

The question of fact is, whether the defender is right in his contention that what took place was outwith ten calendar months prior to the birth of the child. If within the ten months, as we are satisfied that intercourse did take place, he

* "NOTE.—On the pursuer's own shewing this child was begot five weeks before Martinmas, that is, on or about the 17th of October 1878. It was born ten months after this. The Sheriff-substitute thinks it cannot be the defender's child."

† NOTE.—(After stating that as the result of the evidence it must be held that intercourse took place on the second occasion spoken to by the witnesses)—"Any peculiarity there is in the case is as to length of time that is said to have elapsed between the conception and the birth. There is no doubt some difference as to the exact date of the above visit. Kettles would place it so early as 'six weeks and two days' before Martinmas. Cook names it as 'five weeks' before Martinmas, Millar as 'four or five weeks' before Martinmas, and Rattray as 'shortly before the term of Martinmas.' There is no precise agreement between any of the parties as to this date. The Sheriff is inclined to think that Kettles is stretching a point in favour of his friend. If it were five weeks before Martinmas, the birth would be 305 days after conception. If four weeks, 298 days, and if only shortly before Martinmas, it might be 287 days. Had it been even quite fixed that 305 days was the true period of gestation, the Sheriff is doubtful if he would have been entitled to go further than the Court of Session did in the case of Boyd, 17th June 1843, 5 D. 1213. But as it is not fixed that an interval of 305 days must have intervened, while the interval may not have been longer than from 287 to 298 days, the Sheriff is of opinion that in the circumstances the pursuer is entitled to prevail."

must be held to be the father of the-child. But if outwith the ten months, No. 49. then he maintains that the proof of paternity is insufficient.

Now, the woman is entitled to give her oath in supplement. But then her oath must be to the effect that the intercourse on which she relies took place at a date when the conception of the child actually born was physically possible. If she fails to fix the intercourse at such a time that this Court can hold it to be the possible cause of the conception which took place then her proof must fail. The question here is whether the woman has so fixed the date or not. If the extreme point of time spoken to be taken, six weeks and two days before Martinmas, that would make the period of gestation 313 days, a period which has never yet been accepted in our Courts as possible. Four weeks before Martinmas, on the other hand, would make the period one which, though perhaps unusual, must be assumed to be possible. The medium period, or five weeks before Martinmas, is just on the doubtful margin. I cannot but think that the date might have been more accurately cleared up. But, as the evidence stands, I do not see sufficient ground for reversing the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD GIFFORD.—There is clear proof that on a certain night prior to Martinmas 1878 the pursuer and defender were together under circumstances which admit of only one inference. The defender says that may be so, but the occasion was more than ten calendar months prior to delivery, and therefore the intercourse could not be the cause of the conception. That might or might not be a good defence if the proof of the fact was clear. But the proof leaves the date very indefinite, and I am therefore of opinion that, the intercourse being clearly proved, we cannot hold it impossible that it was the cause of the conception which at one date or another certainly did take place.

LORD YOUNG.—I have come to be of the same opinion, but I confess not without some difficulty. Both parties have been examined here, and the opinions which your Lordships have given, and in which I concur, involve this, that one of them, the defender, is not speaking the truth, and we therefore do not believe him. He says that he went with his friend Kettles to the farm-house where the pursuer was residing late one night, and induced the pursuer and her fellow-servant to rise from their beds and admit them; and that while Kettles and the other girl remained in the kitchen he went with the pursuer to the byre, but though they remained away about an hour, that nothing took place between them. Now, this we do not believe. And it is a material consideration in viewing the remaining evidence, because we do believe the pursuer when she swears that intercourse then and there took place. Of that intercourse she farther swears that the child she bore on 19th August following was the fruit. She must know if this was the case, and she swears that it was.

But then it is urged that she is not to be believed, because it is impossible that a child born on 19th August could have been begotten on the occasion spoken to. Now, if this were so, either of absolute certainty or even with great probability, we should yield to it, and it must outweigh the evidence of the pursuer. But I am of opinion that this Court cannot, as matter of judicial cognisance, accept it as either impossible or extremely unlikely that a child born on the 19th August could have been begotten on the date referred to by the pursuer. I know of no authority in law which says that intercourse taking place five weeks before Martinmas cannot produce a child born on 19th August

Cook v.

Rattray.

No. 51. The defenders reclaimed to the First Division.

The declaratory conclusions were departed from when the case came before the Inner-House.

Argued for the reclaimers ;—The arrestments attached nothing. A mortgage bond is prima facie not a proper subject for arrestment.¹ The " Prima facie, the bank is not debtor, but creditor, in the mortgage, and in that view nothing was attachable or attached by the arrestments. But the pursuer alleges, in the first place, that no consideration was given by the bank for the mortgage, and that if the mortgage is to be regarded as valid the bank is still bound to advance the amount to the railway company, or, in other words, is debtor to the railway company in the nominal amount of the mortgage, and that the debt has been validly arrested. The bank admits that at the date of the mortgage the railway company had a small balance at their credit in the books of the bank, that the mortgage was granted in security of future overdrafts to be allowed by the bank, and that subsequent to the date of the mortgage overdrafts were allowed to the extent of £2095 still unpaid, and that no further advance has been made by the bank. To the extent, therefore, of about £900 the bank has admittedly not advanced the sum contained in the mortgage.

" In the next place, the pursuer maintains, alternatively, that the mortgage is wholly inept, and that it should be cancelled. It is maintained, both for the bank and for the railway company, that the pursuer had no title, either as a creditor or as a shareholder of the company, to inquire into the circumstances connected with the mortgage. The pursuer, however, maintains that in both capacities he is entitled to such an investigation, and that, in the event of its being held that the bank is not indebted to the railway company, he is entitled to have the mortgage declared to be ultra vires of the railway company, and illegal as a security for a future debt, and on other grounds, and he has conclusions to that effect, being reductive conclusions under another name.

" It is, to say the least of it, doubtful whether as a shareholder he is entitled to insist upon any of the conclusions of this action. He is certainly not entitled to sue the conclusions of furthcoming in any character but that of creditor of the company. But it is unnecessary to consider that question of title, because I think that, as a creditor, he is entitled at all events to be allowed a proof of his averments, and to expiscate all the facts connected with the granting and subsistence of the mortgage. He cannot get payment of the debt contained in his decree, because the railway company say that they have no funds, and that they have exhausted their borrowing powers.

" Now, it appears to me (1) that the pursuer, as a creditor of the company, has an undoubted interest and title to shew that the mortgage is altogether illegal and ought to be cancelled, in which case the railway company's borrowing powers may still be exercised to the extent of £3000 ; (2) that as the mortgage was admittedly not granted in consideration of a present payment of £3000, and as the full amount has admittedly not been advanced, he has both interest and title to ascertain the whole circumstances under which it was granted. Thus it may turn out that the bank, at the date of the mortgage, became absolutely bound to pay £3000 to the company, in which case the amount, in so far as not already advanced, would appear to be a debt or obligation by the bank arrestable by the creditors of the company—see Bell's Com. ii. p. 219, and cases there cited ; or it may turn out that the obligation of the bank was of a more limited character, or that there was no obligation at all ; and in either of these cases the question would arise whether or how far the mortgage was a security for a future debt, and so ineffectual. All these are matters as to which I think investigation should be allowed ; but as some of the alleged facts may admit of proof only by the writ or oath of the bank all such questions which may arise are reserved to be dealt with at the proof."

bank were not in the position of debtors to the railway company; they were not bound to advance money on the mortgage bond. It was within the powers of the railway company to grant this mortgage.¹

Argued for the respondents;—The acceptance and registration of a railway mortgage implied liability on the acceptor. Every such bond has the force and effect of a completed assignation by 8 and 9 Vict. c. 17, sec. 46, et seq. A debt due had therefore been arrested.² The granting of the bond was ultra vires of the company, as it was granted, not for the purpose of raising capital, but to secure a cash credit, which was not allowed by the company's private Act, secs. 7 and 9.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action, as regards its first conclusion, is one of forthcoming, and I understand that that is the only conclusion which we have to dispose of, as the other is given up. Treating the case, then, as one of forthcoming, the question arises, whether the arrestment here used was effectual? Now, the averments of the pursuer are not numerous, and although they are very general they are quite distinctly stated. He avers, first, that “on 17th December 1878 the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway granted to and in favour of the defenders, the Commercial Bank of Scotland, the arrestees, a bond or mortgage bearing to be in consideration of the sum of £3000 paid to the railway company,” and that mortgage was thereafter registered in the books of the railway company in terms of the statute. He then avers,—“No consideration was paid, or has since been paid, by the bank for the said bond or mortgage, and on the assumption that the same was legally issued and accepted the bank were at the date thereof, and still are, bound to pay to the railway company the par value thereof, with interest at five per cent till payment. At the time when it was issued and accepted, and for more than a month thereafter, the railway company was not in any way indebted to the said bank.” And then he says, with reference to a certain overdraft mentioned in the answer for the bank, that it was not applied to meet current expenses. Now, as I read that, it means that at the time this bond was executed, delivered, and registered, no money was presently paid or advanced by the bank, but that thereafter certain money was advanced by the bank to the railway company, for that is clearly implied from the latter part of the statement; and then further he avers,—“The said bank are thus liable to pay to the railway company the sum contained in the said bond, with interest as aforesaid. By virtue of the warrant contained in the said extract decree the pursuer on 3d April 1880 used arrestments in the hands of the defenders, arrestees, conform to schedule. The said sum of £3000, with interest, was thereby effectually arrested, and the present action is brought to have the same made forthcoming to the pursuer.” That last statement is an inference in law rather than a statement of fact, and on its correctness the pursuer's case depends. He says that the bank is now owing to the railway company the sum contained in this mortgage bond for £3000. He admits that it may be found that some of it has been paid, and that he is only entitled to get the unpaid balance, but still his leading contention is that the bond having been granted and registered without consideration, the express consideration is now due as a debt by the bank to the railway company. I am clearly of opinion that there is no such debt due. The first question that would naturally arise for consideration is whether the transaction that was actually entered into between the bank and the railway company was a legitimate transaction, and within the powers of the railway company's officials. We are not dealing with this case after full inquiry into what actually took place, but I think it is sufficient to deal with the matter as it stands alternatively, either on the footing that the transaction which took place between the bank and the railway company was a legitimate transaction and within the powers of the directors of the railway company, or that it was beyond them and illegal. In the first place, if the transaction was a legitimate one, one sees plainly that the bond was given by the railway company as a security for advances to be afterwards made. So much is quite apparent on the face of the pursuer's own averments. I should be sorry to pronounce any opinion that such a transaction is illegal, but I do not wish at present to decide one way or the other. I am anxious, on the contrary, not to be supposed to lend any countenance to the contention that the giving of that mortgage bond in security for advances is necessarily illegal. But supposing it to be legal, what is the relation between the bank and the railway company? Is it that of debtor and creditor? It is certainly that of debtor and creditor; but then who is the debtor? The debtor is the railway company, and not the bank. The railway company is debtor for the sums advanced, for which the bank, no doubt, held a security. The bank can never be the debtor in the event of this being a legitimate transaction of granting security for advances to be made, and in the event of the advances made being less than the amount of the mortgage bond it is quite clear the bank cannot be debtor for the balance, no matter what the amount is, or whether it is an ordinary cash credit bond or any other description of deed, the bank is not compelled to advance to the full amount of the security. The bank in making advances is not paying a debt, but granting a loan, the amount of the loan depending on circumstances. The value of the security may fluctuate, the condition of the debtor may alter for the better or worse, and many considerations may require to be taken into view by the managers of the bank in order to determine to what extent they will advance upon any given security, or what margin they may think it necessary to retain. Therefore the relation between the bank and a customer—dealing with a security of this kind—can never be said to have been of such a nature as to make the bank indebted in any sum of money to the customer.

But then take the other alternative, that this was altogether an illegal proceeding on the part of the railway company, that the directors had no power to impignorate the property of the company by a mortgage bond of this kind for advances to be made. In that case it appears to me that the legal consequence is that the mortgage having been granted for an illegitimate purpose, and being ultra vires of the directors, is good for nothing, and that the only remedy open to the company is to have it cancelled or delivered up to them. Nor, if that be so, can the arresting creditor stand in a better position than the railway company, their debtor, and the arresting creditor cannot, by his diligence, secure anything that his debtor was not in a position to demand from the arrestee, and so in that alternative also there is no money due by the bank to the railway company.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion, and I have little to add. I think the question really depends on the averments in the fourth—it may be the third and fourth—articles of the condensation. It was, however, maintained alternatively that the granting of such a mortgage to a bank was beyond the powers of the railway company; and if that were so, it is difficult to understand how the bank could be bound to pay money on such a bond, or how there could be any money in the hands of the bank to arrest and to be made forthcoming under this action. That argument, if pushed to its legitimate extent, would, I think, be fatal to the pursuer's claim. But the point was, as I understand, not insisted on, and I give no opinion as to whether what was here done was beyond the powers of the company or not. The question therefore really comes to be whether, when there has been delivery of a mortgage by a railway company to a bank in security for advances to be made, an arresting creditor of the railway company can attach the advances that might be made upon the bond, though they have not yet been even demanded. On that question I am not prepared to hold that the arresting creditor can be in any more favourable position than if he were arresting money which might on a certain event be handed over to his debtor, as, for instance, under an ordinary cash credit bond, which is substantially the position in which this bank and the railway company here stand towards each other. Now, in such a case the bank would not be bound in all circumstances to hand over the balance between the amount of the mortgage and the advances already made on demand to the debtor in a cash credit bond. That was settled in Johnston v. Commercial Bank, 20 D. 790. Looking at the case in that light there was here no indebtedness on the part of the bank to the railway company, and I am therefore of opinion that these arrestments have failed to attach anything which can be made the ground of an action of forthcoming.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion.

The averments on which Mr Miller, as a creditor of the railway company, maintains his right to recover the sum sued for from the Commercial Bank are that the company, on 17th December 1878, delivered a mortgage for £3000 to the bank, which they accepted, and which was registered in their names, and that although that mortgage was delivered no consideration was paid for it. It is said that these two things being proved, the legal result is that the bank became indebted on 17th December 1878 in the sum of £3000, and are due that sum still in so far as it has not been paid to the railway company. I cannot assent to that proposition. It depends entirely on what was the arrangement or footing on which the mortgage was delivered and taken whether any legal liability of a pecuniary kind arose on the part of the bank. If any arrangement inferring such liability had been averred the Court would be entitled to take the necessary means of getting at the truth as to what the precise terms of that arrangement were. Here, however, there is no such arrangement averred. The matter is simply left on the bare statement that the deed was delivered and that no money was given for it, and taking the case in that aspect of it I should say that the legal result as to the bank is not that they became debtors in the amount specified in the mortgage, but that having got the mortgage, and no consideration having been paid for it, they are bound, if required, to give it back to the railway company. In that view it is not maintained that the arrestment is of any avail to attach the mortgage as a nomen debiti.

If, however, the record is to be read as containing by implication an averment that the mortgage was delivered to the bank as a security for future advances, I confess I see no reason to doubt that the security would be perfectly good in the hands of a creditor holding it for the amount of his advances. The right of the creditor in that case would be to hold till the advances were paid. The right of the party to whom the advances were made would be on the repayment of the advances to get the mortgage back. It is said that the Court is to infer that there was an obligation on the bank not only to advance the sum they have advanced, and which is stated by them to have been £2000, but the further sum of £1000, making £3000 in all. I have no difficulty in holding that such an obligation is not to be inferred from anything said on this record, and further, that even if the arrangement averred and proved had been an undertaking similar to the granting of a cash credit bond for £3000, the bank's obligation could not be attached by a creditor, for the reasons your Lordship has fully explained. Such obligations are not enforceable in all circumstances, and whatever the future pecuniary position of the person obtaining the credit may be. The very fact that diligence has been done under which the money would be carried away by creditors, so that the person who had opened the account would not have the benefit or use of the fund as a means of credit, would, I think, be generally speaking a sufficient reason to entitle the bank to decline to make the farther advance demanded, not on that ground only, but also because the use of the diligence of arrestment and furthercoming would sufficiently shew the seriously embarrassed position of the debtor.

On these grounds, I agree in holding that the arrestments are bad.

THE COURT sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

Lease—Heritable and Moveable—Fixtures as between landlord and tenant.—Fleming occupied a cottage and piece of garden ground as yearly tenant for a period of ten years. His occupancy had commenced when the cottage was built and while the garden ground was rough and uncultivated. During his tenancy he planted ornamental shrubs, and laid out terraces with turf and gravel walks, access to the different terraces being got by sets of wooden steps. When removing from the subjects Fleming prepared to remove the shrubs, turf, wooden steps, and gravel on the walks. In an action at the instance of the landlord the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) held that the tenant was not entitled to remove shrubs and turf, but allowed him to remove the wooden steps and the gravel from the walks. The landlord acquiesced in the Sheriff's judgment, but the tenant appealed to the Court of Session. The Court dismissed the appeal, Lord Gifford and Lord Young expressing strong opinions that the gravel on the walks was pars soli and not removable.

By second order of same date William Blews & Sons purchased from W. M'Leod & Co. another quantity of piping, on exactly similar terms.

William Blews & Sons themselves corresponded with Messrs Macgregor & Co., and arranged with them as to the freight.*

Dec. 7, 1880.
M'Leod & Co.
v. Harrison.

On 20th April 1877 the goods were duly despatched, in two parcels, by W. M'Leod & Co. to Messrs Macgregor & Co. Invoices thereof were sent to William Blews & Sons, who granted their acceptance for the amount at six months from the 18th April.

The goods arrived at Leith, and were shipped by Messrs Macgregor & Co. on board their first steamer, "The Waverley," to Riga. Separate bills of lading were made out for each parcel of goods, and were handed to Messrs Blews & Sons. The bills of lading were dated "Leith, 24th April 1877," and bore "Transmarine goods traffic, Leith to Moscow via Riga in transit.

"Shipped in good order, and well conditioned, by William Blews & Sons, . . . care of Messrs Kniep & Werner, Riga . . . and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of Riga, unto the agent of the Riga Dunaburg Railway Company, or to their assigns, to be by them forwarded in transit to Messrs Wm. Blews & Sons, Moscow; freight for the said goods, Leith to Moscow, including Riga charges, being hereby agreed upon to be 30½ cops per pood to be paid in Moscow, with primage and average accustomed, and charges as stipulated."

On 12th May 1877 William Blews & Sons issued a circular stating that they had been compelled to file a petition for liquidation, and following thereon Charles Augustus Harrison, accountant, Birmingham, was appointed receiver and manager on their estates.

On receipt of this circular William M'Leod & Co. wrote on 15th May 1877 to Messrs Macgregor & Co. requesting them to stop the goods in transitu, and on 30th May 1877 Messrs Macgregor wrote back that their agents had been successful in laying an embargo—the consignees protesting—on the pipes at Riga while in hands of the Riga Dunaburg Railway Company.

In these circumstances, William M'Leod & Co. raised an action in the Court of Session against Charles Augustus Harrison, concluding for payment of the sum of £269, 7s. 5d., with interest thereon from 21st October 1877 at 5 per cent, being the price alleged to be due to them for the said gas piping. In the pursuers' condescendence 5 it was averred that

v. Harrison.

In answer the defender stated,—“Admitted that the pipes were stopped at Riga. Explained that neither the pursuers nor Macgregor & Co. had any right to stop the pipes. Denied that the pipes were stopped in transitu or before they were delivered to Blews & Sons. Explained that the goods had been delivered to them before they were shipped at Leith, and that they were shipped by them as stated in the bill of lading.”

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—1. The pursuers having sold to William Blews & Sons the goods mentioned in the condescence, and William Blews & Sons having become insolvent and bankrupt at and prior to the time when the goods were delivered to them, or to any agent on their behalf for custody, the pursuers were, the price being unpaid, entitled to stop the goods in transitu, and the goods were validly stopped in transitu in manner above set forth. 2. In respect of the stoppage in transitu, condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree against the defender for the price of the goods sold by them to William Blews & Sons, with interest thereon from the date when the bill which was granted for the said price became payable.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—1. The statements for the pursuers are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions. 3. The goods having been delivered to Messrs Blews & Sons, and shipped by them at Leith, the pursuers were not thereafter entitled to stop them in transitu.

On 20th July 1880 the Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—“The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, decerns and ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £269, 7s. 5d. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 sterling per centum per annum from the 21st day of October 1877 until payment.”*

* His Lordship's note, after setting forth the facts of the case, proceeded as follows:—“The only question argued to the Lord Ordinary was whether this was an effectual stoppage of the goods while in transitu.

“The Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that it was. It appears to him that the goods were directed to be delivered to William Blews & Sons at Moscow, and nowhere else, and that the transitus lasted until the goods arrived at their destination in Moscow. The only ground on which the defender maintained that the stoppage was ineffectual is that set forth in his third plea in law, that the goods were delivered to William Blews & Sons, and were shipped by them at Leith. By this it is not meant that the goods were actually delivered to William Blews & Sons, but that Macgregor & Company were their agents, and that delivery to Macgregor & Company was the same in law as delivery to them. In the case ex parte Rosevear China Clay Company, April 24, 1879, L. R. 11 Chancery Division, 560, it was held that delivery of goods by a vendor to a carrier, hired by the purchaser, is only constructive, not actual delivery, inasmuch as the contract with a carrier to carry goods does not make him the agent or servant of the person with whom he contracts. The goods in the present case were shipped in a general ship, but the same has been decided in the case where the goods were shipped in a ship chartered by the purchaser for the purpose,—Brendston v. Strang, April 21, 1868, L. R. 3 Chancery App. 588. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the goods in this case were at the time of the stoppage in the custody of a third person intermediate between the sellers, who had parted

The defender reclaimed, and during the discussion asked leave to amend his record by adding thereto the following additional statement of facts after his answer 5 :—

Dec. 7, 1880.
M'Leod & Co.
v. Harrison.

"At all events the goods were delivered to Blews & Sons at Riga.

"The agents for Blews & Sons at Riga and Revel are Kniep & Werner, shipping agents at these ports, to whose care the goods were consigned by bills of lading. Kniep & Werner act as the general and shipping agents of Blews & Sons, and have a running account with them, in which the usual agency commission is charged. The disbursements made amount to £3000 or £4000 annually.

"On the arrival of the 'Waverley' at Riga, and on or about 4th May 1877, the goods were discharged and delivered to Kniep & Werner as agents for Blews & Sons.

"On 6th May 1877 notice was received by Kniep & Werner from the Riga and Dunaburg Railway Company that the goods would, on being handed over to them, be detained until the arrival of instructions.

"On 13th May Kniep & Werner, having thus been warned of the risk of stoppage, lodged protest against the proposed detention, and asked whether the railway company had received orders which would admit of the goods being forwarded by them.

"On same day the railway company informed Kniep & Werner that they had left it open to Helmsing & Grimm, acting for Macgregor & Company, to lodge an attachment within twenty-four hours.

"On 17th May, and before resolving to hand over the goods to the railway company, Kniep & Werner communicated with Mr Grimm, and received from him an assurance that no attachment would follow. In reliance on this assurance, Kniep & Werner cleared the goods, and paid the duty and charges thereon, amounting to Rs.2300, with a view to forwarding them by the Dunaburg Railway to Moscow, and handed them to a wharf warehouseman, to be loaded in trucks and delivered to the railway company. They were accordingly loaded and delivered to them.

"On 18th May, and after the goods had been delivered to the railway company, Kniep & Werner were informed by the company that Helmsing & Grimm, in the name of Macgregor & Company, had handed in a notarial protest against forwarding the goods to Moscow."

And also to amend the record by adding the following plea in law :—

"4. At all events, the goods having been delivered to Messrs Blews & Sons at Riga, and handed over by them to the railway company on the assurance above stated, the pursuers were not entitled thereafter to stop them in transitu."

Argued for the reclaimer ;—On the case as originally stated the stoppage was incompetent when the goods were delivered to Messrs Macgregor & Company, agents to William Blews & Sons ; the bills of lading being in the name of the purchasers there was actual delivery of the subjects, and there could be no stoppage in transitu thereafter.¹ Further, the goods with, and the buyer who had not yet acquired, actual possession, and therefore were liable to be stopped by the unpaid sellers. See also ex parte Watson, February 15, 1877, L. were to be delivered at Leith, no mention of Moscow being made in the contract. Even if it were held that delivery had not taken place at Leith it certainly had at Riga, as stated in the proposed amendment.

Argued for the respondents;—The stoppage was competent. The goods could not be held to have been delivered till they arrived at Moscow where they were to be handed over to Blews & Sons. Macgregor & Company were merely carriers, and the goods were in their hands as such.¹ The proposed amendment was incompetent at this stage of the case, and the question must be argued on the footing that delivery took place at Leith, or not at all.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When the case was first argued we thought the goods when stopped were still in transitu to Moscow, and not delivered in the sense of having completed the transitus; but then it is stated on the other side by the purchasers that the transitus did end at Riga by the goods being specially delivered to their agents, and that therefore they must be considered to have been completely delivered. If that were so, I think it would have modified the matter, because though the question might run into shadowy subtleties, yet the question would be a simple one of fact as to whether the goods were in the hands of the pursuers to be forwarded, or in the hands of the purchasers' agents when they had reached Riga.

We have here an amended statement of facts, which I am not inclined to allow to be added to the record. It is a singular statement that information was given to the railway company that the goods on arrival might be stopped by the creditors of the purchasers (and it is clear that Macgregor & Co. knew that there were circumstances which would make such stoppage competent); that it came to the early knowledge of Kniep & Werner, the purchasers' agents, that the goods might be stopped, and that they therefore refrained from clearing them and paying the duty and charges thereon, but in the end they did clear them with a view to forwarding them by the Dunaburg Railway to Moscow, and handed them to a wharf warehouseman to be loaded in trucks and delivered to the railway company, and that they were then stopped in transitu. But then it is averred that they were cleared on the understanding that there should be no attachment of the goods while on the railway. This is an unsatisfactory statement even if relevant, and I do not think that parole proof of a conversation of this kind is sufficient to justify us in allowing an amendment or in allowing further proof in the case.

On the merits of the whole case I think, as I thought before we heard argument on the proposed amendment, that the goods were stopped while in transitu on their way to the purchaser, and that therefore the Lord Ordinary is right in the view which he has taken.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. And first as to the proposed amendment: It appears to me to be simply an appeal at a late stage to the discretion of the Court. There is no reason why we should not have had the information at first, and I therefore agree with your Lordship that the amendment ought not to be allowed. I do not think, in any view, that it would much alter the case. It would simply involve inquiry as to what took place at Riga, and looking to the position of parties I think it would be hardly fair to commit them to a new inquiry of this kind. I do not think the amendment relevant, and it looks just like a change of case from the beginning. Secondly, as to the merits. I do not think the transit ever terminated. Moscow was the place of business of the purchasers, and not Riga. The goods were just as much in transitu when on their way to Moscow as at Leith, though necessarily they went into the hands of successive carriers, and some one must carry them; the sellers were in good time in stopping them before they had reached their destination, and they thus were enabled to secure that the goods should not go to the bankrupt purchasers' creditors, and were saved from being left to take their chance in a mere ranking against the debtors' estate.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. It is certain that the destination of the goods was Messrs Blews & Sons, Moscow. We heard argument formerly as to whether the goods, in a question with the sellers at least, were delivered when they were given into Macgregor & Co.'s hands at Leith. We thought not, and that Macgregor & Co. were only the sellers' agents to forward the goods to their destination. Now, the question is, had these goods reached their destination, or had the buyers ended their destination and substituted another before they were stopped? I am clearly of opinion on the evidence that the goods were stopped before they reached their destination and while on their way, and that they were therefore stopped in transitu. The idea is very well expressed in the bill of lading quoted by the Lord Ordinary—"To be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of Riga unto the agent of the Riga Dunaburg Railway Company or to their assigns, to be by them forwarded in transit to Messrs William Blews & Sons, Moscow; freight for the said goods, Leith to Moscow, including Riga charges, being hereby agreed upon to be 30½ cops per pood, to be paid in Moscow, with primage and average accustomed, and charges as stipulated." And it was while the goods were being thus forwarded in transit to Blews & Sons, Moscow, that they were stopped. It would have been a different case if Blews & Sons had changed their order and instructed their agent at Riga to keep them there as their destination, and we allowed the defender time to enable him to make a statement to this effect and put it on record. But we have got no such statement, but only an account of what must necessarily happen in one way or other to all goods on their way from Leith to Moscow by Riga. With respect to the allegation that the goods were sent to the Dunaburg Railway Station on the assurance of Helmsing & Grimm that they would not be stopped, the averment is not made properly. An averment which goes to bar a party of a legal remedy otherwise competent ought to be precise and substantial; and further, it is an averment which raises a new issue, and is only important on the assumption that the defender has failed on his original issue that the law of transit did not apply. I do not think the defender would be entitled to lead evidence on the new issue without paying all previous expenses, and as the estate was originally a small one, it is scarcely likely he would deem it worth while to go further into the matter, even if the averment were precise enough to induce us to admit it.

I therefore concur that the additional amendment ought not to be allowed, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

THE COURT adhered.

Watson.

Heritable or Moveable—Succession—Conversion.—A testator, whose estate consisted in nearly equal proportions of heritage and moveables, directed his trustees, after paying debts, &c., and certain small special legacies, “with regard to the residue of my means and estate,” as soon after his death as possible, “to pay and convey the same” equally among his four children, the issue of children predeceasing the period of payment and conveyance to be entitled to their parent’s share. In the event of a child’s predecease without leaving issue that child’s share was to accresce to the others and the issue of predeceasers. The deed then proceeded,—“To enable my trustees to carry out the purposes of this settlement . . . I confer upon them all requisite powers, . . . and particularly power to sell my heritable estate.” The personal estate was sufficient to enable the trustees to pay all debts and special legacies. Held that by the terms of the settlement the estate was moveable quoad succession.

ROBERT WATSON of Burnstyle died on 21st October 1878, survived by ^{2D DIVISION.} four children, two sons and two daughters. By his trust-deed and settlement, dated 20th December 1877, he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, whom he directed, after payment of special legacies and his deathbed and funeral expenses,—“(Fourthly), With regard to the residue of my means and estate, I direct my trustees, as soon after my death as possible, to pay and convey the same equally to and among my sons, the said Robert Watson junior and George Watson, and my daughters the said Agnes Watson or Lambie and Jean Watson or Baird, widow of the deceased James Baird, potato merchant in Glasgow; declaring that in the event of any of my said children predeceasing the period of payment and conveyance to them leaving issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share which their parent would have taken on survivance; and further, in the event of any of them predeceasing the said period without leaving issue, then the share which such predeceaser would have taken on survivance shall accresce to his or her surviving brothers and sisters and the issue of any brother or sister who may have deceased leaving issue, such issue always being entitled to the share which their parent would have taken on survivance, which provisions in favour of my said children shall be accepted by them in full of all legitim or other claims competent to them by or through my decease.”

After providing for the debiting of certain advances made to some of his children against their shares the deed proceeded as follows:—“And to enable my trustees to carry out the purposes of this settlement and of any codicils thereto I confer upon them all requisite powers, and particularly (but without prejudice to the said generality) power to sell my heritable estate, in such lots, at such prices, and with such warrandice as they may think proper; declaring that in the event of my said heritable estate being exposed to public sale it shall be lawful for and competent to any of the beneficiaries under these presents to bid for and purchase the same; and also declaring that my said trustees shall have full power to sell any part of my moveable estate either by public roup or private bargain to any of my said beneficiaries.”

The personal estate was amply sufficient to meet the special legacies and debts, &c.

Mrs Jane Watson or Baird, one of the testator's two daughters, only survived her father about a month, as she died on 18th November 1878. She was survived by four children, William Baird, Agnes Kirkwood Baird, Allan Watson Baird, and George Baird. Another son, Robert Watson Baird had predeceased her, leaving two pupil children, Jane Watson Baird and James Baird.

A question having arisen as to whether the truster's estate was to be considered heritable or moveable as regarded the manner in which the children of Mrs Baird should take, a special case was prepared setting forth the above facts. William Baird, Mrs Baird's eldest son, was the first party to the case, and claimed the greater part of the share effeiring to his mother as her heir in heritage. The other three surviving children and the pupil children of the predeceasing son, Robert Watson Baird, to whom their uncle, Robert Watson, had been appointed factor loco tutoris, were the second and third parties, and contended that the succession was moveable, and fell to be divided accordingly.

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court :—“(1) Is the first party entitled to one-fourth of the heritable estate, consisting of said land and feu-duties, which the said Robert Watson of Burnstyle died possessed of or the proceeds thereof? or Is the share of the said Robert Watson's estate originally destined by the said trust-disposition and settlement to the said Jane Watson or Baird, to be held as moveable or at least divisible equally among her issue? (2) Are Robert Watson Baird's children entitled to participate in the whole or any part of the share originally destined to the said Jane Watson or Baird per stirpes or per capita?”

Argued for the first party;—The truster's estate was not converted. It remained in the position in which he left it. The proportion of heritage falling to his daughter, Mrs Baird, therefore remained heritable, and went to her heir-at-law. The moveable part fell to be divided among her other children. According to the decided cases three elements were taken into consideration in questions of conversion,—(1) the condition of the estate, whether per se divisible or not; (2) the terms of the clause conveying the shares to the beneficiaries; and (3) the number and condition of the beneficiaries. 1. The nature and condition of the estate here was not such as to render conversion necessary even in the sense of the strongest cases in that direction.¹ The estate could easily be divided among the beneficiaries without being sold. 2. There was nothing in the use of the words “pay and convey” a “share” to necessarily suggest an intention of conversion, nor did a power of sale point necessarily in the same direction. Such words had been used and power given in cases where it had been held that conversion had not been operated.¹ 3. The decisions upon the number and condition of the beneficiaries had been somewhat varied, but conversion had seldom, if ever, been sustained where the original number was so small as here, viz., four.²

Baird, &c. v.
Watson.

Argued for the second and third parties;—Everything in this deed and in the circumstances of the case pointed to conversion. The intention of the testator clearly was that the whole estate should be realised and the shares paid in money.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think it necessary to recapitulate the authorities which Mr Murray has fully quoted to us. I am of opinion that there are no grounds on which we can suppose that this testator meant his property to be kept together. On the other hand, everything points to a contrary result. He gave his trustees a power of sale in order to enable them to carry out the purposes of his settlement, and that indicates that in his opinion his intention could not be carried out without this power of sale. Without going more fully into the case, and it being clear that the heritable property was only held as an investment, that the direction appears to contemplate payment in money, that there is a considerable number of beneficiaries, and that the bequest is a bequest of residue, everything seems to lead to the result that there was conversion here.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, and I arrive at it partly from the nature of the estate, which is of a complex nature—a small piece of land, feudal duties of considerable value, and heritable bonds. There is also a destination over to issue and not to heirs in heritage. It is plain that this estate was meant to be dealt with as a whole, and equal shares of it were to go to each child. On the whole, I think this estate has been made moveable by the settlement.

LORD YOUNG.—I am also of the same opinion, and, I must confess, without any difficulty. No case could have been more clearly stated or ably argued than this has been. The only general rule which we can deduce from the authorities, one way and the other, which have been quoted to us, is that we must in each case endeavour to collect from the whole provisions of each deed what the intention of the testator truly is. If a testator leaves a heritable estate and indicates no intention that it should be converted then it must remain heritage, and similarly with moveable property. Either kind of property may be converted by clear directions to that effect, or by such directions as indicate without doubt that such was the testator's intention.

Baird, &c. v.
Watson.

This will indicates clearly and satisfactorily to my mind that the testator intended his children or grandchildren to take their shares in the form of money. He was a great-grandfather, because his daughter, Mrs Baird, was a grandmother, and if she had predeceased him leaving, say, twelve children, they would take directly under the will, and it would be extravagant to hold that these children should take as heirs in heritage.

The very language of the clause conferring the power of sale points to the result at which your Lordships have arrived. It was plainly in his mind that a sale of the heritable estate was requisite before the will could be executed as he intended. It is the very test of conversion, whether sale of heritage is necessary to carry out the will. "Requisite" is the word used here, and that is as strong a word as necessary; indeed, they may be said to be interchangeable. I am therefore, for the reasons now assigned, entirely of the same opinion as your Lordships, and I am glad that we can take this view, as it certainly leads to the most equitable distribution of this estate.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the character of the estate of the testator, Robert Watson, as impressed on it by his trust-disposition and settlement, was moveable, and therefore find (first) that the share of his estate originally destined by his said trust-disposition and settlement to Jane Watson or Baird is moveable, and divisible equally among her issue; and (second) that the children of Robert Watson Baird are entitled to participate equally in the proportion of said share to which he would have had right had he survived the said Jane Watson or Baird, his mother, and decern."

Seton v.

HENRY SETON, Pursuer.—Brand.
Rev. J. A. PATERSON, Defender.—Shaw.

Locatio Conductio—Riding horse hired for road galloped in grass field—Consequential damages.—A riding horse hired at the ordinary rate for a day's ride was ridden at a gallop in a grass field. While there it split its pastern bone, and six weeks after, when almost recovered, it died of inflammation caused by a twist in the bowels. In an action at the instance of the owner against the hirer for the value of the horse held (diss. Lord Gifford) (1) that the galloping the horse in a grass field was a departure from the implied conditions of the contract, and that the accident must be held to have been caused by the fault of the defender; (2) that the death of the horse being presumably attributable to the want of exercise consequent upon the injury, the rider was liable in the value of the horse.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
I.

ON 22d June 1880 Henry Seton, horsehirer, Edinburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, against the Rev. J. A. Paterson for £35, 11s. 6d., "being the loss and damage sustained by him by and through the defender's reckless, violent, and wrongful or illegal usage of a chestnut mare belonging to the pursuer while on hire by the defender on or about the 13th day of March 1880." In his condescendence Seton stated that Mr Paterson hired the mare from him on the day in question. "It was distinctly understood that the hiring was for the purpose of using the mare for riding in a moderate and reasonable way, and that she was to be subjected to no violent or dangerous exertion." He then proceeded to aver that while Mr Paterson had the horse out on hire its pastern bone was broken in consequence of the "reckless, violent, and wrongful or illegal manner" in which she had been ridden; that she never was again fit for work, and finally, on 1st May, died of inflammation of the bowels; "but the inflammation and her inability to cope therewith and consequent death were caused or induced by the wrongful conduct aforesaid of the defender, and by the mare being unable to take sufficient exercise." The sum of £35, 11s. 6d. sued for was stated to be made up of £27, the price alleged to have been paid for the mare shortly before the hiring in question, and the balance of £8, 11s. 6d. as expense of keep and attendance from the date of the hiring until her death.

Mr Paterson defended the action, and while he admitted that the mare had become lame while he was riding her, he denied that he had been guilty of any such recklessness as the pursuer alleged. He also averred that the inflammation of the bowels, of which the mare died, was totally unconnected with the lameness.

Pleaded for Seton;—(1) The defender having hired the mare in question from the pursuer in good health and condition, and having returned her seriously injured and damaged, he is liable in reparation to the pursuer of the loss and injury thence arising, unless he shall prove that he used the animal in a proper and legal manner, and that the injuries arose from an accident over which he had no control. (2) The defender having used the mare in a reckless, violent, and wrongful or illegal manner, he is liable to the pursuer in reparation of all loss and damage arising in consequence. (3) The mare having been permanently injured and rendered useless by the fault of the defender, he is liable in reparation of its value, and of the expenses to which the pursuer has been put. (4) The animal in question having been wrongfully injured by the defender, and having died before recovering therefrom, and, as averred in the condescendence, through the fault of the defender, he is liable in damages as prayed.

Pleaded for Paterson;—(3) The death of the animal in question not having been due to the fault of the defender, et separatim said death being due to causes entirely unconnected with the fracture in respect of which the action is brought, the defender falls to be assolizied.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) allowed a proof, from which it appeared that Mr Paterson had been in the habit of hiring riding horses from Seton for some years, and had on the occasion in question hired the mare in question in the usual way for an ordinary ride. He had been accompanied by a friend who had also hired a riding horse from Seton, and after riding by road some four miles into the country they had entered a grass field and there, as Mr Paterson put it, had ridden "at a hand gallop or canter," or, as his friend deponed, at "a brisk canter or easy gallop." Thereafter the mare had become lame, and was left at a farm until sent for, at Mr Paterson's request, by Seton. The mare while under treatment for her lameness, which was due to having split the pastern bone of one of her fore feet, was in Seton's stables, but was attended by a veterinary surgeon named by Mr Paterson. She died on 1st May. The result of a post mortem examination shewed that she had twisted her colon, and inflammation of the bowels had supervened, causing death. Seton deponed,—"I have three rates of hire, 3s. an hour for a saddle horse, and for a day, according to distance, from 10s. 6d. to 15s.; when used for military purposes, where there is any galloping or any risk, a guinea a-day; and for hunting purposes the charge is two guineas a-day. I saw the defender on the morning of 13th March. He asked me if he could get the same mare that day, to ride out with a friend, as he had liked her so much. I said, 'Certainly.' On that particular day I warned him to be careful. It was certainly within the understood conditions on which I hired out this mare that the hirer was not to gallop her across a field, or make her canter in a field. I never would have given permission for that to be done. It is a dangerous thing for a mare to do that. I have not the slightest doubt, after hearing the evidence to-day, that taking the mare off the road and galloping her in a field was the cause of the accident. I have seen a number of similar cases. . . . I do not object to a rider, hiring as the defender did, taking a gallop along the road with the horse—a moderate gallop. My objection is to galloping in a field or on the grass with troops. I charge a guinea a-day when the horse is galloping in a field with troops. I have no doubt that the people who hire from me go round by Duddingston and the Queen's Park. It is very wrong if they go on the grass there. It is not worse for a horse to gallop along a soft green sward than to gallop along a hard macadamised road, provided it be moderately done; and if moderately done, I would not charge a guinea a-day. What I object to is when the galloping is reckless, and unduly violent. In the majority of cases, in my experience, where fractures like the one in question occurred, unless the animal was of great value, it was destroyed." The veterinary surgeons examined for the pursuer deponed that the want of exercise, following on her lameness, might be conducive to inflammation of the bowels, but that there was no necessary connection between the injury and the inflammation. A veterinary surgeon, a witness for the defender, deponed,—“The mare died through exhaustion, from extreme pain and twist in the bowels—sphacelus of the bowels. That was a condition exceeding inflammation, amounting almost to apoplexy of the bowels, from the arresting of the circulation. I saw the pursuer, and suggested a post mortem. I made it myself. I found what I have just described—a twist in the colon, with very extensive congestion of the blood vessels of the bowels, amounting to apoplexy in that part of the bowels which was involved in the twist. Her rolling had caused the twist. The mare died from one of two causes. She might have been rolling in her stall, as many horses do, or she may have contracted colic or abdominal pain. She might have been rolling on account of that, and so have produced the twist. There was no indication about her bowels to shew what had been the cause of the original colic. I examined her bowels very carefully to see if there was any sign of over-feeding, and there was not. In my opinion, it had no connection whatever with the split pastern. Such a twist as I saw would necessarily be fatal, and it is common.”

On 20th October 1880 the Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds in point of fact—1, That the defender hired the mare in question from the pursuer for a ride on 13th March last; 2, that in the course of said ride the defender took the mare from the road into a grass field, and had a gallop or canter there; 3, that on said occasion the defender was accompanied by a friend of his, the witness M'Ewan, who hired his horse from the pursuer, went over the same road, and the same field, at the same pace, and returned his animal to the pursuer in a perfectly sound condition; 4, that the mare in question was discovered to be going lame just as the defender and his friend M'Ewan came out of the grass field above mentioned; 5, that the cause of lameness was discovered to be split pastern; that the animal was placed under treatment, and was in the course of getting better when she was seized with inflammation of the bowels, of which disease she died on 1st May; 6, that split pastern is an injury which may arise from mere accident in the legitimate use of a horse, and does not necessarily imply any improper or reckless use thereof; 7, that there was no necessary connection between the accident of 13th March and the death of the animal on 1st May; 8, that no culpa defences: Assoiliizes the defender from the whole conclusions of the libel: Seton v.

Finds him entitled to expenses." * Paterson.

Seton appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for Seton;—The galloping of the mare in the field being in breach of the implied conditions of the contract under which she was hired the defender was liable for the consequences. The death of the mare being directly connected with the injury inflicted by the defender he was bound to make good her value.¹

Argued for Paterson;—The mare had been used quite properly, and the injury was just one of the risks which a person who hired out riding horses had to lay his account to. In any view there was no direct connection between the split pastern bone and the twisted colon which had caused the death.

LORD YOUNG.—I think it is a pity the parties did not settle this case for themselves. The defender seems to have been in the habit of hiring riding horses from the pursuer, and to have been satisfied with them. It would probably have been wiser and better for the pursuer to have kept his customer, and arranged this matter. Although there was thus every inducement to settle this case extrajudicially on reasonable terms the parties have preferred to go on with this action, and we have now to decide between them.

I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has gone wrong here. It was not, I think, according to the implied condition in the contract upon which this horse was hired that the defender should open the gate of a field and take the horse into the field and gallop it there. That such a thing is probably done frequently may be true, but we have no evidence of it. People are often willing to run risks, and if no harm ensues no more is heard of it. But if the hirer of a riding

* "NOTE.—The mare got her pastern split on 13th March, in the course of the defender's ride to Cramond that day. She was galloped in a grass field in the course of that ride. On these two facts the pursuer's case rests. His contention was that they infer culpa and its resulting liability, the connection between the accident and the death being taken for granted.

"Even on that assumption the Sheriff-substitute is unable to accept that conclusion. He has just reperused the evidence of the defender, and his friend Mr M'Ewan, and is more than ever impressed with its trustworthiness. The stoppage in the field mentioned by one of these gentlemen, and omitted by the other, is too trifling a discrepancy to have any weight. Both horses were treated that day in precisely the same manner,—one went lame, and the other did not. The inference, strengthened by Professor Williams' opinion, is, that the split pastern was an accident of the ride, for which no one is to blame.

"But even were culpa proved, much more is needed for the pursuer's success. His claim of damages is one and indivisible. It is damages for the loss of a mare which died by the defender's fault. Now, it is proved beyond a doubt that between the death of the mare and the accident there was no necessary connection. She was more liable to inflammation of the bowels while under treatment for split pastern than before. The evidence goes no further than that special care was needed, and if special care had been given she might not have died. For the lack of the special care the defender is not liable.

"But it is sufficient for the defender's relief from any liability that there is no proof of culpa against him. Direct evidence there is none, and no sufficient ground for such an inference."

horse does a thing like this, which he is not entitled to do, and having taken a horse sound and well into a field brings it out again with its pastern bone split, he must bear the consequences. We have not to consider whether a field might not be, in point of fact, safer than a road, but I think it incumbent on a hirer of a horse, if he acts as this defender did, to establish the fact that it was safer. The pursuer has made out a case which proves that there was an irregularity in the way in which this horse was treated, and that an injury followed in consequence. That being so, I think that there is liability. There is nothing in the Sheriff-substitute's remark that the other horse which was subjected to the same treatment remained uninjured. If there had been twenty horses galloped in this field there is no probability that all their pastern bones would have been broken.

There being thus prima facie liability the next question is, what is the amount of damage? Here, again, I am perplexed by the Sheriff-substitute's view, that the claim of the pursuer is one and indivisible, and so that however wrong the defender's conduct may have been this action cannot be maintained against him unless the death of the horse be held directly attributable to the wrong done by the defender. That seems to mean that if you injure a horse never so grievously the owner of the horse shall not recover unless he can prove that death resulted directly from the injury. That is not so; the death of the horse may not be the result of the injury and yet the action will be quite good.

But I am not satisfied that the death of this horse and the injury are so disconnected as to free the defender from liability.

The horse's pastern bone was broken, and it was accordingly laid up and unable to take exercise. Now, there is no doubt that a horse so confined to the stable without exercise and under treatment is more likely to take inflammation of the bowels. There is a likelihood that the horse being injured and laid up took this disease more easily than it otherwise would have done, and being, in consequence of its condition, a worse patient, it died of the disease. That being so, I am not prepared to say that this defender by using the horse otherwise than the implied conditions of the contract allowed did not make himself liable for the animal's death. I think he is liable. The pursuer, in my opinion, is entitled to the value of the horse.

I would suggest that we should find that owing to the fault of the defender the pursuer's horse was severely injured, and assess the damage at £27.

LORD GIFFORD.—In such a case I am most unwilling to dissent, but I really am not able to concur in the judgment proposed. I doubt if culpa accounting for the injury or causing the damage has been shewn. If there was any culpa, it was certainly culpa levissima or levis culpa at the most. The field appeared reasonably safe, and there was no apparent danger. We have nothing to do with trespass, and we are not in any question with the owner of the field or with the farmer complaining of trespass. Suppose the field had been a friend's field, and the defender had gone in to have a canter on the grass in a smooth and perfectly safe paddock, that surely, if culpa at all, would have been culpa levissima, and we have no evidence of the nature of the field, whether it was safe or not. Not a question is put on this subject, and no cross questions, and the reason is obvious. The only case stated against the defender is, not that he went to a dangerous place, but only that he rode in a violent and reckless manner. This is the only charge he had to meet, and so the evidence is confined to that point alone. The defender had frankly gone to the pursuer and told all that had happened. The pursuer knew where the field was, or might have known. If it had been part of the pursuer's case that the field in which the defender took his canter was a dangerous field—a field into which by reason of its condition the defender had no right to go—I think he would have stated in his condescendence, and would have been bound to state, that fact, and that that was a fact which he relied on, and he has not done so. I am therefore inclined to hold that the defender went into a place quite suitable and safe for his purpose. It would be hard to say that a man may not ride or canter on grass when he hires a horse for a pleasure ride. Even Seton himself does not say that. It is “reckless galloping” he complains of.

But, again, assuming that there is culpa, I am not satisfied that the value of the horse is the measure of damages. No doubt the horse died, and so the pursuer claims its value. But was its death caused by anything that the pursuer did? I think not. I do not think it sufficiently appears that the injury to the pastern of the horse was the cause of the inflammation that led to its death. That might be a thing more or less likely, but there is certainly evidence that the death arose from a twist of the colon or intestine, occasioned by the animal rolling in its stall, but this was after its pastern was better. There is no necessary connection between the broken pastern and the twisted or knotted colon and the resulting inflammation; it is only proved that the inflammation is likely to be aggravated when the horse is kept tied up in its stall. But at all events a twist in the bowel seems from the post mortem examination to have been the cause of death, and how we are to hold this gentleman liable for that I cannot see. I think he made a fair offer to pay for all the damage which happened to the animal when in his hands, and on the whole I incline to the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a narrow case, and your Lordships are not at one on the result to which the Court should come. I must say that all along my feeling has been in favour of the view taken by Lord Young, whose opinion I adopt.

To take a horse, which has been hired for a ride along a road, into a grass field and gallop it there is to go beyond the implied conditions of the contract on which the horse was hired. There is no evidence as to the practice in such cases, but the pursuer says that he would not have hired out the horse at the rate which he charged for that ride if he had known it was to be treated as the defender treated it. It is common sense that if a hirer takes a horse at the low rate for an ordinary ride and gallops it in a field he must take the risk of any injury which may result.

Having thus reached the conclusion that there is liability, there is no difficulty in following Lord Young as to the amount of damages. I therefore, on both points, concur in his Lordship's opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Find that owing to the fault of the respondent (defender) the appellant's (pursuer's) horse suffered injury, to his damage, and assess the damage at £27 sterling: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and decern: Find the appellant (pursuer) entitled to expenses in the Sheriff Court and in this Court, and remit,” &c.

Succession—Legacy to "nearest in kin"—Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, 18 Vict. c. 23, sec. 1.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) that a legacy to a person's "nearest in kin" was not to be construed as a legacy to his heirs in mobilibus.

Question, whether a legacy to next of kin was to be construed as a legacy to nearest relations, or as a legacy to next of kin as defined by the law of moveable succession.

Observed, that the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, adopted the common law definition of next of kin.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

ON 2d March 1852 the late Rev. Peter Young and his wife executed a mutual trust-disposition and settlement. The trustees were directed to pay certain legacies, and the deed contained the following residuary clause:—"In the last place, as to whatever residue there may be of our said property after fulfilling the foresaid purposes, we wish and direct it to be divided and disposed of in such way as we or the survivor of us two shall direct by any future writing under our hands, or the hand of the survivor of us two, made at any time, which writing we hereby declare to be like these presents, part of our said deed or deeds of settlement, and as binding on you, our trustees, as if it had been engrossed therein, and failing such writing disposing of said residue, then the said residue shall be equally divided among the nearest in kin of us both who shall be alive at the time of the death of the survivor of us two: That is to say, one-half to the nearest in kin equally amongst them of me, the said Peter Young, and the other half to the nearest in kin equally amongst them of me, the said Maitland M'Culloch or Young, who shall be alive at the time of the death of the survivor of us two."

Mrs Young died in March 1853 without having executed any deed.

Mr Young died on 28th September 1864, having made various codicils by which he altered the legacies, but did not alter the destination of residue.

The trustees entered upon possession of the trust-estate.

Miss M'Adam, to whom Mr Young had bequeathed the liferent of the estates, died on 28th January 1879. After her death the estate fell to be divided among the persons in whom it had, by the residuary clause, vested on the death of Mr Young.

The half of the estate destined to Mr Young's relatives was paid without dispute after the action had been raised. The half destined to Mrs Young's relatives was claimed by (1) W. D. B. Janes and others, as representatives of John Robert M'Adam, a nephew of Mrs Young who was alive at the date of Mr Young's death; and (2) Margaret Thackwray and others, as children of Thomas Thackwray, another nephew of Mrs Young, who had died before the date of Mr Young's death.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"... Find ... according to the sound construction of the said mutual disposition and settlement the other half thereof, destined to the nearest in kin of the said Mrs Maitland M'Culloch or Young alive at the time of the death of the said Peter Young, is payable to the heirs in mobilibus as at that date entitled to succeed ab intestato to the said Mrs Maitland M'Culloch or Young, including not only the said Robert John M'Adam, who died at Montreal on 4th February 1869, but also the children of Mrs Young's deceased nephew, Thomas Thackwray, as coming in place of their father, and also the children of any other nephew or nephews of Mrs Young who may have survived her but predeceased her said husband." * No. 56.

Young's Trustees v. Janes,

* "NOTE.—Apart from the authorities on the subject, the Lord Ordinary might have had difficulty in admitting among the nearest in kindred of Mrs Young, along with her nephew John Robert M'Adam, the children of a nephew who predeceased the prescribed period of distribution. He should have been disposed to regard 'nearest in kin' (an expression frequently used as synonymous with next of kin, e.g., Bell's Pr., section 1861) as pointing to propinquity in degree, as well as to the order of succession provided by the common law of Scotland; and he should have thought it questionable whether a statutory provision, applicable to cases of intestate succession, could be applied to the interpretation of such a term in a mutual settlement which was made before the statute was passed which changed the law of moveable succession.

"But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, upon the authorities, that the expression may be read as meaning those relations who are entitled to take the succession according to law; and that in deeds like that which is founded on in this case it ought to be so read, unless there are expressions to be found in it which indicate an intention to use it in a different sense. It was a part of the mutual settlement of Mr and Mrs Young that the survivor should have full power to direct the disposal of the residua. Indeed, it was the express purpose of the deed that the longest liver should have 'absolute right' to the whole property. The question, therefore, as to the meaning of the residuary bequest in favour of the nearest in kin of Mrs Young alive at the death of the survivor must be considered to have been made by Mr Young on the day of his death, for the purpose of disposing of his own property. It is entirely disencumbered of any notion of personal predilection on the part of Mrs Young, and no difficulty arises from the deed having been made before 1855, or from one of the parties having died before that date.

"In such a case the meaning of the expression will depend on the nature of the subject which forms the subject of the destination. If it be an heritable estate, the heir-at-law, according to the rules of succession in heritage, would presumably be called although another relative might be nearer in degree. Of this the case of Connell v. Grierson, Feb. 14, 1867 (5 M. 379), affords an example. If, on the other hand, it be a moveable succession that is referred to (as in the present case) those entitled to succeed at law as heirs in mobilibus will be held to be favoured unless there be something in the deed, as in the case of Scott v. Scott (H. L., May 10, 1855, 2 M.Q. 281), which shews that the testator did not desire to adopt the legal order of succession. But the expression is not held to be a technical term signifying exclusively those who would succeed according to the common law as it stood prior to 1855. The cases of Nimmo v. Murray's Trustees, June 3, 1864 (2 M. 1144), and Maxwell v. Maxwell, December 24, 1864 (3 M. 318), seem to the Lord Ordinary, in this view, to have an important bearing on the present case. In Nimmo's case the expression was 'my own nearest heirs and successors.' This was held to include the descendant of a sister who had predeceased the testator, along with a brother who had survived him. In Maxwell's case the bequest was to John Maxwell, 'his heirs, executors, and assignees.' This was held to mean the heirs in mobilibus, according to the law of intestate moveable succession, as altered by the Act 18 Vict. cap. 23. Unless, therefore, it could have been shewn that the term nearest in kin, as used in the settlement of Mr and Mrs Young, was intended to exclude the children of a nephew predeceasing the time of the survivor's death, in the event of any nephew or niece being then alive, there seems to be no reason to doubt that the children of Thomas Thackwray are entitled, as in place of their father, who predeceased, to a share of the succession along with John Robert M'Adam, who survived, or those who represent him.

"The case of Cockburn's Trustees v. Dundas, June 10, 1864 (2 M., 1185), is not inconsistent with the decision in Nimmo's case. In that case there seems to have been no claim for the children of the deceased grandchildren, and it was pointed out in Maxwell v. Maxwell that there were specialties, which are fully

&c.

The claimants W. D. B. Janes and others reclaimed, and argued ;—The Intestate Moveable Succession Act of 1855 made a distinction between next of kin and heirs in mobilibus, and the words of mutual settlement were not intended to favour any but the nearest in blood of the spouses. Children of a nephew had no claim. At the time the deed was made nephews would have excluded grandnephews in intestate succession, and the testators meant that their property should go to the nearest in blood. The change of the law by the Moveable Succession Act could not affect the meaning of words used in a deed made prior to the passing of the Act.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this competition depends on the construction of a clause in the mutual settlement of the late Mr and Mrs Young, which is dated 2d March 1852. After providing a number of legacies the deed contains the following residuary clause :—“ In the last place, as to whatever residue there may be of our said property after fulfilling the foresaid purposes, we wish and direct it to be divided and disposed of in such way as we or the survivor of us two shall direct by any future writing under our hands, or the hand of the survivor of us two, made at any time, which writing we hereby declare to be like these presents, part of our said deed or deeds of settlement, and as binding on you, our trustees, as if it had been engrossed therein, and failing such writing disposing of said residue, then the said residue shall be equally divided among the nearest in kin of us both, who shall be alive at the time of the death of the survivor of us two : That is to say, one-half to the nearest in kin equally amongst them of me, the said Peter Young, and the other half to brought out in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk. But for these specialties the Lord Ordinary sees no reason to doubt that the opinion of Lord Neaves would have been given effect to. He held that the testator meant to bequeath the succession to those who should be his heirs in mobilibus, or in heritage, at the time of distribution, and that the Intestate Succession Act should receive effect, and be imported into every will in which the testator leaves his succession to heirs and executors alive at the time of distribution. This was just what had been held in Nimmo's case, and none of the other Judges indicate that their decision in that case was in any degree shaken.

“ It was observed in argument that the expression ‘ next of kin,’ or ‘ nearest in kin,’ was not dealt with in these cases. The observation is a just one, and there is no doubt that the statute of 1855 itself draws a distinction between ‘ next of kin ’ and the children of those who, if they had survived, would have been among the next of kin. The question, however, is, What is the meaning of the expression as used in a testamentary deed of this kind ? And, upon that question, the Lord Ordinary thinks that a very sufficient answer is to be found in the opinion of the Lord President in the case of Ferrier v. Angus—January 21, 1876 (3 R. 396)—‘ The ordinary sense of the words “ (nearest in kin) ” would be the heirs in mobilibus of the spouses ; that is, the next of kin of each at the time of his or her death.’ There was no competition in that case between one of the next of kin and the children of another who had predeceased. But the Lord Ordinary considers that this description of the class shews that the expression ‘ next of kin ’ in a legacy is not presumed to exclude any of those who are heirs in mobilibus according to the law of moveable succession. The opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in the more recent case of Webster v. Shinnie (6 Rettie, 102) is still more adverse to the suggestion that the term must always be read in its strict legal signification. Speaking of the statute, 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, he said,—‘ I read the expression “ next of kin ” to mean nothing whatever but the heir in mobilibus ab intestato.’

“ The Lord Ordinary did not understand that there was anything in the settlement indicative of an intention to use the term in a different sense, unless the words themselves have such different meaning.”

the nearest in kin, equally amongst them, of me, the said Maitland M'Culloch or Young, who shall be alive at the time of the death of the survivor of us two." No. 56.
 Mrs Young died in 1853 without having executed any deed. The husband died Dec. 10, 1880.
 eleven years afterwards, and the chief alteration which he made was to bequeath a Young's Trustees v. Janes, &c. liferent to Miss Jane M'Adam. The period of time at which the bequest of residue is to be determined is the death of Mr Young, which occurred on 28th September 1864. The half of the succession, which went to the next of kin of Mr Young, has been disposed of without competition. But as to Mrs Young's half a competition has arisen in the present process between the representatives of a nephew who survived the period of the death of the survivor of the spouses and the representatives of a nephew who predeceased that period. The reclaimers, W. D. B. Janes and others, are the representatives of the nephew who survived the period, and Mrs Harris and others are the representatives of a nephew who predeceased that period. At the death of the survivor of the spouses there was only one person alive answering the description of next or nearest of kin of Mrs Young, but the representatives of the nephew who predeceased maintain that under the operation of the Intestate Succession Act, or taking it as construing the terms of this settlement, they are entitled, among them, to an equal share with the nephew who survived. The whole question turns on the meaning of the words "nearest in kin of us two who shall be alive at the death of the survivor of us two."

I rather think that this is the first time, at least since the passing of the Intestate Succession Act, that we have had to determine the meaning of the words "next or nearest of kin" as used in a testamentary disposition of moveables. It seems to me that the representatives of a nephew who predeceased the survivor of the spouses were not at that date nearest of kin in any sense of the term. They were not nearest in blood, because they were a degree further off than the nephew who survived. Nor were they nearest of kin at common law, because by the common law of Scotland there was no representation in moveables, and nearest in kin alive would take in preference to representatives of the same degree of propinquity who had died.

It is still more clear that they were not next of kin in the sense of the Intestate Succession Act, as it appears that the only persons who are called next of kin in that Act are the next of kin by the common law. In the first section these expressions occur—"In all cases of intestate moveable succession in Scotland accruing after the passing of this Act, where any person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been among his next of kin, shall have predeceased such intestate, the lawful child or children of such person so predeceasing shall come in the place of such person, and the issue of any such child or children, or of any descendant of such child or children, who may in like manner have predeceased the intestate, shall come in the place of his or their parent predeceasing, and shall respectively have right to the share of the moveable estate of the intestate to which the parent of such child or children or of such issue, if he had survived the intestate, would have been entitled." It must be observed that the term "next of kin" is used not as meaning representatives of those nearest in blood, but in the same meaning as the term has at common law. Further, we have the enactment—"Provided always that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers and sisters' descendants, and that the surviving next of kin of the intestate claiming the office of executor shall have exclusive right thereto in preference to the children or other descendants of any predeceasing

No. 56. next of kin, but that such children or descendants shall be entitled to confirmation when no next of kin shall compete for said office." Now, here again there is a sharp distinction between those who are to come in as representatives and the next of kin. It appears to me that the term next of kin has never been used in the sense of including those who by statute are admitted to a share in the succession.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Young's Trustees v. James, &c.

Looking to the first paragraph of the Lord Ordinary's note, he appears to have been inclined to take that view, but seems to have thought that he was precluded from doing so by the authorities. I think his Lordship has misunderstood the authorities, for the cases of Nimmo, Connell, and Maxwell are all different from this. In none of them was there the expression "next or nearest of kin." In Nimmo v. Murray's Trustees, June 3, 1864, 2 Macph. 1144, the expression was "nearest heirs and successors." In Connell v. Grierson, Feb. 14, 1867 (5 Macph. 379), the expression was "own nearest of kindred and their heirs and assignees and disponees whomsoever." In Maxwell v. Maxwell, Dec. 24, 1864, 3 Macph. 318, the expression was "his heirs, executors, and assignees." Now, all these expressions have special reference to intestate succession. They plainly describe the parties who, in the event of the testator dying intestate, would take the succession, heritable or moveable. That is surely open to a different construction from an expression which has reference to the blood connection of the parties. In Nimmo's case I think the distinction was pointed out in my opinion. I say, "It is given to 'my own nearest heirs and successors.' Now, I very much agree with Lord Benholme in thinking that in the construction of a clause of this kind an important distinction exists between words which express near propinquity or nearness in blood, and words which express the relation between the testator and those whom he calls in regard to his succession. Parties may be nearest in blood and yet may not be the heirs or the only heirs who will take the succession, and therefore there may be great difficulties and ambiguities in the construction of words which import merely propinquity or nearness in blood which will not arise in a case where the words used simply refer to the relation between the testator and the parties called as taking his succession. Now, keeping that in view, I cannot think that in a deed of this kind 'my own nearest heirs and successors,' unless there be something very peculiar in the context or in the general scope and purpose of the deed, can bear any other construction than 'my nearest heirs, or my nearest heirs in mobilibus,' according to the nature of the subject." It appears to me that the cases referred to by the Lord Ordinary have not much application here except by way of distinction.

But it seems to be contended that in some other cases opinions have been expressed at variance with that construction of the words "nearest of kin," which I think is applicable here; and in particular a reference was made to the case of Ferrier v. Angus, Jan. 21, 1876 (ante, vol. iii. 396), in which I am reported to have said that the ordinary meaning of next of kin would be heirs in mobilibus in relation to the deed then under consideration. But it must be observed that there was no competition between next of kin and heirs in mobilibus in that case. It was conceded on both sides that the next of kin in the common law sense were the parties entitled to succeed, and the case referred only to the point of time at which their interest vested. That case of Ferrier occurred in the year 1876, and in the very same year another case occurred in this Division of the Court in which we had an opportunity of expressing our views on the Act of Parliament, and what was then said was quite in accordance with what had been said in the case of Ferrier. The question in the case of Muir, No. 56. Dec. 10, 1880. Young's Trustees v. James, &c. Nov. 3, 1876, ante, vol. iv. 74, was whether a mother could be confirmed executor as next of kin. The commissary-depute found that "a mother is not one of the next of kin of her children, and that the petitioner is therefore not entitled to be confirmed executor-dative qua one of the next of kin," and he dismissed the petition. Now, we agreed with that finding. I said—"I am not disposed to differ from the commissaries in holding that a mother is not one of the next of kin of her children in a certain sense of the term." But I proceeded to say that the commissaries had dealt too strictly in dismissing the petition, and that if the petitioner was entitled to be confirmed qua mother, they might have allowed the petition to be amended, and have confirmed her as executrix qua mother, and accordingly a remit was made to the commissaries to have her confirmed in that character. This shews that persons called to a share of the succession by the statute are not thereby made next of kin. All this leads to the conclusion that when you find the term "next of kin" or "nearest of kin" in a settlement like this you are to read the words as expressing propinquity of blood; whether nearest according to the precise relation of each individual to the testator, or according to the lines of succession in moveables by the common law of Scotland, is of no consequence in this case, for the nephew who survived the period in question in this case answers both descriptions—he was both nearest in blood to Mrs Young, and by the common law would have succeeded to her moveable estate.

When that question arises, however, it will require consideration, and all the more so that in England the term "next of kin" has been interpreted as meaning nearest in blood, and not according to the lines of succession. That law was very properly referred to as having determined in England this question, or one very like it, viz., the meaning of "next of kin" in a will in reference to the statute of distributions, from which our Act was in great measure copied. The same distinction was there recognised between those specially called to the succession by the statute and the next of kin at common law, and it was decided, after due consideration of the subject, that next of kin in a will meant those nearest in blood to the testator, and not the heirs in mobilibus. That was laid down in the case of Elmsley v. Young (2 My. and K. 82), and afterwards in Withy v. Mangles (10 C. and F. 215), where Lord Cottenham delivered a very full and important judgment on the subject.

On the whole matter I have no doubt here that the parties who are to take the succession are the representatives of the nephew who was the surviving nearest in blood at the death of the survivor of the spouses, and not those who would have been called to the succession by the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

LORD DEAS.—The parties favoured by the residuary clause are the next of kin who shall be alive at the death of the survivor of the spouses, and the question is who the testator meant by these words. This is a question of intention, and all the circumstances are to be taken into account in order to determine who are the favoured parties. I have no doubt that the parties meant to be favoured here were the blood relatives of the testatrix who might be alive at the death of the survivor. In that conclusion I am confirmed by the observations of your Lordship on what has been held in the general case. I therefore concur.

No. 56.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Young's Trustees v. James,

LORD MURE.—The question we have to determine is, who, under the mutual settlement executed in 1852, are to be considered to fall under the words by which the residue is made over to “the nearest in kin of us both who shall be alive at the death of the survivor of us two.” Do these words mean the next of kin in the ordinary common law sense, or do they mean those who are entitled to succeed under the Intestate Succession Act of 1855? I agree with your Lordship that they cannot be held to include parties who are called to the succession by the Act of 1855; because, under the words of that Act, there is a plain distinction between next of kin in the ordinary sense and those who are called to the succession by the operation of the Act. One main object of the Act was to introduce representation in moveables, which did not exist before the Act was passed. The words “next of kin” are very distinctly defined by Mr Erskine (iii. 9, 2), where he says,—“It is a universal rule in the legal succession of moveables that the next in degree of blood to the deceased, or the next of kin, succeeds to the whole, and if there be two or more equally near, all of them succeed by equal parts.” Then he goes on to say,—“The right of representation in heritage by which remoter heirs represent their ascendants has no place in the succession of moveables.” The phrase “next of kin,” therefore, by the law of Scotland, meant the nearest in degree of blood who succeeded to the estate, and there was no representation in moveables. But by the Intestate Succession Act of 1855 the principle of representation was introduced, and a different class of persons called to the succession; so that there is a plain distinction between next of kin in blood and the parties called to the succession by the operation of the Act.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in the opinions delivered. It appears to me to be clear that the term next of kin or nearest of kin, according to the primary and natural sense of the words, means the nearest in blood. Assuming that we are deciding the point for the first time, I have no doubt that the provision here is in favour of the nephew, the nearest relative of the testator. The Lord Ordinary appears to have held the same view, but to have conceived that, in consistency with the authorities to which he refers, and to the opinions of the Judges in former cases, he was bound to include the whole of the heirs in mobilibus, though some of these stood in a remoter degree of relationship to the deceased. Now, I agree in the view which has been expressed by your Lordship in the chair in regard to these cases. In the expression here used, “nearest in kin,” relationship is implied, while in the cases referred to by the Lord Ordinary the expressions used did not refer to relationship in blood, but to succession under the old law. In the case of Connell v. Grierson, Feb. 14, 1867, 5 Macph. 379, there is a very instructive note by Lord Kinloch, which expresses very much my views in the present case. It is true that this Division of the Court recalled his interlocutor, but on the ground that the testator intended by nearest of kindred the nearest blood relation according to the rules of succession in heritage,—still giving the succession to the nearest in blood.

I desire to keep open the question to which your Lordship referred in the concluding part of your opinion, whether, if the nearest blood relation was not the nearest in the line of moveable succession he would still be held to be the next of kin. That question does not arise here, as the nephew who was alive at the opening of the succession was both the nearest in blood to the testatrix and next in line of moveable succession according to the common law.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, in so far as it finds that the half of the residue of the estate of the Rev. Peter Young and Mrs Maitland Young 'destined to the nearest in kin of the said Mrs Maitland M'Culloch or Young alive at the time of the death of the said Peter Young, is payable to the heirs in mobilibus as at that date entitled to succeed ab intestato to the said Mrs Maitland M'Culloch or Young, including not only the said Robert John M'Adam, who died at Montreal on 4th February 1869, but also the children of Mrs Young's deceased nephew, Thomas Thackwray, as coming in place of their father, and also the children of any other nephew or nephews of Mrs Young who may have survived her but predeceased her said husband.' In place thereof, find that said half of the residue, according to the sound construction of the deed of settlement of the spouses, vested at the death of the said Peter Young on 28th September 1864 in the now deceased John Robert M'Adam, being a nephew, and, as such, the sole nearest in kin of the said Mrs Young, then alive, and now belongs to the claimants W. D. B. Janes and others, as his representatives, to the exclusion of the other claimants, Mrs Margaret Harris and others, as representatives of Thomas Thackwray, another nephew of the said Mrs Young who predeceased the said Peter Young: Find the claimants Janes and others entitled to the expenses of the competition against the other claimants, Margaret Harris and others: Allow an account of said expenses to be lodged, and remit," &c.

Succession—Foreign—Destination—English entail of Scotch estate, effect of—Titles to Land Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict.) c. 101, secs. 19 and 20—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict.) c. 94, sec. 46.—An Englishman left a will in the English form by which, inter alia, he devised all such of his lands, &c., situate in the counties of Devon, of Inverness in Scotland, &c., as consisted of "freehold of inheritance," "to the use of my elder son, E. F. S., and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste, and after the death of the said E. F. S. to the use of the first and every other son of the said E. F. S. successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail male, with remainder to the use of," &c. It was admitted that this was a valid settlement "in tail male" of the English estates, according to the law of England. Under a subsequent clause E. F. S. took, as residuary devisee or legatee, all property not otherwise disposed of. He was also the testator's heir-at-law.

The testator left an estate in Inverness-shire held of a subject-superior. E. F. S. claimed this estate as conveyed to him absolutely by the above clause, the destination not being such as by the law of Scotland imported any restriction or limitation of his right, or, alternatively, as forming part of the residue, or as intestate succession. His claim was opposed on behalf of his pupil children.

The parties agreed, by minute, on an interpretation of the meaning and effect, according to the law of England, of the terms used by the testator in the above clause. According to this interpretation the Inverness-shire estate would have been a "freehold of inheritance" had it been situated in England, and the incidents of an English settlement in tail male following on a tenancy for life, as therein described, were, in the opinion of the majority of the Court, substantially the same as those of a Scotch conveyance in liferent allanarly and in fee, with a simple destination to the heirs-male of the body of the fiar, subject to this condition, that the fiar should take no disposable estate till the death of the liferenter. Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill) (1) that under the Titles to Land Act, 1868, sec. 20, the testator's will was to receive effect according to its true import and effect with reference to heritable estate, to the same extent as with reference to moveable estate; (2) that that import and effect were ascertainable by means of the interpretation afforded by the parties, and could be carried out substantially, without inconsistency with the practice or with the policy of the law of Scotland, by giving the pursuer a liferent allanarly, and the heir-male of his body a fee (postponing vesting of the fee during the pursuer's life), with a destination over to the other substitutes; (3) that a registrable title, in accordance with such true intent and meaning, fell to be made up under the said Act and the Conveyancing Act, 1874; and (4) claim of E. F. S. repelled.

The Lord Justice-Clerk, in dissenting, held that the intention of the testator was to make an English entail of a Scotch property, that there was no equivalent in the land laws of Scotland for an English entail, and that to sustain the defenders' contention would be to authorise land in Scotland to be held in a manner which the law of Scotland did not recognise.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, did not place bequests of land on the same footing as bequests of moveables, to be carried into effect according to the intention of the testator as gathered from his testamentary deed, a registrable title being made up, if necessary, by the execution of a conveyance or other deed in conformity with that intention, but merely made a bequest of lands (in words which would have been, prior to the passing of the Act, habile to convey moveables only) equivalent to a general disposition of lands, on which a title could be made up as upon a general disposition; that, therefore, conditions and qualifications must enter the record precisely as they were contained in the testamentary deed which was to be equivalent to a general disposition, and could have no effect, by reason of the testator's intention merely, if they were incompatible with the land laws of Scotland.

Ld. Curriehill.

MAJOR-GENERAL EDWARD MORTLOCK STUDD, of Oxtou, Devon, was a domiciled Englishman, possessed of large property, both real and personal, in England, and of the estate of Banchor in Inverness-shire.

General Studd died in 1877, leaving a last will in the English form, whereby he appointed his widow, Emma Beatrice Bayly or Studd, and others, his trustees, and, inter alia, made a settlement in tail male of his real property in the following terms:—"I devise all such and such parts of my manors, messuages, lands, and hereditaments, situate in the counties of Devon, of Inverness in Scotland, of Stafford, and of Warwick, and of my estates called The Four Dwellings, The Quinton, and The Farm at 'Bell End,' whether in Worcestershire or Staffordshire, or elsewhere, as consist of freehold of inheritance (which several hereditaments are hereinafter called 'Edward's Freehold Estate') to the use of my elder son, Edward Fairfax Studd, and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste, and after the death of the said Edward Fairfax Studd to the use of the first and every other son of the said Edward Fairfax Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail male, with remainder to the use of my trustees during the life of my younger son, Alnod Earnest Studd, upon the same trusts as hereinafter declared concerning the real estate next hereinafter devised to my trustees, and called 'Alnod's Freehold Estate,' and after the death of the said Alnod Earnest Studd, to the use of the first and every other son of the said Alnod Earnest Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail male, with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of the said Edward Fairfax Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail, with remainder to the use of the first and every other daughter of the said Edward Fairfax Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail, with remainder to the first and every other son of the said Alnod Earnest Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail, with remainder to the first and every other daughter of the said Alnod Earnest Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail, with remainder to the use of my said wife and her assigns during her life or until she shall marry again, without impeachment of waste, and after her death or marriage, to the use of Marie Von Linsingen and Augusta Linsingen (the two daughters of my nephew, Count Linsingen of Hanover), and the child or children of the Reverend William Collett, of Hawstead, in the county of Suffolk, by his late wife, my niece, formerly Cecil Augusta Linsingen, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common, in equal shares." Studd v. Studd, &c.

By subsequent clauses General Studd farther devised his copyhold property, and bequeathed his leasehold property in the same counties "upon such trusts, and with and subject to such powers, provisoes, and declarations as shall correspond with the uses, trusts, powers, provisoes, and declarations hereinbefore limited and declared of and concerning Edward's freehold estate, as nearly as the different tenures and quality of the hereditaments and rules of law and equity will permit."

By a further clause in his will General Studd devised and bequeathed all property, of whatever description, "not otherwise disposed of by this my will," to the use of his trustees upon trust, that they might realise the same, pay his debts and legacies, and provide for annuities, and stand possessed of the residue "in trust for the said Edward Fairfax Studd, his executors, administrators, and assigns;" and added,—“And I declare that my trustees shall have the fullest powers of determining what property passes under any specific devise or bequest contained in this my will, or any codicil hereto, and of apportioning blended trust-funds, and of determining whether any monies are to be treated as capital or income, and generally of determining all matters as to which any doubt, difficulty, or question may arise under or in relation to the exercise of the powers, or the execution of the trusts of this my will, or any codicil hereto.”

Under this will the question arose how the estate of Banchor in Inverness-shire, which was the only heritable property of any description held by the testator in that or any other county in Scotland, fell to be dealt with.

The debts and legacies left by General Studd had all been paid, and the annuities provided for.

Edward Fairfax Studd was the eldest son and heir-at-law of his father, General Studd.

The estate of Banchor was held of the Earl of Moray as superior thereof.

Edward Fairfax Studd claimed the estate absolutely in fee, without any restriction or limitation of his right, on these three separate grounds :—(1) That such was the result of the destination ; (2) and separatim, that it fell into residue ; or (3) fell into intestacy.

He accordingly raised an action of declarator against his father's trustees, against his own pupil children, Edward Arthur Studd and Gladys Studd, and against the other tenants in tail and remainder men under his father's settlement. He concluded for decree of declarator that the lands of Banchor, with the teinds thereof, "have vested in the pursuer in fee absolutely, and without any restriction or limitation whatsoever, in virtue of the conveyance or destination thereof contained in the said last will and testament of his father, the said Edward Mortlock Studd :” Or otherwise, and alternatively, that they fell "under the residuary clause contained in the said last will, whereby the said trustees are directed to hold the whole property of every description "not otherwise disposed of by the said last will or any codicil thereto in trust, after payment of certain debts, legacies, and annuities, for the pursuer, his executors, administrators, and assigns; and that all the testator's debts, and the legacies and annuities left by him, having been paid or provided for, the pursuer is now entitled to the same absolutely: Or otherwise, and alternatively," "that the said Edward Mortlock Studd died intestate quoad the said lands and the teinds thereof, and that the right to the same has now vested in the pursuer as his heir-at-law."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The devise or conveyance of such of the testator's manors, messuages, lands, and hereditaments, situate in the county of Inverness, as consist of freehold of inheritance, being habile and sufficient to carry the said estate of Banchor, with the teinds thereof, the destination thereof is not such as by the law of Scotland imports any restriction or limitation of the pursuer's right, and he is therefore entitled thereunder to the said estate absolutely in fee; or (2) separatim, the language of the said special devise or conveyance being incapable of interpretation according to the law of Scotland, the said estate of Banchor, with the teinds thereof, falls to be dealt with as part of the residue of the testator's estate, and the pursuer is entitled thereto under the residuary bequest in his favour contained in the said will; or (3) separatim, the said estate of Banchor and the teinds thereof are intestate succession of the said deceased Edward Mortlock Studd, and fall to the pursuer as his heir-at-law.

The defenders appeared, and pleaded;—(1) The defenders, the trustees of the late General Studd, are bound, under the provisions of his last will, to make up a title in their own names to the estate of Banchor, with the teinds thereof, and thereafter to execute a deed of strict entail, settling the estate on the series of heirs prescribed in the said last will; or (2) separatim, the right of the pursuer in the estate of Banchor, with the teinds thereof, being limited by the terms of the said last will to a right of liferent only, he is not entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (3) The terms of the special devise or conveyance of the lands in Inverness-shire being effectual to convey the estate of Banchor, it does not fall to be dealt with under the residuary clause of the will, or as part of the testator's intestate succession.

To obviate a remit to the Court in England or to English counsel the parties lodged a minute in which they stated that they were agreed that, according to the law of England—"First, the term 'freehold of inheritance' denotes an estate or right in lands which (as is the case with all lands in England) are held in fee of the Crown, or of a subject superior (to the exclusion of copyholds and leaseholds), and such that the estate or right is not merely for life or a term of years, but on the death of the holder, without having exercised such power of disposition as the law allows him, will descend to his heir general or to the heir of his body, according as the estate is a fee-simple or an estate tail.

"Second, The devise of 'Edward's freehold estate' 'to the use of my eldest son, Edward Fairfax Studd, and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste,' contained in the clause of Major-General Edward Mortlock Studd's will, above quoted—(1) conferred upon the pursuer, at the testator's death, an estate for life, without the intervention of trustees; and the incidents of that estate are generally—(2) that, as such tenant for life, the pursuer is entitled to possession, both natural and civil; and by virtue of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, section 46 (re-enacting the provisions of an earlier Act), he can of his own authority let leases for agriculture or occupation (subject to conditions imposed by the Act), for a period not exceeding twenty-one years; (3) that in virtue of the clause 'without impeachment of waste,' he may cut timber in a husbandmanlike manner for his own benefit, and open mines, quarries, and the like, as well as work existing ones, and permit build-ings, fences, and the like to dilapidate with impunity, but may not wantonly pull down houses or fell ornamental timber, or commit other injury of a like nature; and (4) that he is entitled to convey away or assign absolutely his life estate, and that it can be attached by his creditors, and on bankruptcy or liquidation by arrangement his life estate passes to his trustee in bankruptcy or liquidation. Dec. 10, 1880.

Studd, &c.

"Third, the devise contained in the same clause,—'After the death of the said Edward Fairfax Studd, to the use of the first and every other son of the said Edward Fairfax Studd successively, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of my trustees during the life of my younger son, Alnod Ernest Studd,' &c.—(1) Confers upon the eldest or only son of the pursuer, on the birth of such son, a vested estate or interest, as tenant in tail male, which will take effect in possession on the death of Edward Fairfax Studd, unless such estate in tail male has previously come to an end by the death of the son without leaving issue male. This estate cannot be disappointed by the act of the pursuer or by his creditors. The second and every subsequent son of Edward Fairfax Studd takes a like estate, but always in remainder expectant on the death and failure of issue male of the elder son or sons; and on failure of all sons and their issue male, the trustees of General Studd take an interest for the life of Alnod Ernest Studd. (2) On any son of the pursuer attaining the age of twenty-one years he will be in a position (subject and without prejudice to the estates and interests prior to his own) to bar the entail, i.e., to disentail by the execution of a deed (which must be enrolled in Chancery). Such deed will be effectual not only against his own issue, but also against the remainder men or substitutes, if the deed be executed after the death of the pursuer, or if the pursuer be a consenting party thereto. But if executed in the lifetime of the pursuer without his consent, it will only be effectual to bar the issue of the party executing it. (3) On the pursuer's death the first tenant in tail male, whoever he may then be, will be entitled to possession, and at or after twenty-one years of age will be in a position by his own deed alone to bar the entail to all effects, so far as he may not previously have done so. (4) That if the entail be not barred by the tenant in tail it will descend on his death to his heir in tail male,—that is to say, his eldest son or the issue male of such eldest son, such son or issue taking by descent, and not as a beneficiary named by General Studd. (5) That an estate in tail male or in tail can be made available by creditors for payment of the debts of the tenant in tail, whether in expectancy or in possession, to the same extent as he himself could dispose of it for his own benefit."

The Lord Ordinary, on 9th July 1880, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that according to the sound construction of the last will of the deceased Major-General Edward Mortlock Studd of Oxtou, in the county of Devon, dated 21st April 1877, and codicil thereto, dated 14th November 1877, the lands of Banchor, in Inverness-shire, belonging to the testator at the time of his death, were destined by him to his eldest son, Edward Fairfax Studd, and to the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to the testator's trustees during the life of the testator's younger son, Alnod Ernest Studd, and after his death to the heirs-male of the body of the said Alnod Ernest Studd; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said Edward Fairfax Studd; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said Alnod Ernest Studd; whom failing, to certain other persons named: Finds (2) that the said bequest imports a right of fee in said lands in the person of the said Edward Fairfax Studd: Therefore decerns and declares in terms of the first conclusion of the summons: Dismisses the other conclusions of the action, and decerns," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The difficulty in the present case arises from the not uncommon practice of a person ignorant of the rules regulating the conveyance of real property in one country attempting to settle such property by means of an instrument prepared according to the rules of another country in which the rules of conveyancing are entirely different.

"The late General Studd was proprietor of estates in various counties in England, and also of the estate of Banchor in Inverness-shire, in Scotland, the succession to all of which he regulated, or attempted to regulate, by his last will and testament, which is in the English form, and is dated 21st April 1877, and codicil thereto, dated 14th November 1877. Although by that will he appointed trustees, he did not devise these estates to the trustees, but he devised them directly to his eldest son, Edward Fairfax Studd, and other parties, in the following terms, viz."—(quotes clause, recited supra).

"Now, the first question that is raised in the record is whether the estate of Banchor is truly and within the sense of this settlement a 'freehold of inheritance.' This is a technical English term; but the parties have concurred in stating, in the joint minute, No. 13 of process, that its meaning by the law of England is 'an estate or right in lands, which (as is the case with all lands in England) are held in fee of the Crown, or of a subject-superior (to the exclusion of copyholds and leaseholds), and such that the estate or right is not merely for life, or a term of years, but on the death of the holder, without having exercised such power of disposition as the law allows him, will descend to his heir general or the heir of his body, according as the estate is a fee-simple or an estate tail.' The estate of Banchor, with the teinds thereof, was acquired and held by General Studd in fee-simple, and by the ordinary feudal tenure of land in Scotland, and I have therefore no hesitation in holding that it passed under the devise as a 'freehold of inheritance.' And if I had had any doubt upon the point, it would have been removed by the fact, that the trustees of the will have the fullest powers of determining what property should pass under any specific devise or bequest in the settlement, and have in the record expressly declared that they hold the estate of Banchor to have been effectually carried by the devise now under consideration. But a much more important and difficult question is whether the estate passed under this devise to Edward Fairfax Studd as his absolute property, or is devised to him merely as tenant for life, and after his death to the other persons specified in the will, as under a settlement of strict entail. And he has brought the present action for the purpose of having it judicially declared that the subjects in question are vested in him in fee absolutely and without any restriction or limitation whatsoever. The parties who are called as defenders are the trustees of the will, and his own pupil children, to whom a curator ad litem has been appointed.

"These defenders stated in the record a plea to the effect that the devise is truly a devise to the trustees, and that they are bound, under the provisions of the will, to make up a title in their own names to the estate of Banchor, and thereafter to execute a deed of strict entail thereof, settling it on the series of heirs described in the will. But the defenders now admit in the joint minute (No. 13 of process), that the estate passed under the devise to Edward Fairfax Studd and the other heirs, without the intervention of the trustees. The other plea stated by them, and which is now to be disposed of, is to the effect that whatever may be the nature of the ulterior destination the right of Edward Fairfax Studd is strictly limited to a right of life. In support of this plea it is urged that the will must be construed according to the law of England, and that the same effect must be given to the devise of the Scotch estate of Banchor as would be given by the Courts of England to the devise of the estates in that country. Now, there seems to be no doubt, and indeed the parties are agreed, that by the will the English estates are virtually settled in the terms of a strict entail, that is to say, that they pass in the first instance to Edward Fairfax Studd as tenant for life, or, as we should term it, for his liferent use alienably, but with more extensive powers of administration than are usually enjoyed by a liferenter in this country; and after his death to the heirs-male of his body in succession, whom failing to the parties specified in their order, all under the rules of strict entail according to the law of England.

"Now, I need hardly say that an entail of lands in Scotland cannot be constituted, according to the law of this country, except in strict compliance with the statutory rules which regulate entails. It is true that, where an estate is conveyed to trustees, with directions to them to entail it upon a certain series of heirs, the trustees would be bound to obey these directions, and to impose upon the beneficiaries under the trust the fetters of a strict entail, although the settlement containing these directions does not, in the general case, specify the restrictions, and is not itself prepared in the form of a deed of entail. But where, without the intervention of a trust, the estate is directly conveyed either inter vivos or mortis causa to a series of heirs, it will, although effectual as a conveyance of land, be wholly ineffectual as an entail, unless the prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses required by the entail statutes are expressed at length in the deed, or unless under the provisions of recent legislation the conveyance contains a clause expressly authorising registration of the entail in the Register of Tailies. Now, there is nothing of that kind in the present case, and the will is wholly inoperative as an entail of the estate of Banchor; and whatever may be held to be the nature of the right to that estate conferred by the will upon Edward Fairfax Studd and his sons, and the other parties called to the succession, it is not a right which is limited by the fetters of a Scotch entail.

"But it is said that it is apparent upon the face of the will that, whatever effect may be given to other parts of the devise, the only right which Edward Fairfax Studd was intended by his father to take under this will was a right of liferent, 'without impeachment of waste,' the effect of the addition of these words being, according to the admission of parties, to confer upon him various extensive powers of administration. These are stated in the joint minute to be, inter alia, power to take possession of the estate, both natural and civil, to let leases for agricultural occupation for twenty-one years, to cut down timber in a husbandmanlike manner for his own benefit, and open mines, quarries, and the like, as well as work existing ones, and permit buildings, fences, and the like to dilapidate with impunity, but not wantonly to pull down houses, or fell ornamental timber, or commit other injury of a like nature.

"Now, assuming this to be the true construction of the devise according to the law of England, the question to be decided is whether this Court is bound to give effect to that construction, or is entitled to construe the terms of the will as if it had been a Scotch instrument settling the succession of the Scotch estate. I am of opinion that, as the subject is a landed estate in Scotland, it must be construed with reference to the rules of conveyancing in operation in Scotland. I think this doctrine is pretty clearly recognised in the cases of Weir, 1 S. 192, and of Mitchell and Baxter, 2 Ret. 208. And it humbly appears to me that if this devise is read with the aid of the explanation of its technical terms contained in the joint minute, it simply resolves itself into a conveyance or bequest of Banchor by General Studd to his eldest son, Edward Fairfax Studd, in liferent, and the heirs-male of his body in fee, and thereafter to a series of heirs, subject to the restrictions of an English entail, to which, as I have explained, effect cannot be given in this country. But, according to a long series of decisions from the case of Newland, such a destination to A and his children, born and to be born, but unnamed, even although followed by a destination to other parties, truly imports a fee in A, although the interposition of a trust might have the effect of restricting A to a bare liferent. Upon that Argued for the curator;—(1) Though not itself an entail according to the law of Scotland, the testator's devise was equivalent to a direction to entail, and must receive effect. The trustees were bound to make up a title under the Conveyancing Acts, and then execute a strict entail in favour of the series of heirs contained in the devise. (2) If this was not the case, then the testator's intention must be ascertained, and must receive effect. By the 20th section * of the Titles to Land (Scotland) point I think it only necessary to refer to the case of Macintosh v. Gordon, 4 Bell's App. 105, as contrasted with the case of Rose v. King, 9 D. 1327, and to the earlier case of Seton, Mor. 4219, as contrasted with Robertson, Mor. Fiar, Absolute and Limited, App. 2.

"But it is maintained that although such is the rule now universally applied in Scotland in interpreting destinations in these terms, it will not be extended to cases where it clearly appears from other considerations that the testator meant to limit the right of the father to a bare liferent, or at all events to something considerably less than a right of fee. Now, undoubtedly, it may be said that in the present case General Studd obviously intended and expected that the same effect would be given to his wishes regarding his Scotch estates as he knew would be given to them as regards his English estates, and as Edward Fairfax Studd was undoubtedly to be limited to a liferent in England as regards the English estates, he should not have any higher right in the Scotch estates. But I do not think that that is the sound view of the case. The parties have admitted that the will of General Studd contemplated a deed of strict entail of the whole of these estates, not only upon Edward Fairfax Studd as tenant for life, but also upon the heirs-male of his body, and the other parties specified. Yet it is quite certain that so far as the entail is concerned the will cannot receive effect in Scotland, and to that extent at all events the will of General Studd cannot receive effect. But if I were to hold that Edward Fairfax Studd is merely to take a right of liferent, then on his death the heirs of his body would, contrary to the will of General Studd, take the estate in fee-simple. Now, this would, I think, be making for General Studd a will entirely different from that which he clearly intended to make. How is it possible for this Court to say that if General Studd had contemplated such a result in the case of his grandsons he would still have limited his son to a bare liferent? It therefore appears to me that it would be a mistake to construe one part of this devise according to the English rules, and the remainder according to our own rules—and that, on the whole, the only safe and satisfactory course to follow in dealing with this devise of a landed estate in Scotland is to construe the whole according to the well-known rules of Scotch conveyancing, and to hold that it is truly a destination of the estate to the pursuer in liferent, and to the heirs of his body in fee, whereby he is entitled to the fee of the property. He will thus obtain decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons; and as in consequence the other conclusions become unnecessary, these may be dismissed."

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 20.—"From and after the commencement of this Act it shall be competent to any owners of lands to settle the succession to the same in the event of his death, not only by conveyance de presenti, according to the existing law and practice, but likewise by testamentary or mortis causa deeds or writings, and no testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing purporting to convey or bequeath lands which shall have been granted by any person alive at the commencement of this Act, or which shall be granted by any person after the commencement of this Act, shall be held to be invalid as a settlement of the lands to which such deed or writing applies on the ground that the grantor has not used with reference to such lands the word 'dispose,' or other word or words importing a conveyance de presenti; and where such deed or writing shall not be expressed in the terms required by the existing law or practice for the conveyance of lands, but shall contain, with reference to such lands, any word or words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor of the grantor, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables, a right to claim and receive the Act, 1868, the testator's intention expressed in a testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing with respect to heritage was to receive effect just as a similar intention expressed with respect to moveables always had received effect. The testator's intention having been ascertained, it was incumbent on the trustees to carry it out, provided it was not inconsistent with the policy of Scotch law, and this they were enabled to do not only by the Act of 1868 itself, but also more expressly by the 46th section * of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. (3) Now, the intention of the testator was to place his Scotch estate in exactly the same position as his English estate. From the minute lodged by the parties it was apparent that the incidents of the English entail¹ which the testator had made were exactly similar in all substantial points to a Scotch liferent allennary, the vesting of the fee being postponed during the liferenter's life, and a fiduciary fee being vested in the meantime in the person of the liferenter.² This being the case, what was to hinder the testator's intention receiving effect? Certainly not the difficulty of carrying it into execution. For the 46th section of the Act of 1874 provided machinery whereby the trustees might adapt the registrable conveyance, which it was incumbent on them to grant, exactly to the testator's intention as interpreted in the joint minute. They might even express in the conveyance to be granted all the conditions and limitations which it was there said that an English entail imported, and yet the deed of conveyance would contain nothing inconsistent with a Scotch liferent allennary in the terms above-mentioned. The reclaimers were therefore entitled to be assoilized from the conclusions of the action, and it should be left to the trustees to grant a conveyance, or to the pursuer, if he chose, without the intervention of the trustees, to make up a title in conformity with the testator's intention.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) There were no directions to entail, and, moreover, it was admitted that the devise, according to English law, was effectual without the intervention of the trustees; an entail in the sense understood in Scotland was therefore out of the question. (2) The devise did not import a liferent allanarly and a fee with substitutions. Prior to 1868 this question could not have arisen. By the 20th section of the Act of that year any deed or writing duly executed containing with reference to lands words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer on the grantee of such moveables a right to receive the same, shall be "taken to be equivalent to a general disposition of such lands within the meaning of the 19th section hereof by the granter of such deed or writing in favour of the grantee thereof." The devise contained in General Studd's will was therefore equivalent to a general disposition in favour of the respondent and the series of heirs named after him, whatever the meaning and effect of the destination might be. It was a misreading of the statute to suppose that anything else than the testamentary deed or writing was requisite to make a registrable title. That deed was made the equivalent of a general disposition, and upon it a title might be made up as upon a general disposition by notarial instrument in the ordinary way. The testator's will was therefore itself the conveyance, and it was not the case that the trustees or any one else were to find out what the intention of the testator was, and grant a registrable conveyance or make up a registrable title other than the will itself, for the purpose of carrying that intention into effect as nearly as the law and practice of Scotland would admit. Farther, the 46th section of the Act of 1874 had no application. The intervention of the trustees was not necessary, and would be contrary to the conception of the testator's deed, for admittedly the devise was one directly in favour of the respondent without the intervention of the trustees. (3) The devise then being equivalent to a general disposition, the real question was, could the destination contained in it receive any effect in Scotland? The Lord Ordinary had held that it was to receive effect so far as it was a destination known to Scotch law, but that conditions and restrictions, powers and relaxations proper to the law of entail in England, appended to it directly or by implication, could receive no effect, and therefore that the destination was nothing more than a liferent to a father and a fee to his eldest son nasciturus, which, as occurring in a conveyance of Scotch heritage, imported a fee to the father. Either this construction must be given to the terms of the destination, or it must be held void from uncertainty, in the sense of inapplicability to the system of the Scotch land laws. The intention of the testator was to make an entail of his Scotch estate, which should have all the effect of the entail which he had made of his English estate. It was maintained on the other side that though this was not possible a liferent allanarly and a fee postponed till the death of the liferenter was substantially the equivalent in Scotland for an English entail. But a comparison of the incidents of an English entail and a Scotch liferent allanarly at once disclosed how untenable this proposition was. The incidents of an English entail all arose by virtue of statute. The constitution of the entail itself depended on statute, and the limitations as well as the relaxations all depended on statutes, and on a very complicated series of statutes indeed of a similar nature to the entail statutes in Scotland. The incidents of a Scotch No. 57.

 liferent allanarly all depended, on the other hand, on the common law of Scotland. To say that the position of an English tenant for life, whose every act depended for its validity on English statutes, was the same as Dec. 10, 1880.
 Studd v.
 Studd, &c.
 that of a Scotch liferenter allanarly was preposterous. Moreover, all that was attempted to be said was that a liferent allanarly was the nearest substitute which could be found in Scotland for an English entail. The identity of the two destinations was not maintained. To sustain the reclaimers' contention would therefore be not to carry out the testator's intention, but only to go as near it as the land laws of Scotland would admit. The testator's intention was clearly to make an English entail of a Scotch estate. That being admittedly impossible, the reclaimers were for doing something quite different, of which the testator had never dreamt. The best illustration that could be given was to suppose matters reversed, and that a Scotchman had included an English estate in a conveyance in liferent allanarly of Scotch property, or in a Scotch strict entail—would the Courts in England entertain for one moment the proposition that they were to inquire what the incidents of these estates were, and substitute for them the nearest equivalent known to the law of real property in England? Either therefore the Lord Ordinary's judgment was right and ought to be affirmed, or the destination could receive no effect, as inapplicable to the law of heritable property in Scotland.¹ (4) If so, then the estate fell into residue or intestacy, in either of which cases the respondent was entitled to decree under the alternative conclusions of his summons.

At advising,—

LORD GIFFORD.—This is an interesting case, involving the consideration of principles which have a very wide and general application. In particular, it involves the question how far the law of Scotland, dealing with heritable estates in Scotland, will give effect to an English will devising or disposing of Scotch heritage, and settling it as an English estate tail might be settled so as to carry out in Scotland as nearly as possible, and by means of appropriate Scotch deeds, whatever can be shewn from the will to have been the real intention of the testator in reference to his heritable estate in Scotland, such intention not being contrary to the law of Scotland, or such as the law of Scotland will refuse to recognise or enforce.

In the present case the Lord Ordinary has so far given effect to the late General Studd's English will as to hold that it effectually conveyed his Scotch estates of Banchor and others in Inverness-shire to his eldest son, Edward Fairfax Studd, the present pursuer, but he has refused to give effect to the English will in so far as it imposed or might be held to impose limitations or conditions upon that conveyance, and although such limitations or conditions would have been quite effectual if the estate of Banchor had been situated in England.
 Accordingly the Lord Ordinary has pronounced decree of declarator finding that the pursuer, Edward Fairfax Studd, is under his father's will absolute and fee-simple proprietor of the said estates of Banchor and others, and that "without any restriction or limitation whatsoever;" that consequently he may dispose of these estates at pleasure, either onerously or gratuitously, and may disappoint all hopes of succession thereto which either his own children or his brother

Studd v.
Studd, &c.

Alnod Ernest Studd, or his issue, or the other persons named in General Studd's will, might have had to the said Scotch estates. The Lord Ordinary has reached this conclusion, although he assumes that it is contrary to the intention of the late General Studd as expressed in his last will and testament, and this on the ground that the rules affecting the conveyance of Scotch heritage do not admit of effect being given to the limitations and conditions which General Studd intended should be applicable to his Scotch as well as his English estates.

The result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment is that while the pursuer, Edward Fairfax Studd, must take the heritable estates in England devised to him by his father's will under all the conditions, restrictions, and limitations provided by the will, yet he takes the estate of Banchor and others in Inverness-shire, Scotland, free from those conditions, restrictions, and limitations, although he takes the estate in Scotland as well as in England under the same will and under the same words of the same will, and although his father, the testator, intended that the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations should apply to the estates in Scotland as to the estates in England. Thus the pursuer would take the estates in Scotland under his father's will, and yet might defeat his father's intention in relation to these estates, while he must give effect to the father's intention in relation to the English estates. The father's will will receive effect as to the lands in England devised to the pursuer, while as to the lands in Scotland the devise will be effectual, but the conditions upon which it is made will be disregarded and will receive no effect.

Now, I do not say that a result like this may not sometimes be inevitable, for conditions or restrictions which are lawful in one country may sometimes be unlawful in another, or they may not have been effectually imposed according to law, or there may be no machinery applicable or appropriate in Scotland for enforcing conditions which may be easily rendered effectual in England. There may possibly be such cases, but I think I may say that a result like this is always to be regretted, and should only be admitted if it can be shewn to be inevitable. A Court of equity (and in the interpretation and carrying out of wills and of mortis causa settlements, equity and the effectuation of the true intention of the testator is always a paramount consideration) will always be unwilling to refuse effect to what is plainly a testator's intention, reasonable and legal in itself, and it will be especially averse (the testator's words being the same) to give one effect to these words in Scotland and a different effect to the same words in England, according as the estates devised are situated in the one country or in the other.

Now, I am of opinion that in the present case the result reached by the Lord Ordinary is not inevitable. I think that the will of the late General Studd, according to its true import and meaning, can be given effect to in Scotland, and in reference to the Scotch heritable estate, in the same way as it will receive effect in England in regard to the English heritable estates—that in both countries the legal will of the testator can be made effectual in nearly the same degree, and with substantially the same result, although it may be that appropriate deeds or procedure may be required according to the conveyancing rules of the two countries, so that the pursuer Edward Fairfax Studd shall hold and shall be required to hold the estate of Banchor and others in Inverness-shire on substantially the same terms, and in substance under the same limitations and conditions as he holds the English estates in Devonshire, in Staffordshire, and elsewhere, consisting of “freehold of inheritance,” all which estates, both in Scotland and in England, are devised to him in the same words, and by the same breath, and with the same intention under his father's will. No. 57.

I have therefore come to be of opinion, and latterly without very much difficulty, that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be recalled so far as it gives the pursuer an absolute and unlimited fee in the lands of Banchor and others, "without any restriction or limitation whatsoever," and that instead thereof it should be declared that the pursuer has only right to the said estate for his own different use only, and after his death the same to descend to the other parties called in General Studd's will, and in the manner therein mentioned. There may be, and there is some nicety in expressing in the language of Scottish conveyancing the precise legal effect which is attained in England by the words of General Studd's will, but I have no doubt it can be done so as to place the Scotch estates in substantially the same position as the English ones. This will carry out the true intention of the testator, and as there is no illegality in that intention—nothing contrary either to law or to statute, and nothing unreasonable or even unusual—I think this is what must be done. Dec. 10, 1880. Studd v. Studd, &c.

The steps by which I reach the conclusion now indicated may be stated in a very few words.

Prior to the passing of "The Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868," the last will of General Studd, now before us, would not have carried heritable estate in Scotland, and General Studd would have been held, so far as his Scottish real estates were concerned, to have died intestate. The Act of 1868, however, in accordance with the clearest principles of equity and expediency, altered this, and provided (section 20) that no de presenti words, or words of conveyancing style, shall be necessary in mortis causa deeds of settlement, and that every testamentary writing purporting to convey or bequeath lands in Scotland shall be effectual, provided that it is executed and expressed in a manner sufficient to convey or bequeath moveables. I am expressing the clause shortly, instead of quoting its somewhat anxious provisions. I think in reference to wills it puts heritage on precisely the same footing as moveables, it being always shewn that this was the intention of the testator. Now, in virtue of this enactment, and without the aid of the broader and more comprehensive provisions of "The Conveyancing Scotland Act, 1874," I am of opinion that the last will of General Studd is amply sufficient validly to settle the testator's estate of Banchor in Inverness-shire, Scotland, quite as effectually as it validly settles his other estates in England, which are devised to his eldest son and the heirs and others substituted to him in manner therein mentioned. I think this is the very meaning of the enactment of 1868. It expressly provides that "it shall be competent to any owner of lands" (that is of land and real estate in Scotland) "to settle the succession to the same in the event of his death, not only by conveyances de presenti according to the existing law and practice, but likewise by testamentary or mortis causa deeds or writings," and then it proceeds to describe what wills shall be sufficient to carry heritage, the substance being, as I have already said, that provided only intention be clear, a deed that would settle moveables in Scotland may settle heritage also. I hold it clear, therefore, that General Studd's will effectually settles his heritable estate in Scotland.

The next question is, how, and in what manner, to what effect, and with what legal consequences, does General Studd's will settle his Scotch estates? Now, here I think the only difficulty is that General Studd in his will has used only English technical terms, having, as I understand it to be admitted, a precise and

No. 57.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Studd v.
Studd, &c.

definite technical meaning and effect in England, but which words are not technically used and have not a known and definite technical meaning in Scotland, and as applicable to Scottish real estate. There seems to be no doubt whatever that General Studd in his will used these technical and legal words in their strict and technical legal sense according to the law of England, and read in that country as such they have a perfectly definite and legal meaning and effect. So read, and read with the effect which the law of England would give to them, they convey with definiteness, and with accuracy, General Studd's true intention and meaning, and it appears to me that if this be so, all that the law of Scotland has to do in reference to the Inverness-shire estate is to carry that meaning and intention into effect so far as it can possibly be done, unless it can be shewn to be contrary to law or statute, or opposed to the policy of the law of Scotland.

In other words, all that the Courts of Scotland need in order to enable them to carry out General Studd's will, in reference to his Inverness-shire estates, is a translation of the technical words of the will, so that the Court may be informed of their true meaning and effect. When this is obtained the Court will then consider, first, whether there is anything illegal in the will so translated, and second, if not, how it is to be expressed in Scotch conveyancing language so as to complete the title to the lands and enter the records of real rights.

We might have obtained a translation of the technical words of General Studd's will from English counsel or from English Courts under statutory provisions made for that purpose, but in the present case the parties themselves, by the joint minute No. 13 of process, have given us the translation required. They have agreed as to what the technical meaning, according to the law of England, is of the technical words used in the will, and also as to the legal effect which such words have according to the law of England, and I am of opinion that this joint minute is enough to enable us to effectuate the will in Scotland according to its true intent and meaning. For according to the law of Scotland there is nothing illegal or incompetent in the wishes and intentions of General Studd so reached and so explained. He merely wished to settle his estates in Scotland according to the same tailzied settlement and destination which he applied to his estates in England. The joint minute makes it clear what sort of settlement he has effectually made of his English estate. There is nothing illegal in making a similar settlement in Scotland if only it can be done by appropriate words. I think the appropriate words may be found by the exercise of reasonable care and discrimination, and possibly by the use of certain declarations and conditions which may be expressed with greater or with less detail, but when so expressed I think it is impossible to say that they will be illegal or incompetent, or in any degree contrary to the spirit and policy of the law of Scotland. It is impossible to say that a proprietor of lands in Scotland cannot legally settle his estate in the same way and with substantially the same effect as he might settle an estate tail in England. In truth there is not very great difference in substance and in effect between the law of England and the law of Scotland in regard to the powers of entailing lands. The difference is very wide as to the modes in which entails must be made, and how and according to what forms lands are to be entailed or disentailed, but when we consider not form, but substance, the differences are by no means great, and I should be very sorry indeed to be compelled to hold that a proprietor who wished his Scotch estate to descend under the same tailied destination with his English one, and distinctly expressed his wishes in his will made in England, could not possibly accomplish his purpose.

No. 57.
Dec. 10, 1880.
Studd v.
Studd, &c.

In the present case I read the last will of General Studd simply as his last will, that is, simply as the last expression of his wishes and desires in reference to his estates both in England and in Scotland. I am of opinion that such expression of desire or of will is effectual to settle his Scotch heritage, and I think that there is nothing to prevent this expression of will or of desire from receiving effect. I think that we can give the will effect, and that we should do so. I should regard it as a misfortune if we found ourselves compelled to defeat and disappoint the will instead of carrying it out.

The present declarator raises sharply in its first conclusion the main question in which the pursuer is chiefly interested, namely, whether under his father's will the pursuer is absolute fiar of the Scotch estate of Banchor, that is, out and out proprietor, without any restriction or limitation whatsoever, and whether as such he may dispose of it at pleasure, either onerously or gratuitously by himself alone, and without the consent of any other party whatever. The other conclusions are alternative, and I think do not apply. Now, I decline to give the pursuer decree in terms of his first conclusion, because I think that that is and would be directly contrary to the father's will, under which alone the pursuer can claim the lands. I think the defenders are entitled to absolvitor from this conclusion, and from the other conclusions of the action.

As to the terms of the formal title to the estate of Banchor, the Court is not required to adjust these terms. That is a matter for the private conveyancer who may be consulted or employed by the parties.

LORD YOUNG.—It is clear and undisputed that the testament in question contains a declaration of the testator's will with respect to the disposal of his lands of Banchor in Scotland. It was, indeed, suggested that the word "devise" is, according to English law, a word of conveyance. I believe that it is a testamentary word which is used only in wills to declare testamentary intention, and although by construction of law it vests on the testator's death an actual freehold in the devisee, yet this is not from any technical virtue in the word devise, but from respect to the will, the same result following from any words expressive of the testator's will and intention. Indeed, the testator's will when only collected by necessary or highly probable implication, is given effect to in like manner. If the point were material we should require further information as to the law of England. But I think it is clearly immaterial, for, whatever the law of England, a devise in an English will cannot, with respect to land in Scotland, operate as a conveyance, or otherwise than as a declaration of testamentary intention. Prior to the Conveyancing Act of 1868, a declaration of testamentary intention was, as to Scotch heritage, altogether inoperative, the common law requiring absolutely a de presenti conveyance even in a mortis causa deed intended to take effect on the maker's death. The rule of the common law was altered by the statute, and the law now is that a will has effect upon land as fully and completely as upon moveables. This is the meaning and effect, in my opinion, of section 20 of the statute, the language of which I think it unnecessary to consume time by commenting on. It would have been against the general scheme and policy of our system of titles and registers to take the will as a deed of conveyance, and accordingly a method is provided of making a

No. 57. registrable conveyance, in harmony with our system of titles, to carry into execution the intention which the will declares.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Studd v.
Studd, &c.

I do not dwell on this topic, for the parties were agreed, and the Lord Ordinary has decided, that the will must have effect upon the lands in Scotland "according to the sound construction" of it. The pursuer's leading plea is to this effect, and the Lord Ordinary has "no hesitation in holding that it (the Scotch land) passed under the 'devise.'" The only question, then, is what is the meaning of the will, and the Lord Ordinary has decided that "according to the sound construction of the will" the Scotch lands were destined to the testator's eldest son, and the heirs-male of his body, in fee. But the parties are agreed that this is not the meaning of the language of the instrument according to the law and practice of England, where it was made, and that the law of England imputes a quite different meaning to any testator using that language in an English testament, which this is. Now, it is, at first sight at least, a paradoxical proposition that Scotch heritage shall pass under the devise of an English testament, only quite otherwise than the testator confessedly intended, or, in other words, that the will shall have effect, but not according to the admitted meaning of its language and intention of the testator. The language here is indeed such that we require to be furnished with an authoritative translation. But such translation has been furnished, and I cannot say that I have any difficulty in understanding it. If I had, I should require farther assistance, assuming, as I should, that any given devise or declaration of will in an English testament respecting Scotch heritage admits of being made intelligible to us, so that we shall know what the testator meant to be done with it. The language here is apparently technical, and, at all events, is admitted to be quite familiar to English conveyancers and lawyers, and the meaning is stated to us without a suggestion that there is any doubt about it. There is, indeed, in the minute of the parties a variety of superfluous (as I think) information, with which we have no occasion to concern ourselves, at least in this action. The material thing is that the language according to its admitted meaning declares it to be the testator's desire that his eldest son (the pursuer) shall have the lands for life, and that his (the son's) male issue, or the heirs-male of his body, shall have the fee. According to my view of the case, and having regard to the conclusions of the summons, this is enough to entitle the defenders to absolvitor, provided the will is to have effect according to the admitted meaning of it.

But the Lord Ordinary has declared that "the sound construction" of the will differs from the admitted meaning of its language, and gives the fee of the lands to the pursuer with only a spes successionis to his heirs-male. His Lordship arrives at this conclusion by applying to this English testament, made in England by an Englishman, a very special and peculiar Scotch rule of construction applicable to Scotch deeds of conveyance. That rule is that a conveyance to a parent in liferent and his unborn issue in fee confers a fee on the parent, unless a contrary intention appears. The rule has been condemned as unreasonable by Lord Corehouse and other eminent Judges, and it owes its continuance only to the consideration that it has been so long fixed and known that Scotch testators, and certainly Scotch conveyancers, may and ought to be presumed to use the language to which it applies in the sense or with the meaning which the rule attaches to it. In accordance with this view, the word "alienably" or "only," or anything whatever in the deed satisfactorily shewing that a liferent and no more was intended, excludes the rule. This has not been doubted for a long while. To apply this rule of construction to an English testament, and so defeat the testator's intention according to the sense and meaning of his words as admitted by the parties, or expounded to us by those versed in the language used, is to misapply it, I think, grievously. An English testator must, on clear and familiar principle, be held to have used the words of his English will, prepared by an English conveyancer, in the sense and meaning which the law of England attaches to them, and this in the present case is distinctly negative of an intention to give the fee to the pursuer, to whom he devised the estate for life. I have already pointed out that even in a Scotch conveyance any satisfactory indication of intention to give a liferent only is conclusive, and excludes the rule on which the Lord Ordinary has here acted.

No. 57.
Dec. 10, 1880.
Studd v.
Studd, &c.

The Lord Ordinary observes "that an entail of lands in Scotland cannot be constituted according to the law of this country, except with strict compliance with the statutory rules which regulate entails." But a liferent and fee with a destination to heirs-male of the fiar's body, and as long a destination beyond as you please to think of, although it is indeed an entail, is not a statutory entail, or anything but a simple destination standing on the common law. It is not suggested that this will is a statutory entail of the Scotch lands, or that the testator has expressed any desire that such an entail should be made, although if he had I really see no reason why his will should not have effect, the statutory rules of course being complied with in the conveyances made in pursuance of it. But that is not the question. The question is whether a testament which distinctly expresses the testator's will and desire that his Scotch lands shall go to his eldest son in liferent, and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, is to have effect or not, and the Scotch Entail Acts have, as I think, no bearing on this question. "Tail male" is not the language of Scotch conveyancing, but as interpreted to us by agreement it is precisely, or almost precisely, equivalent to what we call a fee with a simple destination to heirs-male of the fiar's body. A tail male in immediate succession to an estate for life vests in possession, we are told, on the termination of the life estate, when the fiar taking, if of lawful age, or as soon as he attains it, may dispose of the estate as he pleases. The only peculiarity, as distinguished from our law in the corresponding case, seems to be that the fiar cannot alienate or burden during the continuance of the life estate. Whether in giving effect to the will the fiar ought to be disabled from affecting the estate during the subsistence of the liferent by postponing to that time the vesting of the fee in the fiar, and leaving it to stand in the liferenter as a fiduciary or otherwise, we are not called on to decide. It may be that the testament will be sufficiently and satisfactorily fulfilled by constituting the estates of liferent and fee as therein desired, leaving the law of Scotland to determine the quality and incidents of these estates respectively in Scotch land without reference to the rules of the law of England applicable to similar estates in English land. On this question, which may never arise, I give no opinion now.

In this action we can only give or refuse, in whole or in part, one or other of three declarators alternatively concluded for, and are not required to settle, and I should think could not competently settle, the terms of the conveyances by which the testament is to be carried into execution with respect to the Scotch estate. The proper judgment, in my opinion, is to repel the pursuer's pleas, sustain the second and third pleas for the defenders, and assoilzie them from the action.

No. 57.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Studd v.
Studd, &c.

In my opinion the fundamental error in the Lord Ordinary's judgment consists in this, that he has regarded the instrument in question not as an English will, which it is, but as a Scotch conveyance, which it is not. The notion seems to have been that the Act of 1868 substituted "devise" for "dispone," and with that change left the instrument to be construed and stand or fall as a deed of conveyance of Scotch heritage. In that view, which, I have already said, I think is erroneous, I must own that I do not see how the instrument could stand at all. It would certainly be a unique title in the Register of Sasines. Taken as an English will, we have only to find the meaning of it in the usual and familiar way, and give it effect accordingly with respect to both real and personal estate within our jurisdiction, requiring, as the Act of 1868 enjoins, that in so doing with respect to land our conveyancing forms shall be observed and a registrable title made. Another error which I have, I think, sufficiently pointed out, consists in the idea that there is here any question about a strict entail, i.e., an entail with fetters. It is generally known even in Scotland that an English estate "tail" is just a fee with a simple destination to heirs of the body, and that an estate in "tail male" is just a fee with a simple destination to heirs-male of the body, although, if there had been any question about it, we should, according to our practice, have required it to be cleared by a reference to English lawyers. Such an estate in "tail" or "tail male" to take effect on the termination of a life estate created by the same instrument is the familiar strict settlement of English conveyancing. The destination may be made as extensive as the settler pleases, but however extensive it is a simple destination in the sense familiar to us, viz., that any fiar taking may alter or terminate the destination, and deal with the property at his pleasure. I cannot accept the suggestion that we have no sufficiently exact equivalent in Scotland to enable us to give effect to an English will, using the English terms when these are interpreted to us, for a liferent and fee with a simple destination to heirs-male of the body is exactly equivalent except in the single particular I have already mentioned, viz., that with us a fiar may dispose of his fee while the liferent subsists, which it appears is not the case in an English settlement. I see no difficulty in making the assimilation altogether exact if necessary by postponing the vesting of the beneficial fee till the termination of the liferent, and meanwhile giving a fiduciary fee to the liferenter. But no question arises now or may ever arise, and meanwhile the property is quite safe, inasmuch as the pursuer having by our judgment a liferent only, cannot affect the fee or prejudice the party who may eventually be entitled to it.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary has decided this case in favour of the pursuer, and your Lordships are both agreed that that judgment should be recalled, and the action dismissed. I find myself in the position of agreeing in the result, though not in the grounds, of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. If the case had only rested upon its specialties I should not have thought it necessary to allude to the result of the Court's deliberations. It is always unfortunate to differ, but the present condition of the Court, which is not its statutory condition, renders a difference more unfortunate. The Lord Ordinary has decided one way, and two Judges in the Inner-House out of three have decided another way. That is not a satisfactory result, and I would very gladly have avoided it if I could. But this case gives rise to some very important questions, and will necessarily be a precedent, and, when cases like the present arise, will be similarly applied. Therefore I think it only right, all the more that the Act of 1868 is now to receive a construction with which I do not agree, to state shortly the grounds on which I differ from your Lordships. No. 57.

The instrument, the effect of which we are to determine in this case, professes to devise or convey certain real estates in Inverness-shire to persons therein designed, to be held under the restrictions and qualifications expressed in the settlement. We are told that this devise, and the conditions annexed to it, constitute a settlement in tail male according to the law of England, and that if it had related to real estate in that country the rights thereby conferred would have been those described in a statement on which the parties have agreed. The question raised in this case is whether the law of Scotland will recognise and give effect to a conveyance of landed estate in Scotland to which these conditions are attached. Dec. 10, 1880.
Studd v.
Studd, &c.

I need not stop to establish, for the proposition is too elementary to be disputed, that this is a question which can only be determined by the law of Scotland. The domicile of the grantor of the conveyance is in this question of no moment. The conveyance, wherever executed, and whatever the domicile of the grantor, must be effectual according to our own law, or it is not effectual at all. If the grantor had been domiciled in Scotland the question would have been precisely the same.

Before the statute of 1868 the conveyance would have been wholly ineffectual for want of sufficient words of disposition. But no question of that kind is involved in the present case. If the substance of the right conveyed be according to our own law, the words used in the settlement are by that law quite sufficient to operate a valid conveyance. "Devise," as a term applicable to personal estate, is, under the 20th section of the Act of 1868, an effectual term of disposition in a testamentary settlement. But the provisions of the statutes, as I shall shew immediately, reach no farther, and cannot possibly authorise land in Scotland to be held under a tenure which the law of Scotland does not recognise.

It has been said that we are bound to discover the intention of the grantor, and, having done so, to give effect to it, whether that can or can not be done by the actual devise. It is of more importance to ascertain what the grantor has done. There is no doubt about his intention. He meant his lands in Inverness-shire to be held under an English settlement in tail male, and had no other intention; and that which he intended he has embodied not in informal instructions but in a formal instrument. The question is, whether this deed can receive effect. There is no other question.

The following are the provisions of this instrument—(reads clause of will recited supra, p. 250).

The parties to this action have agreed on a glossary or interpretation of these terms, the material clauses of which are the following—(reads clauses recited supra, p. 252).

It will, however, be kept in mind that the results of the legal relations thus constituted, which are here enumerated, are but a fraction of the numberless legal incidents of the estates of tenant for life, tenant in tail, and remainder man by the law of England. If I mistake not, this is one of the most technical chapters in the English law of real property. In the course of succession contemplated under this will, are the rights of the tenant for life, the tenant in tail, and the remainder men to continue to be regulated by the law of England, or are the persons called intended to be Scottish proprietors holding their estate under the law of Scotland? Is the entail—if entail it is to be considered—to be terminated according to English rules or according to Scotch? Are questions regarding the rights to cut timber, or impeachment of waste, to be settled by our law or that of England? I only point out these things which lie on the surface, to shew on how wide a sea of difficulties it is proposed to embark. To my mind it is entirely impossible to carry out the only intention which the testator has expressed.

Excepting in their relation to general jurisprudence we know nothing of the rules of the law of England beyond what the parties have agreed to tell us. But we see enough from the statement of parties to make it certain that a devise to a tenant for life, and after his death to the use of another in tail male with remainders over, is not equivalent to, but is entirely discrepant from, a Scotch disposition to A in liferent, and to B in fee. The difference is vital. A disposition to A in liferent and B in fee makes B the immediate proprietor, under burden of the liferent; and unless he is limited by the fetters of a strict entail he may sell, or charge the lands as he will, or his creditors may attach them for his debts, although only under burden of the liferent. The law will recognise no restrictions which are not in conformity with the entail statutes of 1685, and the right of fee cannot be held in abeyance. But a devise of real estate in England to A as tenant for life and then to B as tenant in tail male, is, as we know, a gift, in which the interest of the tenant in tail commences only when that of the tenant for life terminates, and in which the validity of the grant for life is essential to support the grant in remainder. There is no fee in existence, in the sense in which we use that term, other than the right for life while the tenant for life lives; although the interest in expectancy vests, and must vest, from the date of the grant. These distinctions affect the whole nature of the gift—its immediate enjoyment, and its ultimate effect. In my opinion it is hopeless, and idle, to attempt to weld into one two incompatible and inconsistent rights.

I conclude therefore that as under this settlement no present right of fee is vested in any one during the life of the tenant for life, the right of fee remains undisposed of by the law of Scotland, and the heir-at-law may complete a title to it. I come to the same result as regards the life interest. As the right conferred is, as every liferent is in England, not a burden on a present fee, but a right on which the remainder depends, a doctrine unknown to the law of Scotland, I think the whole settlement must fail, and the pursuer, as heir-at-law, must prevail.

There is no injustice in this result. Scotch conveyancers are as accessible as English conveyancers, and we are not to make a crude and unscientific jumble of our land rights because people will not take the trouble to use reasonable precautions. The case is precisely analogous to one which the Courts in England would have to decide, if it were attempted to entail English real estate in the terms of the statute 1685, either by conveyance de presenti, or by mortis causa settlement. I cannot believe they would listen for a moment to such an attempt, for the English law of real estate will not permit a series of limited fees, and the Courts are not likely to alter their settled law because of a similar blunder by a Scotch conveyancer.

It seems to be thought that the 20th section of the Act of 1868 enables an English testator to attach to a bequest of real estate in Scotland conditions which are ineffectual by the law of Scotland—and that it abrogates the lex rei sitæ in such a case. Whether this view extends to a Scotch testament I have been unable to gather from your Lordships' opinions. But I apprehend that the clause in question not only gives no sanction to this result, but is wholly inconsistent with it. The clause in question deals exclusively with the solemnities or formalities requisite in conveyances of lands, and with the mode of completing a feudal title under them.

Studd v. Studd, &c.

Clause 19 of this statute provides a short method of making up a title under a general disposition of real estate. It provides that this may be done by recording a notarial instrument in the form of schedule L of the Act, and that schedule must contain any conditions or qualifications attached to the right by the general disposition. Clause 20 then provides that it shall be competent to any owner of lands to settle the succession to the same in the event of his death, not only by conveyances de presenti, according to the existing law and practice, but likewise by testamentary or mortis causa deeds or writings. It then provides that it shall not be necessary to use the technical word "dispone," but that it shall be sufficient to use any words which, if used in a will or testament, would entitle the grantee to claim moveables; and that if such deeds are executed according to the law of Scotland regulating testaments they shall be equivalent to a general disposition of the lands within the meaning of the 19th section thereof. It then provides that the title may be made up either by a conveyance from the heir-at-law or by a notarial instrument as provided in section 19.

It is thus manifest that the title so made up must contain the conditions and qualifications contained in the general disposition, and no other. As to the effect to be given to these conditions and qualifications the statute of course is wholly silent. It dealt with no such matter. But it shews that the conditions and qualifications must enter the title precisely as they are contained in the general disposition, and if these are such as the law of Scotland will not recognise, there is not a word in this clause which can give them validity.

It is said that this 20th section places bequests of land on the same footing with bequests of moveables, and on this assumption the opposite argument is wholly built. But this is not what the clause does. It puts bequests of land in testaments which contain words which would be sufficient to convey moveables on the same footing with a general disposition of land inter vivos, and if this were a general disposition of land inter vivos it seems to be conceded that it could not be supported. If so, the foundation of the hypothesis is destroyed, because by the very words of the section this settlement is equivalent to a general disposition of land inter vivos.

I am therefore of opinion that there is here no valid disposition of this estate, because it is qualified by conditions repugnant to the law, and that the pursuer, as heir-at-law, is entitled to the property in fee-simple.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor; repel the pleas in law for the respondent (pursuer); sustain the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, Edward Arthur Studd and Gladys Studd: Assolzie the said defenders from the conclusions of the libel, and decern."

WILLIAM STEWART, Pursuer.—*Mackintosh—Wallace.*ROBERT B. RITCHIE (Gibson's Trustee), Defender.—*Kinnear—M'Kie.*Dec. 10, 1880.
Stewart v. Gibson's Trustee.

Poinding of Ground in security for current interest—Poinding of the ground in security for interest current but not yet due is competent, but payment cannot be demanded till the stipulated term arrives.

A petition in a Sheriff Court craved warrant of poinding of the ground for payment of a principal sum of £2000 (which had been constituted a real burden over certain lands bearing interest, but the payment of principal being deferred till the occurrence of an event which had not yet taken place), and of the interest current but not due till the term of Whitsunday next following the date of the petition. The trustee in the debtor's sequestration appeared. Warrant was granted in terms of the prayer, "with this variation, that instead of making payment as craved, the officer who carries out the warrants shall consign the free proceeds with the Clerk of Court to abide the orders of Court." A sale followed, and the proceeds were consigned as ordered. When the first term for payment of interest arrived warrant was granted for payment out of the consigned fund. Like warrants were granted on two subsequent occasions when interest became due. Held that the poinding in security for the interest was competent, and that the irregularity in that part of the prayer of the petition which craved warrant of poinding for the principal sum had been cured by the mode of proceeding subsequently adopted by the Sheriff.

Superior and Vassal—Composition—Debitum fundi.—Held that a composition due to a superior on the death of a vassal, where the entry is taxed by the feu-contract, is a debitum fundi, and not merely a personal debt of the succeeding vassal.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
M.

By minute of agreement, dated 11th March 1876, between Henry Gibson, solicitor, Dundee, and William Stewart, nurseryman, Dundee and Broughty Ferry, the former agreed to purchase from the latter certain subjects at Broughty-Ferry,—“The price to be £2600, whereof £2000 shall be created a real burden on the property and allowed to remain so long as the said Henry Gibson, his heirs and assignees, shall desire, and at all events until his title shall be made unchallengeable—said sum of £2000 to bear interest at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum, . . . and the remainder of said price, being £600, shall be paid at Whitsunday next (old style).”

On 26th May 1876 Stewart executed a disposition of the subjects in favour of Gibson in consideration of the sum of £673, 6s. 8d. paid to him, and “of the further sum of £2000 herein declared to be a real burden upon and affecting the lands” “in terms of and upon the conditions specified in the minute of agreement,” which was “referred to and held to form part of these presents,”—the said sum of £2000 to bear interest from Whitsunday 1876.

On the same date a personal bond was executed by Gibson for that £2000, which he bound himself to pay to Stewart, “subject to the stipulations in the minute of agreement, at Whitsunday 1881, declaring that notwithstanding the said term of payment the principal sum shall be allowed to remain unpaid until the said Henry Gibson's title shall be made unchallengeable.”

The disposition was recorded on 29th May 1876, but the minute of agreement referred to was not recorded.

On 15th February 1879 the whole estates of Henry Gibson were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and Mr R. B. Ritchie, accountant, Dundee, was confirmed trustee thereon.

On 4th March 1879 Stewart presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Dundee, praying the Court to grant warrant to officers of the Court to “pound and distrain All and Sundry the readiest moveable goods, gear,” &c. “of the said defender Henry Gibson, proprietor or lately proprietor, and also occupant, of the lands, subjects, and others known as Mount Rosa, Broughty-Ferry, and grounds thereof, and particularly described in the condescendence hereto annexed, or forming part of his estates or of his sequestrated estates, and make payment thereof to account of or to the avail and quantity of the principal sum of £2000, being the amount of the real burden created and constituted in favour of the pursuer on and over the said lands, subjects, and others by disposition granted by the pursuer in favour of the defender, and specified in the said condescendence, penalty specified in the said disposition, and the interest of the said principal sum at the rate of £4, 10s. per centum per annum from and after the term of Martinmas last, the terms of payment thereof being always first come and bye-gone.”

Ritchie, the trustee on the sequestrated estate, entered appearance to defend the said action.

The pursuer averred ;—(Cond. 3) “The foresaid sum of £2000 sterling, and the interest thereof at the rate of £4, 10s. per cent per annum from and since the term of Martinmas last, are unpaid and due by the defender to the pursuer. The counter statements, in so far as inconsistent with the said disposition by the pursuer to the said Henry Gibson, and the said bond by the said Henry Gibson to the pursuer, and with the pursuer’s statements, are denied. In consequence of the sequestration, the whole sums of principal and interest are now presently exigible, or at least the whole subject of the pursuer’s security is attachable by him to provide for the due payment of the obligations before mentioned in his favour.” (Ans. 3) “Admitted, with this explanation, that the interest here averred for the half year up to Whitsunday next will not be payable till that term, and that under arrangements between the pursuer and the said Henry Gibson the sum of £2000 was not payable when the petition in this action was presented to the Court by the pursuer.”

Article 4 of the statement of facts lodged for the defender was as follows :—(Stat. 4) “That the interests of the pursuer may be fully protected, and that there may be no pretext for asking decree in this action, the defender is prepared, and now offers on his being allowed to sell the whole effects which belonged to the said Henry Gibson, situated within or upon the said heritable subjects, for behoof of whom it may concern, and that at the sight and to the satisfaction of any person to be named by the Court, to hold the proceeds subject to any claim which the pursuer may lodge in the sequestration, to be adjudicated upon by the defender, or under appeal from his judgment, all in terms of the bankrupt statute.”

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The sums condescended on, and in any event the interest of the real burden mentioned in the petition, being in the circumstances presently exigible, or at least not being a contingent but a certain debt, the pursuer is entitled to the warrant and decree craved. (2) In any event, pursuer having the rights condescended on, is entitled to have the goods and others sought to be poinded, or the proceeds thereof, applied or set apart in payment or security pro tanto of the sums due and to become due to him.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuer has not averred, or at least has not produced, any title warranting him to ask a decree of poinding the ground as prayed for. (4) The term of payment of the £2000 claimed by the pursuer not having yet arrived, he, notwithstanding the sequestration of the bankrupt’s estates, is not entitled to payment, but only to such reasonable security as can be given that his claims will be met when due, and such security will be afforded under the tender now made by the defender.

No. 58.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Stewart v. Gibson's Trustee.

On April 7, 1879, the Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) repelled the defender's plea on the competency of the action.* On appeal, the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) adhered, and remitted the case to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed. On 22d May 1879, the Sheriff-substitute issued the following interlocutor:—"Grants warrant as craved in the prayer of the petition, with this variation—that instead of making payment as craved, the officer who carries out the warrant shall consign the free proceeds with the Clerk of Court to abide the orders of Court, and decerns ad interim to this effect, reserving to dispose of the money that may be consigned, and to pronounce further as may be just."

On appeal, the Sheriff issued an interlocutor adhering.†

Following on this interlocutor, the warrant to poind the ground was executed.

The execution bore that the decree had been obtained against the defender "for not making payment of the principal sum of £2000, being the amount of the real burden created and constituted in favour of the pursuer in and over the lands" conveyed by the said disposition, "penalties therein specified, and the interest of the said principal sum at the rate of £4, 10s. per centum per annum from and after the term of Martinmas last," &c.

Warrant for sale having been granted, the poinded goods were thereafter sold, and the price consigned "in terms of the order of Court" by the pursuer.

On 1st October 1879 the defender Ritchie lodged the following minute:—"The compeerer submits to the Court that the poinding and the sale following thereon were irregular and illegal, in respect the officer in many instances appraised in one sum various articles which were of different kinds and values, thus leading to the effects being exposed in corresponding lots, to the loss and injury of the compeerer and others concerned—see Macknight v. Green, 27th January 1835, 13 S. 342, and Menzies' Conveyancing, 3d ed. p. 309. The compeerer therefore craves that the officer at whose sight the poinding was executed be not allowed the expenses of the poinding and sale, and that in the meantime, and pending the consideration of this question, he be ordained to consign in the hands of the Clerk of Court the full amount of the roup-roll, including £13, being the value of effects adjudged over to the poinding creditor, except in so far as consignment has already been made."

On 13th October the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—

* "NOTE.—The competency of the action seems to me to be conclusively established by the old cases of Lady Ednam, 26th June 1828, M. 8128, and Douglas of Morton v. Tenants of Kinglassie, February 1662, M. 1282 and 8130 (in the latter of which the term of payment was, as here, uncertain). . . ."

† "NOTE.—Looking to the law as established by the case of Royal Bank v. Bain, 6th July 1877, 4 R. 985, there seems to the Sheriff to be no doubt that the pursuer is preferable in competition with the trustee. The peculiarity of the case is that by the minute of agreement and by the bond, both dated 26th May 1876 (Nos. 13 and 15 of process), it is declared that the £2000 shall be allowed to remain until the said Henry Gibson's title to the subjects 'shall be made unchallengeable.' Now, this does not seem to have been yet done, and until it be done it is a question whether the pursuer can demand payment of his £2000. But it seems to the Sheriff that this position of matters will not prevent the pursuer selling in payment of the interest on the sum borrowed, which is heritably secured. In fact, both parties seek the same thing. The pursuer, on the one hand, seeks to be allowed to sell and consign the price with the Clerk of Court; Mr Ritchie, on the other, seeks to be allowed to sell and consign the price with the Clerk of Court."

" Finds that the proceeds of the sale amounted to £163, 10s., whereof the sum of £13 is still in the pursuer's hands, being the value of articles knocked down to him as the pouncing creditor at the appraised values : . . . Finds that there is now in the hands of the Court the sum of £128, 7s. 8d., and that this sum may be taken as representing the free proceeds of the sale exclusive of the £13 above mentioned, less the dues of the consignment : . . . Grants warrant to the clerk of Court to pay out of the consigned fund— . . . (2) To the pursuer the sum of £31, 1s. 3d., being the balance of the half year's interest due at Whitsunday last on the bond mentioned in the proceedings after deducting income-tax, and also the above-mentioned sum of £13; and decerns ad interim, and quoad ultra continues the cause."* No. 58.
Dec. 10, 1880.
Stewart v. Gib-
son's Trustee.

On 12th November 1879 the pursuer lodged a minute, in which he craved the Court to grant decree for payment to him out of the balance of the consigned fund of the interest due to him on his bond for £2000 for half year ending at Martinmas 1879, amounting, less income-tax, &c., to £40, 8s. 3d.

Of the same date the Sheriff-substitute granted decree in terms of the minute.

On 10th March 1880 the pursuer lodged another minute, stating (1) that the heritable subjects had been sold by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank in virtue of an absolute disposition to them by the bankrupt for £2050, "i.e., for £50 under the burden of pursuer's debt of £2000 and consequents from the date of entry;" (2) that the interest on the said £2000 from Martinmas 1879 to Candlemas 1880, amounting to £20, 9s. 3d., was still unpaid, and that that sum, less 8s. 6d. of income-tax, was payable to him out of the consigned fund; (3) that he, the pursuer, had had to pay certain sums to the superior of the said heritable subjects to prevent declarator of irritancy of the feu ob non solutum canonem, viz., feu-duties amounting to £32, 16s. 10d., and a composition of £8, payable on the death of Mrs Anderson, the last vassal of said subjects.

To this minute the following answers were lodged by the defender:—Answers 1 and 2. "Believed to be true." 3. After denying the liability of the pursuer to pay the said sums to the superior, the answer set forth,— "Explained that as regards the composition of £8 the superior had no right to full or preferable payment of that sum, the same being simply a personal claim."

On 30th March 1880 the Sheriff-substitute issued the following interlocutor:—"The Sheriff-substitute having resumed consideration of the process, finds that the heritable subjects to which the action relates were recently exposed to sale by the liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank in virtue of an absolute disposition by the bankrupt in favour of the said bank, and were purchased under burden of the pursuer's debt of £2000 and consequents from the date of the purchaser's entry (which was at Candlemas last) for the sum of £50, which sum did not cover the expenses of the sale and the conveyance to the purchaser: Finds that the interest due to the pursuer for the period from Martinmas 1879 to 2d

* "NOTE.—While disposed to think that there have been some irregularities in the way in which this pouncing has been carried out, which would have entitled the trustee or any one interested to interdict the sale, I do not see how, when matters have been allowed to go so far, I can possibly treat the sale as null and void, nor do I feel justified in entertaining the trustee's motion that in respect of these irregularities all the expenses incurred in connection with the sale should be disallowed. It seems to me that the trustee's remedy, if he has one, must be sought by an action of damages against the officer. . . ."

No. 58. February 1880 is unpaid, and that said interest amounts, after deducting income-tax, to £20, 0s. 9d.: . . . Finds the pursuer has recently made the following payments to the superior of the subjects, viz., the sum of £29, 5s. 10d., being the amount of the feu-duties payable therefrom for the period from Whitsunday 1876 to Martinmas 1879 with progressive interest, and the sum of £8, being the composition payable on the death of the last entered vassal, and that in virtue of the assignation by the superior in his favour, No. 62 of process, he is entitled to have these sums repaid to him out of the proceeds of the moveables sold under his pointing, now in manibus curiæ, under deduction, however, of the following sums (amounting together to £3, 9s. 11d.) of which under the feu-contract the superior was bound to relieve the vassal, viz., . . . ; and as the result of these findings, finds that the pursuer is now entitled to an order to uplift from the consigned fund the sum of £48, 15s. 11d. (forty-eight pounds, fifteen shillings, and elevenpence sterling); and grants warrant to the clerk of Court to make payment to him of that sum accordingly: Finds the compeerer, Robert Bower Ritchie, trustee on the defender Henry Gibson's sequestrated estate, liable in the pursuer's expenses, subject to some modification.*

On appeal, the Sheriff adhered.

Ritchie appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for appellant;—The minute of agreement not having been put on record, the principal sum of £2000 had not been effectually constituted a real burden on the land.¹ Pointing of the ground for a contingent debt was incompetent. At the date of the petition no interest was due, and the pointing, so far as the principal sum was concerned (the execution and warrant of sale proceeded on that), was clearly incompetent.²

The payment of £8 composition to the superior out of the consigned money was incompetent, not being a debitum fundi, but merely a personal debt of the vassal.³

The manner in which the sale, following on the pointing, was carried out was illegal, and invalidated the whole proceedings.⁴

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant was barred from insisting in his objections by his actings in the Sheriff Court. The principal sum

* "NOTE.—It is quite true that the feu-contract in the case of Morrison's Trustees v. Webster (16th May 1878, 5 R. 800), contained a declaration which does not occur in the one before me, that the entry-moneys stipulated for on the entry of heirs or singular successors should be real burdens on the subjects, and recoverable as debita fundi; but a perusal of the opinions delivered by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford, who formed the majority in that case, has satisfied me that the judgment would have been the same though the specialty to which I have referred had been absent, for both these learned Judges were, as I read their opinions, prepared to hold that where in an old feu-contract the vassal undertakes as one of his obligations to pay, say, a duplicand of the feu-duty as composition on the entry of each heir or singular successor, the composition so agreed to be paid forms an integral condition of the grant, just as much as the feu-duty itself does, and is ex sua natura a real burden without any clause declaring it to be such. The case in question is, therefore, in my opinion, a direct authority for negating the defender's contention that the composition of £8 which the pursuer paid, and quoad which he is now in the superior's place, is not a debitum fundi, but merely a personal debt of the vassal. . . ."

had been effectually constituted a real burden on the lands by the registration of the disposition. The respondent had never insisted on the pointing for the principal sum. A creditor on a heritable estate could legally ask for pointing on a debt to become due if he did not ask for payment till it was due.¹ He was obliged to take the course he did to preserve his preference over the trustee.² The payment of the composition from the consigned fund was competent, it being a condition of the tenure—(Morrison's Trustees v. Webster, supra). The appellant's proper course, if he objected to the mode in which the proceedings were carried out, was to have interdicted the sale.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action in the Sheriff Court is a party who is in right of a real burden to the extent of £2000, which is secured over certain subjects in Forfarshire under a disposition by himself in favour of Henry Gibson, and it is not necessary to refer to that deed further than to say that the £2000 was by it effectually secured as a real burden over the subjects conveyed. At the same time the pursuer was restrained from demanding payment of it till a certain event occurred, for in a relative agreement and a relative personal bond it was provided that notwithstanding the foresaid term of payment the principal sum should remain unpaid till Gibson's title was made unchallengeable; till all difficulty as to the title was cleared up the real burden was to continue. Now, that difficulty had not been removed before this pointing of the ground was used, nor has it yet for aught we know, and so the pursuer is not entitled to be paid the principal sum. But the prayer of the petition does conclude that the proceeds of the pointing should be applied "to account of or to the avail and quantity of the principal sum of £2000, being the amount of the real burden created and constituted in favour of the pursuer on and over the said lands, subjects, and others, . . . and the interest of the said principal sum at the rate of £4, 10s. per centum per annum from and after the term of Martinmas last, the terms of payment thereof being always first come and bygone." Now, the Sheriff-substitute, on 22d May 1879, granted warrant as craved in the prayer of the petition. He added, however, "with this variation, that instead of making payment as craved, the officer who carries out the warrants shall consign the free proceeds with the clerk of Court, to abide the orders of Court, and decerns ad interim, . . . reserving to dispose of the money that may be consigned, and to pronounce further as may be just." This warrant was granted after Gibson's trustee—for he had become bankrupt in the meantime—was sisted as defender in the action. The warrant was executed, and the pointing was laid on so as to secure payment of principal as well as interest, but the Sheriff's reservation is of considerable importance, especially as to what follows, for the money was not paid to the pointing creditor and allowed to be applied by him in terms of the warrant, but was consigned, and so we can now see what was done with the proceeds of the pointing. The warrant of sale, which is dated 25th July, is in the same terms as the warrant of 22d May 1879. But the sale

No. 58. having been effected, we have on 13th October an interlocutor which is very important as shewing what the Sheriff-substitute intended by his reservation in the interlocutor of 22d May. He "finds that the proceeds of the sale amounted to £163, 10s., whereof the sum of £13 is still in the pursuer's hands, being the value of articles knocked down to him as the pouncing creditor at the appraised values," that is, there having been no competitors for the goods so sold, they were knocked down to the pouncing creditor; then follow findings as to expenses, and then the Sheriff-substitute "finds that there is now in the hands of the Court the sum of £128, 7s. 8d., and that this sum may be taken as representing the free proceeds of the sale, exclusive of the £13 above mentioned, less the dues of the consignment;" then he deals with some claims for poor-rates, &c., and awards a sum on that account; and then he awards to the pursuer "the sum of £31, 1s. 3d., being the balance of the half year's interest due at Whitsunday last on the bond mentioned in the proceedings, after deducting income-tax, and also the above-mentioned sum of £13, and decerns ad interim, and quoad ultra continues the cause." This interlocutor was issued on 13th October. The first half year's interest which became due after the petition was presented was at Whitsunday preceding, and this explains the terms used. Then on 12th November 1879 the Sheriff-substitute "grants warrant to the clerk of Court to pay to the pursuer out of the consigned fund the further sum of £40, 8s. 3d. sterling, being the balance of the half year's interest due at this term on the bond mentioned in the proceedings, after deducting income-tax."

Now, what was the effect of these proceedings? The proceeds of the sale of the pounced goods were applied, first, in payment of the half year's interest due at Whitsunday 1879, being the half year's interest current at the date when the petition was presented, and then part of the balance was paid for the second half year's interest, which had fallen due at 12th November 1879. I have no doubt, as regards this application of the proceeds, that it was quite regular and proper. No part of the proceeds was applied in discharge of the principal sum, and no effect was given to the part of the prayer which asked that. The course taken by the Sheriff-substitute in making the reservation on 22d May, and the way in which he carried it out, had the effect of removing the objection, which there would otherwise have been, to the terms of the prayer and of the warrant, for nothing was done but to apply the price in payment of interest, not only of the current interest, but also of the second term's interest, with regard to which there seems to be no practical objection. The whole matter was wound up by an interlocutor of 30th March 1880, in which the Sheriff-substitute "finds that the heritable subjects to which the action relates were recently exposed to sale by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank in virtue of an absolute disposition by the bankrupt in favour of the said bank, and were purchased, under burden of the pursuer's debt of £2000 and consequents from the date of the purchaser's entry (which was at Candlemas last), for the sum of £50, which sum did not cover the expenses of the sale and the conveyance to the purchaser: Finds that the interest due to the pursuer for the period from Martinmas 1879 to 2d February 1880 is unpaid, and that said interest amounts, after deducting income-tax, to £20, 0s. 9d."—and the Sheriff-substitute then proceeds to make certain deductions, and brings out a balance, for which he gives the pursuer credit, and finds him "now entitled to an order to uplift from the consigned fund the sum of £48, 15s. 11d., and grants warrant to the clerk of Court to make payment of that sum to him accordingly." Now, the interest for that period was also well secured by the pointing, and payment of it regularly ordered by the Sheriff-substitute, for the same reason as that of the interest which became due at Martinmas 1879.

Stewart v. Gib-
son's Trustee.

But the interlocutor contains a number of items on both sides of the account, to none of which any objection is made save one, viz., a payment made by the pursuer, as pointing creditor, of £8, being a composition to the superior of the subjects payable on the death of the last entered vassal. I think the pointing creditor was bound to pay this sum. If it had been a case of an untaxed entry it might have been a very different matter; but this is a composition the amount of which is fixed by the feu-contract, and it is therefore a real burden on the feu just as much as the feu-duty is. I concur with the Sheriff-substitute's view of the law on this matter, and I think this was just as much a real burden as any other stipulation in favour of the superior in the feu-contract.

On the whole matter, though there was certainly an inherent vice in the original prayer for warrant of pointing as craved, I think that was covered by the Sheriff-substitute's subsequent course of dealing; and I am for adhering to the interlocutors appealed against.

LORD DEAS.—The only point, in the opinion of your Lordship, on which I entertain any doubt is whether this pointing of the ground was not equally well and competently executed for the principal sum as for the other items included in it. The principal sum was well constituted as a real burden. It is not necessary to decide the question precisely, but I am disposed to think that there is nothing to prevent a pointing of the ground being executed for a principal sum to await the event of its becoming payable, on the same principle as terms of interest current and not yet come may be rightly included in the pointing to ~~await the event of their becoming due.~~ At the same time it is a matter of little moment in the present case whether this is so or not. In all other particulars I entirely agree with your Lordship's observations, and, having come to the same conclusion, it is unnecessary for me to enter into detail.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. The main question argued was the competency of having a pointing of the ground for interest not payable at the date of the pointing. As regards the first objection, that there cannot be a pointing for a contingent debt, it is plain from your Lordship's explanation of the proceedings that though the terms of the warrant might be held to cover the principal sum of £2000, that matter was, in point of fact, restricted by the terms of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. We are therefore relieved from the necessity of deciding that question, because no step was taken to carry out the pointing as regards that principal sum. The other point was strongly pressed, and authority cited to shew that a pointing could not be brought for interest current but not yet due; but I think the cases cited by the Sheriff-substitute go plainly to shew that such a pointing may be brought. In the Juridical Styles, moreover (vol. iii, pp. 461 and 462), I find that the usual form of the summons of pointing and of letters of pointing of the ground is this, "to make payment thereof to the complainer to the amount of the said principal sum of £ , and interest of the said principal sum from the said term of , and to become due in time coming, during the non-redemption, the terms of payment thereof being always first come and bygone." These are the usual words of style in a summons of pointing, and the letters run in

No. 58. having been effected, we have on 13th October an interlocutor which is very important as shewing what the Sheriff-substitute intended by his reservation in the interlocutor of 22d May. He "finds that the proceeds of the sale amounted to £163, 10s., whereof the sum of £13 is still in the pursuer's hands, being the value of articles knocked down to him as the pouncing creditor at the appraised values," that is, there having been no competitors for the goods so sold, they were knocked down to the pouncing creditor; then follow findings as to expenses, and then the Sheriff-substitute "finds that there is now in the hands of the Court the sum of £128, 7s. 8d., and that this sum may be taken as representing the free proceeds of the sale, exclusive of the £13 above mentioned, less the dues of the consignation;" then he deals with some claims for poor-rates, &c., and awards a sum on that account; and then he awards to the pursuer "the sum of £31, 1s. 3d., being the balance of the half year's interest due at Whitsunday last on the bond mentioned in the proceedings, after deducting income-tax, and also the above-mentioned sum of £13, and decerns ad interim, and quoad ultra continues the cause." This interlocutor was issued on 13th October. The first half year's interest which became due after the petition was presented was at Whitsunday preceding, and this explains the terms used. Then on 12th November 1879 the Sheriff-substitute "grants warrant to the clerk of Court to pay to the pursuer out of the consigned fund the further sum of £40, 8s. 3d. sterling, being the balance of the half year's interest due at this term on the bond mentioned in the proceedings, after deducting income-tax."

Now, what was the effect of these proceedings? The proceeds of the sale of the pounced goods were applied, first, in payment of the half year's interest due at Whitsunday 1879, being the half year's interest current at the date when the petition was presented, and then part of the balance was paid for the second half year's interest, which had fallen due at 12th November 1879. I have no doubt, as regards this application of the proceeds, that it was quite regular and proper. No part of the proceeds was applied in discharge of the principal sum, and no effect was given to the part of the prayer which asked that. The course taken by the Sheriff-substitute in making the reservation on 22d May, and the way in which he carried it out, had the effect of removing the objection, which there would otherwise have been, to the terms of the prayer and of the warrant, for nothing was done but to apply the price in payment of interest, not only of the current interest, but also of the second term's interest, with regard to which there seems to be no practical objection. The whole matter was wound up by an interlocutor of 30th March 1880, in which the Sheriff-substitute "finds that the heritable subjects to which the action relates were recently exposed to sale by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank in virtue of an absolute disposition by the bankrupt in favour of the said bank, and were purchased, under burden of the pursuer's debt of £2000 and consequents from the date of the purchaser's entry (which was at Candlemas last), for the sum of £50, which sum did not cover the expenses of the sale and the conveyance to the purchaser: Finds that the interest due to the pursuer for the period from Martinmas 1879 to 2d February 1880 is unpaid, and that said interest amounts, after deducting income-tax, to £20, 0s. 9d."—and the Sheriff-substitute then proceeds to make certain deductions, and brings out a balance, for which he gives the pursuer credit, and finds him "now entitled to an order to uplift from the consigned fund the sum of £48, 15s. 11d., and grants warrant to the clerk of Court to make payment of that sum to him accordingly." Now, the interest for that period was also well secured by the poiding, and payment of it regularly ordered by the Sheriff-substitute, for the same reason as that of the interest which became due at Martinmas 1879. No. 58.

Stewart v. Gibson's Trustee.

But the interlocutor contains a number of items on both sides of the account, to none of which any objection is made save one, viz., a payment made by the pursuer, as poiding creditor, of £8, being a composition to the superior of the subjects payable on the death of the last entered vassal. I think the poiding creditor was bound to pay this sum. If it had been a case of an untaxed entry it might have been a very different matter; but this is a composition the amount of which is fixed by the feu-contract, and it is therefore a real burden on the feu just as much as the feu-duty is. I concur with the Sheriff-substitute's view of the law on this matter, and I think this was just as much a real burden as any other stipulation in favour of the superior in the feu-contract.

On the whole matter, though there was certainly an inherent vice in the original prayer for warrant of poiding as craved, I think that was covered by the Sheriff-substitute's subsequent course of dealing; and I am for adhering to the interlocutors appealed against.

LORD DEAS.—The only point, in the opinion of your Lordship, on which I entertain any doubt is whether this poiding of the ground was not equally well and competently executed for the principal sum as for the other items included in it. The principal sum was well constituted as a real burden. It is not necessary to decide the question precisely, but I am disposed to think that there is nothing to prevent a poiding of the ground being executed for a principal sum to await the event of its becoming payable, on the same principle as terms of interest current and not yet come may be rightly included in the poiding to ~~await the event of their becoming due~~. At the same time it is a matter of little moment in the present case whether this is so or not. In all other particulars I entirely agree with your Lordship's observations, and, having come to the same conclusion, it is unnecessary for me to enter into detail.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. The main question argued was the competency of having a poiding of the ground for interest not payable at the date of the poiding. As regards the first objection, that there cannot be a poiding for a contingent debt, it is plain from your Lordship's explanation of the proceedings that though the terms of the warrant might be held to cover the principal sum of £2000, that matter was, in point of fact, restricted by the terms of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. We are therefore relieved from the necessity of deciding that question, because no step was taken to carry out the poiding as regards that principal sum. The other point was strongly pressed, and authority cited to shew that a poiding could not be brought for interest current but not yet due; but I think the cases cited by the Sheriff-substitute go plainly to shew that such a poiding may be brought. In the Juridical Styles, moreover (vol. iii, pp. 461 and 462), I find that the usual form of the summons of poiding and of letters of poiding of the ground is this, "to make payment thereof to the complainer to the amount of the said principal sum of £ , and interest of the said principal sum from the said term of , and to become due in time coming, during the non-redemption, the terms of payment thereof being always first come and bygone." These are the usual words of style in a summons of poiding, and the letters run in

No. 58. similar terms. It is therefore clear that at the time these styles were published that was the recognised form in practice. On looking into M'Glashan's "Sheriff Court Practice" (p. 136) I find it laid down that such is the practice, and reference is there made to the case of Kennedy v. Ramsay's Trustees, 17th Feb. 1852, 14 D. 513. On examining that case, in which there were originally nine conclusions of reduction, which were either repelled or not insisted on, I find that the form of summons there contained the very words I have read from the Styles. I am therefore of opinion that the proceedings here have been conform to the usual practice, and ought to be sustained. On the other point of the case, viz., as to the composition, I concur with your Lordship.

Dec. 10, 1880.
Stewart v. Gib-
son's Trustee.

LORD SHAND.—I have also come to the conclusion that there are no sufficient grounds for disturbing the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff. If the case had been insisted in as one of diligence for the principal sum in the bond, or had not been practically treated in the Sheriff Court as a diligence for securing interest only, I think the judgment could not have been sustained, for it appears to me to be clear that a poiding of the ground for a real burden of which the term of payment is indefinite,—a term which may not arrive perhaps for many years, or possibly never,—is not a proper diligence. Such a case is different from one in which, as here, interest is payable in any event, and stipulated to be paid at definite terms. I think that in this case the petitioner from the first made it clear that he restricted the diligence to interest alone, and on that footing the case was treated by the Sheriffs. That being so, the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, authorising payment, certainly, of the first and second half year's interest, are unobjectionable, the diligence having been used for the interest past due at the date of the sale, and for the half year then current, and payment of which was obtained only after the term of Martinmas was past. Neither of these payments of interest was really resisted or objected to by the appellant; and even as to the warrant of sale the question raised before the Sheriff seems really to have been not one as to the propriety or necessity for a sale, but as to which of the parties should have the carriage of it.

Speaking generally of the objections argued I am not disposed to receive them with favour, for I think there was a considerable amount of acquiescence on the part of the defender in the proceedings, and that the petitioner acted and was entitled to act in reliance on this. It would be extremely hard in a litigation of this sort, and after parties have taken up a certain attitude before the Sheriff, that one of them should be permitted in this Court to turn round and take exception to all that has occurred, stating new objections to each stage of the proceedings, it might be with the consequence of opening claims of damages against his opponent. The same thing runs through the whole of the proceedings. I cannot better illustrate this than by adverting to what occurred when the third payment of interest was asked. When that demand was made there might have been a grave objection to it, but the way in which it was treated was this. A minute was lodged for the petitioner stating that interest for a certain period was due, and the amount of it was stated. The respondent admitted that it was so due, for in his answers to the minute he says, "Believed to be true." In addition to this, in the same pleading, he does not object to the proceedings in toto or to the claim for interest, but merely says that a less sum was due than was demanded. I hold that in respect of the conduct of the party the appellant is not entitled now to raise the objection. So far as the demand for the third payment of interest is concerned, I wish to rest my judgment on that ground, and on that ground alone. No. 58.

An objection was taken to the mode of poinding, and if it had been maintained and pressed before the Sheriff I think that the poinding would have been open to grave objection. I should be sorry to sanction any such extensive slumping of articles together as was here done, but the objection taken in the Court below was merely that the officer should not get his fees, and not that the poinding was bad, and might, or should be cut down entirely. I think there was a blot on the proceedings, but I do not think the objection can be insisted in now, after a sale took place without objection. On the point of the composition to the superior I only say that the sum is very trifling, and as to so small an amount left as the only question in the appeal, I would not disturb the Sheriffs' judgments. On the whole question, I can see no good reason for interfering with the interlocutors appealed from. Dec. 10, 1880. Stewart v. Gibson's Trustee.

M'Gaan v.
M'Gaan.

Husband and Wife—Separation and Aliment—Habitual intoxication and reasonable fear of violence.—In an action of separation at the instance of a wife against her husband, held that to entitle the pursuer to decree of separation a mensa et thoro it was not necessary for her to instruct personal injury to herself, but that proof of the husband's habitual intoxication and violent conduct, inducing a reasonable fear of violence to the pursuer, was enough.

THIS was an action of separation on the ground of cruelty at the instance of Mrs G. C. Harris or Baillie or M'Gaan against her husband, William M'Gaan. 2D DIVISION. Lord Adam. M.

The pursuer and defender were married in 1876, and lived together as husband and wife, with certain brief interruptions, till February 1880, when the pursuer was obliged, as she alleged, to leave the defender by reason of the treatment which she received at his hands.

The grounds of action were stated to be the intemperate habits of the pursuer, which led to riotous and violent scenes, in the course of which the defender so maltreated, abused, and threatened his wife as to put her in fear of serious personal injury.

The evidence led was to the following effect:—

The pursuer had considerable means, acquired from her first husband, and these, on her marriage with M'Gaan, were, by antenuptial marriage-contract, placed beyond the defender's control. The pursuer's means were sufficient comfortably to maintain the spouses. Except to the extent of one half year's rent and taxes the pursuer supported herself and the defender out of her means during the whole of their married life. The defender had no means of his own, and though he had employment for about a year as traveller for a firm of wine and spirit merchants he was dismissed in April 1878 owing to his intemperate habits, and did not again obtain or even seek employment. Except as above mentioned, he contributed nothing to the support of the pursuer and himself. His habits, which were intemperate from the beginning of his married life, grew worse, and after being dismissed from his employment he lived in an almost continuous state of intoxication, never coming home in the evening sober, and often bringing drink with him. When excited by drink he was violent and abusive in his language to his wife, and riotous in his conduct, breaking and throwing about furniture and domestic articles. Without actually striking her, he frequently roughly seized her, pushed her about, tore her clothes, and put her in fear that he would do her some serious personal injury. He also threatened her in such terms as that he "would throw her over the window," "would kill her," "would shoot her," &c. In consequence of such conduct, the pursuer on two or three occasions took refuge in the houses of her neighbours, and obtained their intervention between herself and her husband; at other times she got a nephew of her own to sleep in the house for her protection; and on three or four occasions she left the house intending to separate from the defender, but was induced to return by his promises of amendment. At the same time it was proved that there were frequent quarrels between the pursuer and defender, which she often provoked, and in course of which she used very abusive and irritating language to him. These were, however, always occasions on which he had returned home under the influence of drink.

The Lord Ordinary, on 14th July 1880, assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action.

The pursuer reclaimed.¹

The pursuer had, prior to the action being raised, offered to pay to the defender an annuity of £25 out of the income of her marriage trust-funds, on condition of his agreeing to an extrajudicial separation, and at the conclusion of the debate her counsel judicially repeated this offer, contingently upon decree being pronounced in her favour.

The Court intimated that they would give the defender time to consider this offer before they gave judgment.

The defender agreeing to accept the pursuer's offer, she executed a bond of annuity in his favour for £25 per annum, to be delivered in the event of decree in her favour being pronounced, and a minute for the parties was lodged informing the Court of this arrangement.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think it necessary in this case to go at length into our grounds for granting decree of separation. I shall content myself with giving the impression which a careful perusal of the evidence has made upon my mind.

The agreement which has been come to between the parties is, in the circumstances, a very proper one, but it cannot affect our view of the evidence or enter in any way into our judgment.

I am quite at one with the Judges who decided the case of Fulton v. Fulton, 12 D. 1104, in thinking that mere habits of intoxication will not afford grounds for separation. I keep in mind also that it was decided by the House of Lords in Paterson v. Paterson, 7 Bell's App., 337, that mere moral torture will not be sufficient to afford ground for granting a demand of this kind. And though the Judges in Fulton's case did express regret that the law did not permit them to give relief to a woman united to a husband whose life was spent in habitual intoxication and riot, I should have followed them in holding that the habitual intoxication and riotous conduct of the husband in this case were not sufficient in themselves to warrant our granting the decree craved.

But when habitual intoxication on the part of the husband is coupled with such conduct as puts the wife in reasonable fear of personal injury to herself, I think the law does allow the Court to intervene. And I am of opinion that we have such a case here.

Dec. 14, 1880.

M'Gaan v.

M'Gaan.

Of the defender's conduct it is impossible to speak too severely. He has not done a hand's turn of work for two years. During that time he has been entirely dependant on his wife—this has indeed been, more or less, the case during his whole married life—and during the whole of his married life, but more particularly during the last two years, he has been living in a condition of habitual, I might almost say continuous, intoxication. Four times at least during that period has his wife retreated from his house and society from fear of personal violence. On the whole, I think she was warranted in so doing.

I find farther this fact in the case, and it is not without materiality, that the defender has not ventured to come forward to contradict his wife's testimony.

I cannot think that a woman is bound to wait until some grievous injury is inflicted on her person before she is entitled to separation, and, therefore, though the defender's violence has not been carried that length, I think there is enough in the evidence to warrant our granting the decree craved. In its legal aspect, the case is a narrow one. In its moral aspect, it is not.

LORD GIFFORD and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the defender has been guilty of cruelly abusing and maltreating the pursuer, and that, therefore, the pursuer has full liberty and freedom to live separate from the defender her husband, and decern and ordain the defender to separate himself from the pursuer a mensa et thoro in all time coming."

Succession—Fee and Liferent—Fee with protected Succession—Repugnancy.—

A testator, on the narrative that he had acquired considerable means by his first wife, and that it was his wish to make an additional provision for his two children by her, directed his trustees to convey certain heritable property to his son by his first marriage, W B L, and, "to make my said daughter C B L equal thereto, I leave and bequeath to her the sum of £1000 sterling, which legacy shall be payable at the first term" that should happen six months after his decease.

The residue of his estate the testator directed to be liferented by his second wife, and on her death to be divided among his whole children, the shares to vest at his death, and, subject to a condition of survivorship, to be payable to sons at the age of twenty-five, but in the case of daughters to be settled on themselves in liferent allenerly and on the issue of their bodies in fee. In this provision as to residue there was inserted a direction that the special legacy of £1000 to C B L, the daughter of his first marriage, should "be held by the trustees for her sole behoof during her minority," and should, upon her attaining majority, "be settled or placed so as validly and effectually to provide to herself a liferent only thereof, and to the lawful issue of her body, equally among them, the fee thereof."

THOMAS LINDSAY, shipowner, Leith, who died on 8th April 1877, left a trust-disposition whereby he conveyed to his brother, William Lindsay of Hermitage Hill House, Leith, and others, as trustees, his whole means and estate, for the purpose, inter alia, "Secondly, I direct my said trustees to implement and fulfil the obligation undertaken by me in antenuptial contract of marriage entered into betwixt me and my spouse, Mrs Agnes Cossar or Lindsay (his second wife), bearing date 2d April 1859 : Thirdly, In respect that I acquired considerable means by my deceased wife, Catherine Bruce or Lindsay, it is my wish that the following provisions to my children by the said Catherine Bruce or Lindsay (his first wife), viz., William Bruce Lindsay and Catherine Bruce Lindsay, should be preserved or made for them over and above the other provisions herein contained in their favour, viz.—I direct my said trustees to execute and deliver" to his son, William Bruce Lindsay, a conveyance of a certain heritable property in Leith, which the truster had acquired from his first wife, Catherine Bruce or Lindsay; "and as I consider the said subjects to be of the value of £1000 or thereby, to make my said daughter, the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay, equal thereto, I leave and bequeath to her the sum of £1300 sterling" (restricted by codicil to £1000 according to original intention, £1300 having been inserted at this place by clerical error instead of £1000), "which legacy shall be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen six months after my decease: Fourthly, I direct my trustees to give effect to the following specific legacies, viz." (here followed a list of special legacies): "Sixthly, I appoint my said trustees, after fulfilling the before-written purposes, to pay over to my said spouse, in case she shall survive me, and so long as she shall remain my widow, the nett income which shall accrue from the residue of my means and estate: Ninthly, Upon the death of my said spouse, or in the event of her entering into a second marriage, upon that event, my whole estate, heritable and moveable, not already otherwise appropriated by these presents or by the foresaid antenuptial contract of marriage with my said spouse, shall be divided into as many parts as may be necessary to give each of my children, William Bruce Lindsay and Catherine Bruce Lindsay (children of the marriage betwixt me and the said deceased Catherine Bruce or Lindsay), and Thomas James Lindsay, John Allan Lindsay, Charles Cossar Lindsay, and Agnes Veitch Lindsay, surviving children already born of the marriage betwixt me and the said Agnes Cossar or Lindsay, and any other child or children who may yet be born of the marriage, an equal share, so that the same may be divided equally among them, the lawful issue of those predeceasing taking their parent's share; and in regard to the application of my means so divided for the benefit of my children I hereby direct as follows, viz.:—I direct that the legacy of £1000 sterling to the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay shall be held by the trustees for her sole behoof during her minority, and shall, upon her attaining majority (with any savings of interest that may have resulted therefrom), be settled or placed so as validly and effectually to provide to herself a liferent only thereof, and to the lawful issue of her body, equally among them, the fee thereof: And as regards the respective shares of my said estate, heritable and moveable, both under these presents and under the antenuptial contract of marriage aforesaid (exclusive of the £1000 legacy to the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay), I hereby provide that the same shall vest in each of my children on my death, and in the case of a posthumous child, on the birth thereof, but the said respective shares shall be held by my trustees for the sole behoof of my said children respectively during their respective minorities, and the annual produce, or such part thereof as may be necessary, applied for their use, and the respective shares, with any savings of interest that may result therefrom, shall then be settled as follows, viz., in the case of daughters, on themselves in liferent for their respective liferent uses alienably, and on the lawful issue of their separate bodies, equally among them, in fee, and in the case of sons, it shall be settled on them, so as the share of each shall be paid when they respectively attain twenty-five years of age."

Lindsay's
Trustees v.
Lindsay, &c.

There followed a survivorship clause applicable to the period of payment as well as vesting, and to the shares of residue, both original and accreting, provided to the truster's whole children.

Catherine Bruce Lindsay survived her father, and died, after attaining majority but unmarried, on 24th January 1879. She left no settlement, and her brother William Bruce Lindsay was decerned her executor-dative qua next of kin.

In consequence of the death of Catherine Bruce Lindsay, in these circumstances, a question arose as to the destination of the legacy of £1300 (restricted by codicil to £1000) bequeathed to her by the third purpose of the truster's settlement.

It was contended by her brother William Bruce Lindsay that the said legacy of £1000 had vested in his sister, and was carried to him as her next of kin.

It was maintained, on the other hand, by the children of the truster's second marriage, that the right of the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay in the said legacy was a right of liferent only, and that upon her death without lawful issue the fee of the said legacy lapsed and fell into residue, or was otherwise undisposed of.

A special case was presented to the Court by Mr Lindsay's trustees, the first parties, William Bruce Lindsay, the second party, and Thomas James Lindsay and others, the children of the truster's second marriage, the third parties, in which judgment was asked on the following questions:—“(1) Does the legacy of £1300, mentioned in the third purpose of the said trust-settlement, and restricted to £1000 by said codicil, fall to the party of the second part, as the executor of the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay? or (2) Has the said legacy lapsed so as to fall into residue? or (3) Is the fee of the said legacy undisposed of, so as to pass to the heirs in mobilibus of the truster?”

After hearing counsel the Second Division appointed the case to be argued before seven Judges.

Argued for the second party;—The question at issue arose upon the conjunction of two clauses of a settlement, and, if possible, both must be read together. If one clause occurred in the will and another in a codicil it might then be said the former was cancelled by the latter. But not if they occurred in the same writing. In that case you must endeavour to reconcile them. Except in so far as the latter clause qualified the original gift, the original gift stood. In the present case the first clause provided for all events;¹ the second clause provided for a contingency which had not occurred, viz., the daughter leaving issue. Therefore, the previous gift, which was not otherwise qualified, must receive effect. The only persons to take the benefit of this legacy, other than the daughter, were her issue, and the object of the ninth clause was simply the protection of the latter, should they exist, and it did not qualify the right of the former if they did not exist. There were several cases, of which *Gibson v. Ross*¹ was an example, in which the words "liferent allenerly" or "liferent only" were held, because of other expressions in the deed, not incompatible with a fee.

Argued for the third parties ;—The terms used in the ninth purpose of the settlement clearly limited the right to a bare liferent, and there were no other words in the deed to take off that effect.² If it were said that the expressions found in the third purpose indicated that a right of fee was given, then, the two clauses being repugnant, the latter, the ninth, must govern in accordance with the maxim, cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur in testamento ultimum ratum est.³ Cases such as *Wilson v. Reid*⁴ could not be pleaded against this view, for it was impossible to sever two parts of a testamentary settlement. A direct authority in the present case was Fulton v. Fulton's Trustees.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case arises on the construction of the settlement of the late Thomas Lindsay, who died on 8th April 1877. It is substantially this, whether a special legacy to his daughter by his first marriage vested in her during her lifetime and has transmitted to her executor.

The general scheme of Mr Lindsay's settlement is simple, and may be shortly stated. There is first a direction to implement a certain obligation undertaken by the truster in his marriage-contract with his second wife. There are then some special legacies given. And lastly, the whole residue is to be liferented by the truster's widow, and on her death to be divided in equal shares among his seven children. These shares are to vest in the children at the testator's death, the income to be applied towards their maintenance during minority, and on majority the capital, with any savings of interest, is to be settled as follows :—On the sons, "so as the share of each shall be paid when they respectively attain twenty-five years of age;" in the case of daughters, "on themselves in liferent for their respective liferent uses allenerly, and on the lawful issue of their separate bodies, equally among them, in fee." There is farther a survivorship clause, applicable to accruing as well as original shares.

The scheme of the settlement is thus simple enough. The difficulty arises in connection with a special legacy to Catherine Bruce Lindsay the truster's daughter by his first marriage, which is given by the third purpose of the deed. The motive for this special legacy is there set out to be that the truster had acquired considerable means through his first wife, and that he therefore wished to make certain provisions for his children by her over and above the provisions in favour of his children generally in which they were to share. Accordingly he declares his purpose to be that his son William Bruce Lindsay should receive a conveyance of certain heritable property, and that his daughter Catherine Bruce Lindsay should receive, as an equivalent, a sum which he erroneously states at £1300, but which was intended to be and was by codicil restricted to £1000. The words of the latter provision are these:—"And as I consider the said subjects to be of the value of £1000 or thereby, to make my said daughter, the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay, equal thereto, I leave and bequeath to her the sum of £1300 sterling, which legacy shall be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen six months after my decease."

Lindsay's
Trustees v.
Lindsay, &c.

So far as these words are concerned, there is no doubt as to the meaning of the bequest. But there is a farther provision or declaration as to this legacy in the afterpart of the deed, which creates the difficulty. After making the equal division of residue, the testator says:—"And in regard to the application of my means so divided for the benefit of my children, I hereby direct as follows, viz:—I direct that the legacy of £1000 sterling to the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay shall be held by the trustees for her sole behoof during her minority, and shall upon her attaining majority be settled or placed so as validly and effectually to provide to herself a liferent only thereof, and to the lawful issue of her body, equally among them, the fee thereof."

Now, it is contended that the effect of this declaration is to alter the previous bequest from a bequest of fee to one of liferent merely, and that, Catherine Bruce Lindsay having deceased after majority, but without issue, the fee of this bequest is undisposed of.

It is certainly strange that there should be two clauses in the same deed so apparently contradictory, but if we read them in accordance with the construction to which I have just referred, we should not, in my opinion, be giving effect to the desire of the testator. I think he intended, for the reason stated by him, that his two elder children should receive an equivalent for their mother's fortune in the shape of the heritable property and this sum of £1000 respectively. That was the leading idea, but it naturally occurred to the testator, that as he was settling the shares of residue which his daughters were to take in the way I have already mentioned, it might also be quite proper that in the event of Catherine Bruce Lindsay being married, this £1000, as well as her share of the general residue, should also be settled so that the fee might be secured to her children. Therefore the testator says that while his trustees are to hold the provision during his daughter Catherine's minority, they are on her majority to settle it so as validly and effectually to give her a liferent only, and the lawful issue of her body the fee. But that is plainly on the condition that she marries and has children. Excepting in that event the bequest takes effect according to its terms in the earlier part of the deed. Even if there are children, theirs is only a contingent right, and if they predecease their mother the bequest takes effect, as I have said, according to its own absolute terms. The result is that until Catherine Bruce Lindsay's death it cannot be seen whether the bequest which had vested in her had so vested absolutely in fee, or only in liferent allenary. Now that she has died unmarried and without issue, it becomes apparent that what vested in her was an absolute fee, and that absolute fee passes to her executor.

If I had thought it necessary to construe the term "liferent allenary" in a different way, from technical reasons, I should not have been prepared to come to this result. But I give the fullest effect to the term, on that event occurring in which alone it was the intention of the testator to create such a right, and that is all I am called on to do.

Lindsay's
Trustees v.
Lindsay, &c.

LORD GIFFORD.—The question in this case really is, what was the true intention of the testator, the late Thomas Lindsay, in reference to the special legacy of £1000 bequeathed by him to his daughter, the late Catherine Bruce Lindsay? Of course, that intention must be gathered solely from the terms of the late Mr Lindsay's trust-settlement and codicil, and from the words which he has used in these deeds. But if, upon a sound construction of these testamentary deeds, and of the whole expressions contained therein, it can be made to appear what was the true wish and intention of the testator, then that wish and intention must receive effect, and the testamentary trustees must do whatever is necessary for this purpose. There is no technical rule forbidding this, for we are not construing a deed of conveyance or other deed by which anything is professed to be done, and the terms of which must receive only their legal and their fixed meaning. We are construing a deed of settlement which effectually conveys the testator's whole estate to his trustees, who are fully vested therewith, and the only question is, how are these trustees to carry into full effect the real intentions of the testator? Whatever can be shewn from the deeds to have been the real will of the testator, that will the trustees are bound to make effectual. ✓

Now, it appears from the deed itself that the testator was twice married, and he informs us, in the third purpose, "that I acquired considerable means by my deceased wife, Catherine Bruce or Lindsay," who conveyed her whole estate to him by a certain mutual disposition, dated in 1852. Upon this narrative the testator proceeds to say,—“It is my wish that the following provisions to my children by the said Catherine Bruce or Lindsay, viz., William Bruce Lindsay and Catherine Bruce Lindsay, should be preserved or made for them over and above the other provisions herein contained in their favour.” He then directs his trustees to convey his dwelling-house and pertinents in Charlotte Street, Leith, which he values at £1000, to his son William, one of his two children by the first marriage, and in order “to make my said daughter, the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay” (his other child by the first marriage) “equal thereto, I leave and bequeath to her the sum of £1300 sterling, which legacy shall be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen six months after my decease.” This sum of £1300 is plainly an accidental error for £1000, which was the proper sum required to produce equality, and to which sum it was accordingly restricted by the codicil.

If there had been nothing else in the deed, the case would have been perfectly clear. The testator was survived by all his children of both marriages, and his daughter Catherine by the first marriage took upon her father's death this legacy of £1000 over and above her other provisions, just in the same way as the son by the first marriage got the Charlotte Street house over and above his other provisions, and thus the intention of the testator would have been effectuated.

But a difficulty is created by the subsequent parts of the deed, and in particular by the ninth purpose thereof. By this purpose the testator directs that upon the death of his wife, or upon her entering into a second marriage, the whole residue of his estate shall be divided into as many parts as may be necessary to give each of his whole children, by both marriages, the whole number being seven, an equal share of said residue, the lawful issue of those predeceasing taking their parent's share, and he then proceeds, “and in regard to the application of my means so divided for the benefit of my children, I hereby direct as follows, viz. :—I direct that the legacy of £1000 sterling to the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay shall be held by the trustees for her sole behoof during her minority, and shall, upon her attaining majority (with any savings of interest that may have resulted therefrom) be settled or placed so as validly and effectually to provide to herself a liferent only thereof, and to the lawful issue of her body, equally among them, the fee thereof; and as regards the respective shares of my said estate, heritable and moveable, both under these presents and under the antenuptial contract of marriage aforesaid (exclusive of the £1000 legacy to the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay), I hereby provide that the same shall vest in each of my children on my death, and, in the case of a posthumous child, on the birth thereof," and he then provides that in the case of his daughters their shares should be settled on them for their liferent use allanarly, and on their lawful issue in fee. There is a subsequent clause which provides that in case any of the testator's children, born or to be born, including his two children by his first marriage, should die without leaving lawful issue before their respective shares shall have vested in them or become payable, then their shares shall accresce to the surviving children. I think there are no other clauses in the deeds bearing upon the present question.

Trustees v.
Lindsay, &c.

Catherine Bruce Lindsay, the daughter by the first marriage, survived her father and attained majority, but she died unmarried and intestate on 24th January 1879, and the question now is, what becomes of her special legacy of £1000?

I am of opinion that that legacy vested in Catherine Bruce Lindsay in fee, and now belongs to her only surviving full brother, William Bruce Lindsay, as her only executor and nearest of kin.

The direct bequest in the first part of the deed is in express terms, and absolutely unqualified—to Catherine Bruce Lindsay £1000 sterling, payable at the first Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after the testator's death. Under this bequest Catherine Bruce Lindsay, who survived the testator and outlived the term of payment, took the legacy absolutely to herself. It vested in her at her father's death. I do not think that the subsequent provisions of the deed in any way cancel or destroy the original bequest. Their intention is not to diminish Catherine's share, but only to secure it for her children, in case she should have any, and accordingly I read the provision directing the legacy to be held so as to provide her a liferent only thereof, and the fee to her children as a conditional provision only in the event of her having and leaving children. The legacy was to be hers by being secured to herself in liferent, and her children, if any, in fee, and it never could have been the intention of the testator, in the event of her dying unmarried, and dying early as she did, to deprive her of the legacy altogether and of all power of testing thereon, and to send it to his whole other children, including his five children by his second marriage. It is here that the specialty seems to me so important that the testator intended this legacy, and the house corresponding thereto, given to his son by the first marriage, to be in substance estates left to them by their own mother, the testator's first wife, and it would utterly defeat this intention if either William's house or Catherine's legacy of £1000 should accrue equally among the children of the second marriage. This would be to deprive the house and the legacy of £1000 of their character of succession by the first family to their own mother, the testator's first wife.

Lindsay's
Trustees v.
Lindsay, &c.

But apart from this, I am of opinion that the legacy of £1000 absolutely vested in Catherine Bruce Lindsay notwithstanding the direction given to the trustees to secure the sum to herself in liferent only, and to the lawful issue of her body in fee. There is no repugnancy between the direct bequest of the sum to the lady herself and the direction to secure the fee to her children. Both must be read together, and the effect is that if she have no children the fee remains in herself. Suppose the trustees had actually settled the sum in terms of the trust-deed, as indeed they were bound to do on the death of the testator, and while the said Catherine Bruce Lindsay was still alive and unmarried, or suppose that she were alive still and that the question now was, in what terms should the sum be settled, she being still unmarried? I think the answer must be that the sum should be settled by a trust or otherwise to Catherine Bruce Lindsay in liferent, for her liferent use only, and to the issue of her body in fee, whom failing, to Catherine Bruce Lindsay herself, and her nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever. I think that this, and nothing but this, was the true intention of the testator as gathered from his deed, and I should so have decided the question had Catherine been still alive and unmarried. This would have given Catherine the full fee in the event of her dying without issue. Of course the result must be the same whether the sum was formally settled by the trustees during Catherine's life or not.

The alternatives put in the case are, I think, both excluded by the sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement. It was not the intention of the testator that Catherine's legacy of £1000 should, in the circumstances which have emerged, fall into residue, and still less that it should, as estate undisposed of, fall into intestacy, and pass to the heirs in mobilibus of the testator.

I am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and the two alternative questions in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—The will in question first bequeaths a legacy of £1000 to the testator's daughter Catherine, so that it should vest a morte testatoris, and then declares a trust with respect to it which, having regard to the terms of the trust, might exhaust it or not according to an uncertain future event, which being the death of the legatee with or without issue was incapable of being ascertained before the legatee's death. According to the trust, the trustees were to pay the income of the legacy to the legatee during her life, and on her death, leaving issue, they were to pay the capital to them, whereby, of course, the legacy would be exhausted and the trust ended. If she died without issue, as in fact she did, the trust was ended, there being no longer any trust-purpose to fulfil; but the trustees having the capital of the legacy in their hands the question is, what are they to do with it? and that is the question which we have to decide.

It depends, I think, on the consideration whether the trust I have referred to, subsequently declared with respect to the legacy previously bequeathed, operated as a revocation of the bequest, leaving the rights of parties to depend entirely on the declaration of trust; or whether the bequest remained subject only to the trust subsequently created, and I am of opinion that the latter is the right view. I think the testator put the legacy, which he had bequeathed so as to vest a morte testatoris, in trust for a specified purpose, and that, subject to this trust, the legacy subsisted as originally constituted in the same way exactly as if the trust had been created by the legatee, whether voluntarily or pursuant to a direction in the will. I am accordingly of opinion that on the termination of the trust by the legatee's death without issue, the legacy was set free of the only burden that was ever upon it, and became payable to her legal representative, just as it would have become payable to herself had the trust been such as might have been fulfilled and ended in her lifetime without exhausting the legacy. Had the trust been for a purpose that disappeared before the testator's death or was fulfilled thereafter, living the legatee, I think it not doubtful that the legacy must have been paid in terms of the unrevoked bequest. The fulfilment of the trust on the legatee's death (the legacy being extant) no otherwise varies the case, in my opinion, than that the legatee being dead, her representative takes her place.

Recompense—Implied Contract—Architect's remuneration for preparation of plans.—An architect prepared detailed plans for covering a piece of ground with buildings to be erected by the proprietor. The buildings were not proceeded with, but the proprietor used the plans to his advantage in dealing with a purchaser of the ground. In an action by the architect for payment of his account the proprietor denied liability on the ground that the plans had been furnished upon the footing of there being a competition. Held that, assuming the fact as stated by the defender, it lay upon the employer to prove that the employment was gratuitous, which he had failed to do, and decree given accordingly.

THIS was an action by William Landless, architect in Glasgow, for payment of £98, 0s. 6d., the principal item in which was a sum of £87, the fee charged by him for certain building plans and a report prepared on the defender's employment in connection with certain subjects belonging to the latter in Wood Lane, Glasgow. The buildings were not erected. The pursuer's charge was at the rate of 1 per cent on the estimated cost of executing the buildings. It was averred that the defender had made extensive use of the plans and report in securing a purchaser for the subjects, and that owing to them the price obtained was much larger than it would otherwise have been.

The defender stated that he had not employed the pursuer, and had authorised no one to do so, but that, his agent having introduced him to the pursuer, who was just beginning business, the pursuer had offered to compete for the plans, upon the understanding that he was to have no claim unless his plans were adopted. A Mr Gordon had also furnished plans.

After proof, the result of which sufficiently appears from the following findings and from the opinions of the Court, the Sheriff-substitute (Lees), on 11th December 1879, found "(1) That the pursuer, on the employment of the defender, prepared the plans to enable the defender to carry out the project, which he stated to the pursuer he entertained, of building on the ground belonging to him specified on said plans : (2) That the pursuer gave these professional services on the express footing that the defender intended to build on said ground, and that if his plans were adopted he would be paid in usual form : (3) That the defender having obtained possession of said plans and other documents, instead of using them on the footing on which they had been prepared, submitted them to a purchaser, and in a considerable measure in consequence of the inducements offered by the plans succeeded in selling the property at a large profit : And (4) that the pursuer is in these circumstances entitled to claim payment from the defender for his professional services." And he further made a remit to ascertain the proper remuneration for the preparation of the reports and plans.

The reporter subsequently stated that the percentage charged for the plans was reasonable, and decree was given for £94, 17s. 6d.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—There was no legal category under which he could be made liable. The plans were got merely upon approbation. Payment was to be made only if they were used. Even if the buildings had been erected it did not follow that Mr Landless' plans would have been used. It was only if the pursuer could qualify loss that he was entitled to succeed. The English cases quoted all rested upon a wrong done to the plaintiff. To establish a case of recompense there must be an actual advantage and specific gain shewn.¹

Answered for the pursuer ;—Employment was proved. The onus was upon the defender to shew that it was gratuitous. Failing his doing so there was an implied contract to pay. At any rate, as the defender had benefited by the pursuer's services, there was a good claim on the principle of recompense or quantum meruit.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action was raised by Mr William Landless, an architect in Glasgow, to recover payment of an account from his employer, Mr Wilson, who was the proprietor of building-ground in various parts of Glasgow. The sum sued for is £98, 0s. 6d., but the defence is now confined to one item of the account amounting to £87, for the preparation of plans for buildings to be erected on subjects situated at Wood Lane, Broomielaw, and relative attendances, &c. The amount of this charge, if the employment be held to be on the usual terms, is not a matter of dispute ; it was settled by a remit to a person of skill, who decided that it was fairly charged at the ordinary rates. But the defence is that the pursuer undertook to prepare the plans gratuitously. Now, I need not say that that defence throws the whole onus probandi on the defender, to shew that the pursuer did undertake to make them for nothing.

In estimating the proof of that defence the first thing is to look at the plans themselves ; they are of a very elaborate nature, and are measured plans in this sense, not only that the whole space of ground belonging to the defender at Wood Lane is disposed of in the plans and covered with buildings, but every separate tenement and room and passage and staircase is laid down with mathematical accuracy. In addition, there was an elevation of the building, and the whole were carefully prepared, and accompanied, first, by one report, and then by another, in reference to the probable rents likely to be obtained by the defender from tenants. Now, prima facie, an undertaking to prepare such plans gratuitously is an exceedingly unlikely thing, and if it is to be proved, it must be by very distinct evidence as matter of contract.

Now, what is the evidence in support of the averment here? The defender himself, and his agent Mr Buchan, say that the defender resolved to take plans from two architects in competition, the other architect being a Mr Gordon, and the arrangement made with him is distinctly enough proved. Mr Gordon himself, as well as the defender and his agent, says that he undertook to make his plans gratuitously, and such an undertaking was perhaps not surprising, as we see from the evidence that Mr Gordon's plans were rather in the nature of sketches, and not plans according to measurement. Now, an architect may very naturally offer to supply sketches gratuitously, especially to a former employer, even without any particular stipulation, but it was apparently stipulated that Mr Gordon's plan should be so furnished. The question is, was this also the case with the pursuer's plans? Neither the defender nor his agent venture to say distinctly that it was proposed or assumed that Mr Landless was not to be paid for his work. There is not a word to that effect. They do say that he was told there was to be a competition of plans, and though Mr Landless denies that, I am willing to take it for granted that he was mistaken in this respect. There was room for a mistake, looking to the evidence of the defender and his agent, and I am willing to take it that he made the mistake, and ought to have understood that there was to be a competition. But is it implied in the so-called competition that the competitors were not to be paid? If so, we must know what kind of contract it is in which that condition is said to exist. Conditions may be easily implied in well-known and nominate contracts, but in unusual and innominate contracts I have always clearly understood that nothing can be left to implication. It is here alleged by the defender that there was to be a competition of plans for these buildings, which were to be private buildings, and not public edifices such as a church or a town-hall, and that we are told by the pursuer and Mr Gordon (and they are uncontradicted) is quite unknown in practice. Mr Gordon says, in his experience of nineteen years he never heard of such a thing,* and the pursuer's evidence is to the same effect. It would then have been an unusual, in fact an unprecedented, proposal to have competing plans for these private buildings, and there is no room for implication of such an arrangement. In the case of competing plans for public buildings, so far as my experience goes, it is usual to issue in writing the terms and conditions of the competition, and the competitors are generally paid in one way or the other, for besides the prospect of being the successful candidate there is often a provision for a prize to the second and even the third, but it is always a matter of stipulation in each case. It would be an extraordinary result in the case of plans for private buildings to hold that a competitor was not to be paid. On that ground I think the defender has failed to establish his defence.

* Mr Gordon, who was called for the defender, stated,—“I have been nineteen years in business. I remember of defender speaking to me about a property he had acquired at Wood Lane, Broomielaw. . . . He told me if I chose to prepare a sketch, shewing what could be done with the ground, and that sketch satisfied him, that he might build, but I must do so on my own responsibility, as he would be under no obligation to pay any fee, and he asked if I would undertake on these terms to prepare a sketch. I prepared a sketch, and sent it on to defender. The sketch I made was just plans of a proposed building. There was no elevation plan. I did not think the elevation plan was necessary. I prepared ground plans and a report shewing the rental. They were not the ordinary plans I send in when competing. Usually, if asked to compete, it depends on the conditions of the competition what you send in. Usually an almost complete set of plans is submitted; but the plans I submitted to defender were

But the other aspects and circumstances of the case go to confirm that view. The defender, it seems, made up his mind that he could get the best and most available plans from the pursuer. There were none of those constant interviews between the defender and Mr Gordon which passed between him and the pursuer. These latter took place once a-week or oftener, for the purpose of arranging, first, as to the ground plans, then as to the elevation, and then as to the terms of the report for the purpose of bringing out the rental to be derived from the scheme. In fact both parties endeavoured to make the plans and expected rental as attractive as possible, and having done that, Mr Wilson seems to have made up his mind to sell the property and not build upon it at all, provided he could get the price he desired. With this view he wished to impress intending purchasers with the idea that the ground was very available notwithstanding its apparently irregular form. That irregularity was got over in what I think was a most ingenious manner by the pursuer's plan; and he so influenced very strongly the minds of the intending purchasers. Mr Carrick, the purchaser, himself says it was so. Now, all that seems to confirm the pursuer's case—that he prepared the plans on the same footing as any other architect, and for the usual rate of remuneration. It is not possible to suppose, if he believed he was to get nothing for his plans, that all these repeated meetings with the view of bringing them to the greatest possible perfection would have taken place. The plans themselves speak loudly in that direction—they must have cost a great deal of money as well as labour.

On the whole matter, I have no doubt that the defender has entirely failed to prove that this work was intended to be done gratuitously, and I think the pursuer is entitled to receive the usual remuneration.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—There is a conflict of evidence in this case as to the terms of quite sufficient for his purpose. I shewed how the ground could be laid out, and the return, and from that he could know whether it would be worth his while to go on with the buildings. . . . It is not very usual to ask for competition plans for that class of property at all, but when they are made it is usual to give a report of the anticipated rental. I should say that with competition plans in a case of this kind, it would be necessary to send in a report. . . . I made no charge for the plans I made.

"Cross.—I do not think it is usual for owners of private property to ask architects to send in competitive plans. In my experience of nineteen years this is the first instance of it. And I know pretty well the custom among other architects. I do not recollect at this moment of having heard of a competition in such a case as this. Competitive plans for churches, municipal buildings, and the like, are well known in the profession."

the contract between the parties. But, having in view the fact that the defender alleges a contract of a very extraordinary nature, I agree in thinking that he has entirely failed to discharge the onus of proving it.

But I think it right to say that if I had been of opinion that the case was one of a competition of plans between the two architects, and the defender had afterwards thought fit not to build at all, I should have had great difficulty in holding that he would have been entitled to say to the competitors, "You shall be paid nothing for the plans and labour you have bestowed upon me." My impression is that each of them would have been entitled to receive a quantum meruit.

But there is a clearer ground upon which we can proceed. The defender undoubtedly had these plans prepared (let us assume, upon the footing that there was a competition which was frustrated by the defender's change of mind), and he made use of them to obtain an advantageous bargain with a purchaser. I am of opinion that, in these circumstances, he was bound to pay for them. Suppose that after getting the plans he had used them for other subjects for which they might be suitable, can there be a doubt that he would have been obliged to meet the claim? It seems to me to make no difference that the plans should have been used for the purpose of enhancing the value of the ground in the eyes of a purchaser, and not, as intended, for the erection of Mr Wilson's buildings.

I should not be very careful to enquire whether the legal principle underlying this case is that of recompense, or of implied contract or obligation. The law of recompense is stated thus in Bell's Principles, sec. 538—"Where one has gained by the lawful act of another, done without any intention of donation, he is bound to recompense or indemnify that other to the extent of the gain." The services of the pursuer were taken advantage of, and I think there ought to be a fair return for them.

On the whole I agree with your Lordships that the pursuer is entitled to succeed.

THE COURT, on 16th December, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the pursuer was employed by the defender to make plans for covering with buildings a certain property belonging to the defender at Wood Lane, in the Broomielaw of Glasgow: Find that the pursuer, on the said employment, prepared the plans No. 9/6 of process, and delivered them to the defender accompanied by his reports respecting the amount of rental which might be expected to be obtained from the proposed buildings when completed: Find that the defender did not proceed to build on the said ground, but sold the same as it stood at a large advance in the price which he had recently paid for it: Find that in negotiating for said sale the defender exhibited the said plans and reports to the purchasers, and that the purchasers were greatly influenced by the exhibition of the said plans and reports, as proving the capabilities of the said ground in purchasing the said ground at the price they paid for it: Find that the defender has failed to prove that the pursuer undertook to prepare the said plans gratuitously or otherwise than on receiving remuneration at the usual rate: Find that the sum of £87 claimed by the pursuer for the said plans is charged at the usual rate: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern," &c.
